The gifts of the Holy Spirit are usually thought of in terms of the seven-fold gift of the Spirit prayed for in the Sequence of Pentecost. Those gifts—wisdom, understanding, counsel, knowledge, might, piety, and fear of the Lord—are derived from the list of messianic “spirits” delineated by the author of Isaiah (11:2-3). In Isaiah only six of the traditional seven are explicitly mentioned. Piety is used in the Septuagint (and Vulgate) to translate the first occurrence of fear of the Lord. Although it was probably simply a mistranslation, piety nonetheless extends the list to the symbolic number of fullness and thus reminds us of the unlimited character of the Spirit’s power to graciously sensitize us to live under the sway of the love of God.

The gifts of the Holy Spirit need to be understood within the context of a theology of grace. A theology which explains grace as the gift by means of which the soul is readied for the indwelling of the Trinity will tend to treat the gifts differently from a theology which understands grace and holiness as the effect of the presence of the Holy Spirit. In the former approach the gifts tend to be thought of as discrete realities which perfect the exercise of the virtues so that we may respond with the power of God (and not simply with unaided reason) to divine inspirations. In the latter, however, they are more aptly understood as one of the many facets of the mysterious and gracious bonding with God that the Spirit enables. They are the names we give to the experience of being led by the Spirit from within our spirit into the ambience of the triune God. The gifts are a kind of divinely bestowed possibility to live under the direct influence of God; they give us an habitual instinct to freely respond under, with and within the stirrings of grace.

The history of theology reveals that the gifts were not thought of as distinct from the theological and moral virtues until the 13th century. Philip the Chancellor is the first to have made this distinction, but it was Thomas Aquinas who developed the most complete synthesis of the interdependence of the gifts not only with the virtues, but also with the beatitudes and the fruits. Thomas’ understanding of the gifts as divine dispositions for acting under the influence of the Spirit has predominated in all subsequent theological reflection.

Central to the presentation in Thomas’ theology is his conviction that only those who are led by the Spirit can be sons and daughters of God (Rom 8:14). The gifts of the Spirit make it possible for us to act under the direct influence of God so that God (and not simply human reason) becomes the principle of our good acts. The Spirit of God is the condition without which the infinity of God’s grace and the finitude of human freedom could never be one. God is thus not only the distant goal, but also the intimate presence by means of which we move toward God. The gifts are thus a kind of interior divine prompting enabling us to respond to God’s beckoning from beyond. When we pray for the fullness of the experience of the gifts of the Spirit, therefore, we beseech God to live in us as the infinitely intimate presence with which we can be more and more deeply available to God’s influence.

Because of the gifts, our virtuous response toward God, self or others is lifted beyond the realm of the merely human. Because of the gifts, our relationship with God (through faith, hope and charity) and our bondedness with self and others (through prudence, justice, fortitude and temperance) are borne on the power of God’s own infinite act of self-consciousness. The gifts perfect the virtues by making it possible to live the Christian life in a manner which transcends the limits of reason. Human reason and freedom become divinized so that our good acts are elevated beyond the realm of the merely finite. God enables us to act divinely. The gifts of the Spirit empower us to be one with God (in our knowledge and love of self and others) without ceasing to be other than God. They prepare our spirit for the inspirations of grace so that our response to infinity is without limit. We are, therefore, able to live as persons possessed by God. The one act of faith, the one movement of hope, love, justice or prudence is both ours and God's. The infinite transcendence who is God becomes one with our finite transcendence. It is not just the Spirit loving in us; we do the loving. Yet the love of our hearts is inseparable from the love of God's Spirit. God's spirit of wisdom and understanding, of counsel and might, of knowledge, piety and holy fear is one with (without ceasing to be other than) ours.

Thomas understood the theological and cardinal virtues as well as the beatitudes and the gifts (and fruits) of the Spirit in terms of an organic synthesis. He thus devoted separate questions to each of the seven gifts and took great care to describe the particular functions of each as well as the way in which these various aspects of the life of grace were interrelated (S.Th., IIa IIae). Although the parallels which Thomas draws may be somewhat artificial, they nonetheless serve to remind us of the unifying function of God's Spirit.

Since the charismatic renewal, reference to the gifts of the Spirit evokes not only awareness of the traditional seven from Isaiah, but also the gifts or charisms delineated in the letters of Paul (1 Corinthians 12 and 14). The latter are those gifts (for example, tongues, healing, teaching, prophecy) described in scholastic theology as the gratiae gratis datae. Traditionally these graces have been understood as extraordinary manifestations of the power of the Spirit in the lives of individual Christians for the edification and encouragement of the community of believers. They are necessary for the good of the community, but are not required for individual salvation. One or more of the charisms or gratiae gratis datae are usually associated with "baptism in the Spirit" which some Christians experience, whereas the seven gifts are received by all Christians in the sacraments of initiation.

Either set of gifts serves to remind us that the ultimate gift of God is the Spirit of the risen Lord. The diversity of the experiences of God's transcendent presence within believers (as individuals and as a community) is the symbol of the fundamental gift of unity that is the Spirit of the Father of Jesus. It is the presence of the Spirit that makes our lives one with each other and God in the person of Jesus. The gifts of the Spirit manifest the utter gratuity and universality of God's transforming presence within us.

HOLY WEEK, LITURGIES OF

Holy Week, also called Great Week in the Eastern Christian churches, contains the most solemn liturgies of the liturgical year. It begins with the procession with palms on Palm (Passion) Sunday and lasts until the end of the great vigil of Easter the following Saturday night. In a sense Holy Week is not an official unit of the liturgical year since it comprises both Lent, which ends with the beginning of the Mass of the Lord's Supper on Holy Thursday, and most of the Easter triduum, which begins with the Mass of the Lord's Supper and ends with Easter Sunday vespers. Holy Week derives its name from the fact that this period contains the annual celebration of the most solemn mysteries of the Christian faith—the passion, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

The liturgies that make up the observance of Holy Week developed at different times in the history of the church. The earliest is the Paschal vigil, most probably the earliest of all annual Christian liturgical celebrations. While this vigil and feast may be of apostolic origin in some places, there are others (for example, Rome) where the vigil may not have been celebrated until the middle of the 2nd century. In the latter places, every Sunday had been the sole celebration of the passion, death and resurrection of Christ.

Holy Week came into existence as an intense period of preparation (prayer and fasting) for initiation at the Easter vigil. We know (from the Didache and Irenaeus of Lyons) that this fast lasted from one to several days in the first two Christian centuries. By the 3rd century, in the Syrian Didascalia Apostolorum, we have evidence for a week-long fast preceding the vigil. A 4th-century source describing the liturgies of Jerusalem, the Pilgrimage Diary of Egeria, speaks specifically of Great Week. This information is confirmed by subsequent lectionaries which treat Holy (Great) Week as a distinct unit from Lent. Thus from the 4th century on what we know as Holy Week is firmly in place. Today it has become customary to emphasize the distinction between Lent, which ends on Holy Thursday, from the Paschal triduum (see, e.g., General Norms for the Liturgical Year and the Calendar, 18-21). Here we shall deal with the liturgies of Holy Week, not in their order of importance (working back from the Paschal vigil), but in the order in which they appear in the calendar.

Passion (Palm) Sunday

The 1969 Roman Calendar significantly changed the title of the first day of Holy Week from Palm to Passion Sunday. Hitherto the previous Sunday (the Fifth Sunday of Lent) had been called Passion Sunday and the two weeks preceding Easter, Passiontide. With the restoration of the liturgies for the last stage of the catechumenate in Lent it was decided to restore the older Roman name to Palm Sunday. The eucharistic liturgy of the day falls into two parts: the commemoration of the Lord's entry into Jerusalem and the Mass, whose readings all concentrate on the Lord's Passion.

The Commemoration of the Lord's Entry into Jerusalem. The commemoration of Jesus' entry into the city of his passion may take one of three forms: a procession, a solemn entrance, or a simple entrance. The procession is to be used only once, at the principal Mass of the day in any church. The people gather at a subsidiary chapel or other place at which an antiphon is sung ("Hosanna to the Son of David..." Mt 21:9), all are invited to the observance of Holy Week, palm branches are blessed, the gospel of Jesus' entry is proclaimed (Matthew in Year A, Mark or John in Year B, and Luke in Year C), and all process to the church singing some or all of the following: Psalm 24, Psalm 47 (with appropriate antiphons) and Theodulph of Orleans' 8th-century hymn "All Glory, Laud, and Honor." The Mass then begins with the opening prayer.

The remote origins of the procession with palms can be found in Jerusalem in the 4th-century practice of processing with song and carrying palms down the Mount of Olives to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre on the afternoon of Palm Sunday. Although the origins of the observance of Palm Sunday may have been connected with pre-4th-century Jerusalem liturgy, namely the liturgy of Alexandria (see, Thomas J. Talley, The Origins of the Liturgical Year, New York: Pueblo, 1986, 39-40), it is in Jerusalem that we find the first evidence of the procession of palms. This particular day was chosen on the basis of John's gospel: "Six days before the Passover Jesus came to Bethany" (Jn 12:1). In 4th-century Jerusalem Jesus was represented in the procession by the bishop. The medieval imagination represented him in a number of ways: the bishop, a donkey (at times wooden), or even the blessed sacrament. The procession with palms did not enter the papal form of the Roman rite until the 12th century, when palms were blessed at the chapel of St. Sylvester at the Lateran Palace and the eucharistic liturgy took place at the Lateran Basilica (for the medieval Roman liturgies of Holy Week, see Schuster, The Sacramentary, Vol. II, 171-312).

The solemn entrance may take place at all other Masses or, when no provisions for a procession can be made, even for the principal Mass. In this form only the procession from a place other than the church is omitted. A simple form of entrance is provided which contains only an antiphon. The sacramentary suggests in this case that a separate Bible service on the theme of the Lord's entry be held on the preceding Saturday evening or at another time on Sunday.

The Mass. From the opening prayer on it is clear that the focus of the liturgy is the cross and passion of Christ. The third Servant Song of Isaiah (50:4-7) is the first reading; it is followed by Psalm 22. The second reading is the well-known christological hymn in Paul's Letter to the Philippians (2:6-11). The verse before the gospel (Phil 2:8-9), employed during the whole of this week, is taken from the christological hymn. The proclamation of the passion of our Lord Jesus Christ follows. The version read depends on the year in the liturgical cycle (A—Matthew, B—Mark, C—Luke) and may be done in either a longer or shorter form. The Lectionary of the Roman Missal makes no provision for a choral reading of the passion. The earlier Roman tradition had been to read Matthew's passion narrative on Palm Sunday, relegating Mark to Tuesday and Luke to Wednesday of Holy Week. A brief homily is recommended on this day.

No mention of the candidates for sacramental initiation at the upcoming Paschal vigil is made in the rites for Passion Sunday, but one might assume that the candidates might be dismissed before the prayer of the faithful on a particularly poignant way on this day, since it is the last time they will be dismissed prior to their baptism. In medieval Spain and Gaul, Palm Sunday marked the handing over of the creed to the candidates for initiation.

In the sacramentary of 1969 a new Preface has been provided for this Sunday. As with all the new Prefaces it contains in a nutshell the theology of the particular feast: "Though he was sinless, he suffered willingly for sinners. Though innocent, he accepted to save the guilty. By his dying he has destroyed our sins. By his rising he has raised us up to holiness of life. . . ." Thus the eucharistic prayer for Passion (Palm) Sunday sets the passion of the Lord within the context of the entire mystery of his death and resurrection.

Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday

The liturgies for the first three weekdays of Holy Week do not have a special character nor do they contain special ceremonies. They do, however, represent a significant change from the traditional Roman rite. The passion narratives of Mark and Luke had been read on Tuesday and Wednesday respectively. They have been replaced by gospel readings that portray the betrayal of Jesus.

The readings for Monday in the missal of Paul VI are the first Servant Song of Isaiah (Isa 42:1-7) and Jn 12:1-12. In the Tridentine Missal they had been Isa 50:5-10 and Jn 12:1-9. On Tuesday the missal of Paul VI replaces the Markan passion narrative with Jn 13:21-33, 36-38, and Jer 11:18-20 with Isa 49:1-6 (the second Servant Song). The 4th/5th century liturgy of Jerusalem had observed a long vigil on Tuesday evening at the Basilica of the Eleona atop the Mount of Olives at which Jesus' eschatological discourse (Mt 24:1-26:2) was read.

Wednesday continues the reading of the Isaian Servant Songs, this time the third: Isa 50:4-9. The gospel reading is taken from Matthew's account of the betrayal of Jesus (Mt 26:14-25). The medieval Roman liturgy for Wednesday of Holy Week reveals a somewhat different pattern. In the morning a service of prayer was held at the Lateran. This service, consisting of the Solemn Prayers of the Roman rite, repeated at the Good Friday liturgy, was probably linked to the community's desire to pray for the candidates for initiation. The afternoon liturgy (Lenten eucharistic liturgies were celebrated in the afternoon because of the observance of the fast) contained two readings before the gospel (Isa 62:11; 63:1-7 and Isa 53:1-12). The retention of the solemn prayers as well as two readings before the gospel is an example of Anton Baumstark's "law" that the most solemn days of the liturgical year retain the oldest ceremonies. This law of retention is exhibited several times throughout the liturgies of the triduum.

Holy Thursday

Holy Thursday, sometimes called "Maundy Thursday" (after the Latin "mandatum" or command of Jn 13:34), has a rich and complex liturgical history. It has been associated with three liturgical rites: the consecration of the chrism, the Mass of the Lord's Supper, and the solemn reconciliation of public penitents.

The Consecration of the Chrism.

Around the 4th century when presbyters began to be deputed to preside at solemn initiation during the paschal vigil it became necessary to consecrate the chrism apart from the vigil service itself. This was (and is) the case because the bishop alone traditionally had the right to bless this particular holy oil used both at baptism and confirmation. The consecration of the chrism was moved to the last eucharist before the vigil, i.e., the Mass of the Lord's Supper, so that the oil might be distributed to presbyters for use in their own churches. In the Roman rite this blessing was performed after communion at the Mass of the Lord's Supper (up to the reforms of 1955). The oil of catechumens and the oil of the sick had separate blessing formulas in the early Roman sacramentary. When the Roman rite was brought to northern European churches in the 7th and 8th centuries, the blessing of chrism was added to the other two blessings of oil and performed at a distinct Mass on Holy Thursday.

In the Missal of Paul VI the Chrism Mass takes place on the morning of Holy Thursday or some weekday preceding if this is more convenient. The clear aim of this liturgy is the manifestation of the unity of the presbyterate around the diocesan bishop. Two aspects of this liturgy manifest this unity: first, it must be a concelebrated Mass with priests attending from at least all of the significant areas of the diocese; and second, an innovation under Paul VI, priests are invited to renew their priestly commitment at this celebration. In this sense Paul VI clearly viewed Holy Thursday as the "Feast of Priests."

The renewal of priestly commitment takes place after the homily. The blessing of the oil of the sick takes place before the doxology of the eucharistic prayer. The blessing of the oil of catechumens and the consecration of the chrism take place immediately after the post-communion prayer. The missal provides the option of the blessing of all three oils after the liturgy of the word. Two different forms are provided for the consecration of the chrism; both follow the pattern of Roman consecratory prayers and are similar to the consecration of the font at the paschal vigil, the nuptial blessing and the consecratory prayers for ordinations.

Although the focus of the celebration is on the unity of the presbyterate, in many American dioceses this focus has been somewhat mitigated by the expectation that lay representatives of the parishes be expected to participate in the liturgy, especially by presenting the oils at the preparation of the gifts and by being given the blessed oils to take back to their parishes. The readings for the liturgy are as follows: Isa 61:1-3, 6, 8-9 (anointing); Rev 1:5-8 (priesthood—of all Christians); and Lk 4:16-21 (Christ as the Anointed One). This liturgy also has its own proper preface (P20—Priesthood—Chrism Mass) which sets the priesthood of the ordained within the context of the priesthood of Christ and the royal priesthood of his people.

The Mass of the Lord's Supper. The major liturgy of Holy Thursday and the solemn opening of the paschal triduum is the Mass of the Lord's Supper. It is to be celebrated in the evening with the participation of as many of the faithful as possible. In fact, Masses without a congregation are prohibited on this day and the local parish church is urged to have only one celebration of the eucharist.

This celebration has a somewhat mixed character. Understanding its nature correctly is crucial to the understanding and celebration of the triduum as a whole. On the one hand the Mass of the Lord's Supper is the festal opening of the triduum, signalled by the use of white vestments and the singing of the Gloria. On the other hand it maintains a somewhat lower key than the paschal vigil itself. Theologians and liturgical scholars have made a good deal of the unity of the triduum, i.e., the three days all celebrate the passion, death and resurrection of the Lord. The various celebrations are not discrete imitations of the historical events that occurred two thousand years ago. Therefore, it would be incorrect to focus on the institution of the eucharist or the ordination of priests at this celebration. Rather, as the second reading, the institution narrative contained in Paul's First Letter to the Corinthians (1 Cor 11:23-26), and the gospel, the washing of the feet (Jn 13:1-15), make clear, the Mass of the Lord's Supper centers on two acted parables which express the meaning of the death and resurrection of Jesus. Both acts, the eucharist and the foot-washing, ritually and symbolically express the fact that true life is to be found in the sacrifice of service. In this vein one might have wished that the framers of the lectionary had put Paul's version of the institution narrative within the context of the unjust meal practice of the Corinthians. Thus, the direction in the sacramentary that the homily should explain the institution of the eucharist, the institution of the priesthood and Christ's commandment of love needs to be understood within the framework of the triduum as a whole. The selection of music for the triduum should be governed by the unitive nature of the three major celebrations and not by an attempt to recreate historical circumstances.

The first reading (the narrative of the passover meal—Exod 12:1-8, 11-14) places the celebration of the triduum within the context of the Jewish feast of liberation from slavery.

A ritual washing of the feet takes place after the homily "depending on pastoral circumstances." In this act the president of the assembly imitates the action of the Servant Christ. The sacramentary does not indicate the number of people to be chosen for this ritual. Although the sacramentary does use the Latin term "vir" = "male" of those whose feet are to be washed, it is an overly literal understanding of the action of the historical Jesus to exclude women from this ritual.

There are several positive reasons for including women at this point. First, an overly literal desire to imitate the actions of Jesus robs the ritual of its evocative and symbolic power. Second, and more important, the exclusion of women might give the erroneous impression that the identity of the baptized in representing Christ is limited to males alone. The sacramentary provides several recommended antiphons (all taken from John 13) as song to accompany the ritual action.

It should be noted that this is the only occasion in the course of the liturgical year that the sacramentary states that gifts for the poor be presented along with the gifts of bread and wine. Although bringing up monetary gifts with the gifts for the celebration itself is praiseworthy in many eucharistic celebration (see General Instruction on the Roman Missal, 49), it is especially appropriate that the connection between the paschal triduum and the self-sacrifice of the church be stressed at this celebration. Once again the sacramentary provides a recommended antiphon ("Where charity and love are found, there is God") to accompany the procession, but another appropriate song might be used.

The Preface to be used at this liturgy is "Holy Eucharist I." In light of what has been said above about the unitive nature of the triduum, one might have hoped for a formula that stressed the nature of the Mass of the Lord's Supper as an introduction to the celebration of the whole paschal mystery rather than focusing exclusively on the eucharist. When the first eucharistic prayer of the Roman missal is used, there are several embolisms added to it.

It should go without saying that Holy Thursday is a most appropriate occasion for the distribution of communion under both the bread and the wine, even if this unfortunately might not be the usual custom of the local church.

The Mass of the Lord's Supper concludes with a procession of the eucharistic bread to be reserved for communion on Good Friday. This reservation is to take place in "a chapel suitably decorated for the occasion," i.e., not in the main section of the church building. Care should be taken to involve the people themselves in the procession and not to forget that they themselves have just participated in the body and blood of Christ. A procession that involved the ministers alone might give the impression that immediately after communion one needed to look exclusively to the eucharistic species to find the presence of Christ. St. Thomas Aquinas' hymn "Pange lingua" is employed during the procession. The last two verses ("Tantum ergo . . .") are sung after the procession has reached the chapel of reservation. People are invited to pray before the reserved sacrament until midnight.

After the celebration has concluded the altar is stripped and crosses are removed from the church or covered, but no ritual has been provided as had been the case with the reformed Order for Holy Week of 1955.

Reconciliation of Penitents. A third factor in the traditional celebration of Holy Thursday which has no parallel in the liturgical rites today is the formal reconciliation of penitents. A service of reconciliation took place in the medieval Roman church on the morning of Holy Thursday. It enabled those who had undergone formal or canonical penance during Lent to participate fully in the eucharist during the triduum.

A formal reconciliation of those who, for one reason or another, have been alienated from the Roman Catholic church is currently being ritualized in some dioceses on Holy Thursday, often in connection with the Mass of the Lord's Supper. It remains to be seen whether this will become a regular feature of the Roman rite, but it certainly parallels the church's concern with initiation at the paschal vigil.

Good Friday

The solemn celebration of the Lord's passion takes place on the afternoon of Good Friday around three o'clock or at some other time during the day which is convenient for the people. Although the focus of this day's liturgy is clearly on the passion and death of Christ, the tone of the celebration is set by the proclamation of the passion narrative from the gospel of John, which combines the suffering of the Lord with his exaltation. Thus, Good Friday is not a day for "pretending" that the Lord is dead but rather for the joyful (if low-key) remembrance of this death which is life-giving.

The liturgy of Good Friday falls into three parts: Liturgy of the Word, Veneration of the Cross, and Holy Communion. The eucharist is not celebrated on this day. In fact, with the exception of penance and the anointing of the sick, nor are the other sacraments celebrated on Good Friday or Holy Saturday. Good arguments can be made for not scheduling the celebration of penance during the triduum in order to distinguish this solemn period from Lent, which ends with the beginning of the Mass of the Lord's Supper. The more appropriate season for the expression of penance is Lent.

Liturgy of the Word. One of the keys to the liturgy of the word is the silent entrance of the ministers and their prostration before the altar. Contrary to a recent Roman document ("Circular Letter Concerning the Preparation and Celebration of the Easter Feasts," Congregation for Divine Worship, January 1988, no. 65) the reason for this somber entrance is not the grief and sorrow of the church so much as the retention of the earliest form of the Roman eucharistic entrance rite. Hence it is another example, along with not using musical instruments, of retaining the most ancient practices on the most solemn days. The liturgy then begins not with a greeting or invitation but simply with the opening prayer.

The first reading is the fourth Servant Song of the prophet Isaiah (Isa 52:13-53:12). It is the most beautiful and powerful of these poems and culminates the reading of the previous songs during the earlier weekday liturgies. The second reading is taken from the Letter to the Hebrews (Heb 4:14-16; 5:7-9); it deals with Christ the High Priest, who because of his sacrifice has gained us salvation. As we have already mentioned, St. John's triumphant passion narrative follows. A brief homily is recommended.

The liturgy of the word culminates with the common prayers of the church. On this day the text of the ancient solemn prayers of the Roman rite, parts of which go back to the 4th century, is provided in the sacramentary. The prayer takes the form: invitation by the priest, silence, and concluding oration. The diaconal invitations to kneel and rise may be employed. The sacramentary, however, allows considerable latitude both in the form that the prayers take (e.g., adding a sung response by the people) and the posture to be adopted during the prayer. The content of these prayers serves as a model for the comprehensiveness of the general intercessions of the Roman rite: the church, the pope, the clergy and laity, candidates for initiation, unity of Christians, the Jewish people, non-Christians, unbelievers, civil authorities, and all those in need.

Veneration of the Cross. The veneration of the cross follows the solemn prayers. It may be performed in one of two ways: either by gradually uncovering it in the course of a procession from the church door or by carrying the uncovered cross in procession. The chant, "This is the wood of the cross . . .," with its response, is sung three times as the procession stops. Then all venerate the cross either in common or individually.

Several comments are in order. First, the sacramentary is quite explicit that only one cross ought to be used. Second, it consistently uses the term "cross" and not "crucifix." Third, if because the crowds are so huge that individual veneration cannot take place in the course of the service itself, then individual veneration ought to be postponed for all, including the ministers, until after the liturgy is concluded. A number of chants, including the traditional Reproaches and ("Popule meus") and Venantius Fortunatus' 6th-century hymn "Pange lingua, gloriosi," are provided in the sacramentary. In a number of places the Reproaches are no longer used since they run the risk of being misunderstood as anti-semitic. The Trisagion ("Holy is God, Holy and Strong . . ."), has however been adapted in many places for the procession at the veneration. It is a venerable antiphon from the Eastern Christian tradition, probably inserted into the Roman rite in the 6th century when Byzantine influence was strong at Rome. Moreover, in this solemn liturgy it serves as a good sign of the breadth of the Catholic tradition.

Holy Communion. A very simple service of holy communion concludes the solemn liturgy of Good Friday. The reserved sacrament is brought to the altar at the end of the veneration of the cross, the Lord's Prayer with its embolism is said, and the people are invited to communion with the usual invitation. The Roman missal makes no provision for communion under both kinds on this day; this is reasonable since communion under both kinds might give the erroneous impression that the service is a eucharist rather than a kind of "Liturgy of the Presanctified." In fact, participation in communion on Good Friday seems almost an afterthought. Traditionally most Eastern Christians, and for a long time the pope as well, do not receive holy communion on this day. The concluding prayer, and prayer over the people are done with great simplicity. There is no blessing, nor is there a dismissal—perhaps an indication that the liturgies of the triduum form a whole. Begun on Holy Thursday evening they are not concluded until the joyful dismissal of the paschal vigil.

The Paschal Vigil

The great vigil of Easter is by far the most complex and significant liturgy of the liturgical year. One of the oldest of Christian celebrations (from at least the mid-2nd century if not earlier) this vigil is both a solemn celebration of the Lord's resurrection and an expression of the joyful expectation of the final coming of Christ. It is also the most solemn moment for Christian initiation in the liturgical cycle. Although we do not know of any connection between the vigil and initiation in the 1st and 2nd centuries, it is clear that in many Christian churches the paschal vigil was the occasion for initiation in the 3rd century and especially in the 4th from which we possess the great mystagogical sermons of Cyril of Jerusalem, Ambrose of Milan, John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia. At the paschal vigil the newly baptized became as it were walking, breathing icons of the risen Christ, a means for the assembly to focus on the contemporaneity of the Lord's resurrection. Needless to say, churches which do not celebrate solemn initiation at the vigil lose much of the impact of the celebration.

A vigil is by definition a nocturnal celebration. The directions of the Roman missal are quite clear that it should begin after nightfall and end before dawn. Everything possible should be done to emphasize its uniqueness; i.e., not to make it seem like another Saturday evening Mass. Only one vigil is to be celebrated in each liturgical community. In some communities which employ multiple languages the people separate for the liturgy of the word in their own language and then join together for initiation and the eucharist.

The Easter vigil is divided into four parts: the service of light, the service of readings, solemn baptism and confirmation, and the eucharist. We shall consider these aspects of the vigil in order.

Service of Light. The service of light begins in complete darkness preferably at a designated place outside of the church building. In imitation of the ancient frequent practice of the Lucernarium (lamp-lighting) at nightfall, the paschal candle is lit from a new fire. The missal of Paul VI allows considerable latitude with regard to this ritual and explicitly encourages adaptation to the culture of the people and local circumstances.

In any case, the deacon (or in his absence, a priest) leads a procession of the people into the church with the lit paschal candle, stopping three times to intone the formula "Light of Christ," to which is responded "Thanks be to God." The candle is then placed on a stand in the midst of the sanctuary or near the ambo and is honored with incense. The deacon or priest (or, in the absence of either who can sing, a cantor) then, with the people holding their lit candles, intones the Easter Proclamation, a venerable text which has come down from the 7th century at the latest. Now known from its opening as the "Exsultet," it is only one of the beautiful sung Easter proclamations that we possess from the Western liturgical tradition. The current missal offers both long and short forms of this richly symbolic hymn in honor of Christ, the Light of the World. This proclamation in itself contains an elaborate and powerful theology of our redemption in Christ and is worthy of study and meditation.

Liturgy of the Word. A rich feast of seven readings from the Hebrew Scriptures constitutes the second part of the paschal vigil. Each reading is followed by a (sung) responsorial psalm and a prayer. The missal of Paul VI directs that the number of readings may be reduced for pastoral reasons, but at least two readings (one of which must be Exodus 14) are to be read. The paschal vigil, however, is no time for minimalism in the liturgy. True, when poorly done, the readings can be tedious, but the proclamation of God's word to the people of Israel and to the church, its spiritual heir, can be done with reverence and power. The long vigil of readings underlines our expectation of the coming of the Lord and the immediate and reverential preparation of the candidates for their sacramental initiation. It takes place, both literally and metaphorically in the light of Christ.

The readings are as follows: 1. Genesis 1-2 (Creation); 2. Genesis 22 (The sacrifice of Abraham); 3. Exodus 14 (The passage through the Red Sea); 4. Isaiah 54 (A vision of the New Jerusalem); 5. Isaiah 55 (The free offer of salvation); 6. Baruch 3 (Wisdom and the commandments of life); 7. Ezekiel 36 (New heart and new spirit).

The choice and number of readings from the Hebrew Scriptures have varied throughout the centuries. The earliest list we possess, from Jerusalem in the 5th century, contains twelve readings always ending with the Cantic of the Three Children. There, as Talley has shown (Origins of the Liturgical Year, 47-54), the selection of readings may well have been structured on the pattern of the Jewish "Poem of the Four Nights": the night of Creation, the night of Abraham's sacrifice (the Akedah), the night of liberation from bondage, and the night of final redemption. In some churches, for example, Constantinople which had a series of fifteen readings, the readings coincided with the baptisms which were taking place privately (of necessity because of the nudity of the candidates) in the baptistery nearby.

The joyful singing of the Gloria follows

the last of the readings from Hebrew Scripture and the liturgy of the word proceeds, as at a normal eucharist, with the proclamation of Paul's baptismal theology in Romans 6 and one of the synoptic resurrection narratives, according to the liturgical cycle. The traditional solemn three-fold Alleluia sung by the presider serves as the gospel acclamation. A homily concludes the liturgy of the word.

The missal of Paul VI has transformed the structure of the paschal vigil as it was revived under Pius XII in 1952. In the earlier revision, the vigil service as a whole, including baptism, preceded the liturgy of the eucharist. The former structure had the advantage of emphasizing the vigil aspect of the first part of this liturgy. The current rite has been somewhat smoothed-out or "rationalized" such that it is possible to get the impression of a eucharist with a somewhat longer liturgy of the word. All the more reason, then, for the readings from the Hebrew scripture to be done in full and with great care.

Liturgy of Baptism. At the paschal vigil the liturgy of baptism consists of an invitation, litany of the saints, blessing of the baptismal water (which now may be performed even when there are no candidates for baptism as long as the church is one in which baptisms normally occur), renunciation and profession of faith, baptism proper, clothing with a white garment, giving of the light of Christ, and confirmation. Then all of the people are invited to renew their baptismal promises in solidarity with the newly baptized.

In some churches the peace is exchanged both with the newly baptized and throughout the assembly at the end of the sprinkling rite which follows the renewal of baptismal promises. This seems a fitting time for the congregation to greet its new members as well as serving as a kind of breather in the long liturgy of this night. Many churches also make provisions for baptism by immersion at the vigil, even when they do not have permanent fonts for baptism by immersion. As we have noted above, the paschal vigil is no time for sacramental minimalism.

Liturgy of the Eucharist. The liturgy of the eucharist proceeds as usual with the following notes: it is appropriate for the newly baptized to bring the gifts forward at the preparation rite; two formulas specifically referring to the newly baptized are added to Eucharistic Prayer I; and the liturgy is concluded with a special dismissal. In addition, it is appropriate to highlight the first communion of the newly baptized since, after all, participation in communion is the high point and culmination of their sacramental initiation.

Conclusion

The most notable feature of the liturgies of Holy Week is its processional character. At no other time in the liturgical year do we note so much movement within the liturgical rites. In part this is due to the retention of so many traditional features in these solemn liturgies, features which hearken back to a time when the Roman liturgy with its stationary character contained so much movement from place to place and within the church building itself. Understanding the various processional movements at each of the four major Holy Week celebrations is the key to choreographing an experience of worship that corresponds to the most genuine liturgical piety and serves as a reminder of the dynamic character of Christian faith.

HOMILY

Popular dictionaries give a wide range of definitions for the word "homily." For some it is a biblical sermon; for others, a doctrinal talk. Some say its aim is to edify a congregation; others give as its purpose moral instruction. Even among the Christian churches there is diversity of use. Many Protestant homileticians still prefer the word "sermon," even when they refer to preaching that occurs within the liturgy. When they do use the word "homily," they describe it as a "walking through the text, step by step." Roman Catholics, on the other hand, now widely use "homily" for the renewed form of preaching ushered in by the liturgical reforms of Vatican II; it is that form of preaching which flows from and immediately follows the scriptural readings of the liturgy and which leads to the celebration of the sacraments. In current Roman Catholic parlance, "homily" is distinguished from "sermon" where the latter names a form of preaching that is not necessarily connected to the biblical readings and is heard outside the context of the liturgy.

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy restored the biblical form of preaching which had been an integral part of the liturgy of the primitive church (see Justin's Apology, 67). While conciliar documents acknowledged the importance of other forms of preaching, e.g., pastoral preaching, catechetics and other forms of Christian instruction, the council gave the liturgical homily "pride of place" (D.V., 24). The homily was defined by distinction, i.e., by distinguishing it from other forms of preaching.

It was Origen (185-253) who first distinguished between logos or sermo and homilia or tractatus. Logos followed the shape of classical rhetoric, while the form of homilia was direct and free. Homilia was a popular exposition and application of scripture.

Just as Origen made a distinction between logos and homilia, the reformers of Vatican II wanted to distinguish the homily from the popular form of preaching of the day, the sermon. While the sermon often relied on biblical texts, especially to prove a doctrinal point, it was not rooted in the scriptural readings of the day. Before the council, church documents and liturgical authors sometimes described the sermon as an "enhancement" or a "secondary interruption" of the liturgy. This is in marked contrast with the post-conciliar church where the homily is seen to flow from "the sacred text" and is "highly esteemed as part of the liturgy itself" (S.C., 52).

While the homily was given "pride of place," no single definition located in conciliar and post-conciliar documents adequately describes the emerging meaning of this form of preaching for our times. Just as there is a wide range of meaning of "homily" in the popular dictionaries, so there is a wide range of meaning in church documents and liturgical literature. Since no definition of a word is final, we must look at the way in which words are used in spite of their limitations. What follows is an exploration of the rich landscape of the use of the word "homily" and the contemporary developments of that exploration.

The Distinctive Characteristics

Four characteristics of preaching were restored from the ancient tradition by Vatican II in order to distinguish this renewed form of preaching, the homily, from other forms. Homiletic preaching is (a) biblical, (b) liturgical, (c) kerygmatic, and (d) familiar.

A. Biblical

The tradition of an exposition of biblical readings is found in the synagogue practice (Lk 4:16 ff; Acts 13:14 ff). It was a tradition of interpreting and applying the scriptural message to the contemporary situation. This hermeneutical practice included midrash halakah which interpreted the fundamental principles of the Torah, and midrash haggadah which commented on the rest of scripture through imaginative instruction and exhortation. Jesus' homily on the book of Isaiah in the synagogue of Nazareth signals the prophetic nature of the scriptural exposition: "Today this Scripture passage is fulfilled in your hearing" (Lk 4:21).

This prophetic exposition of scripture was continued in the liturgical preaching of the early Christian churches. Justin's description of a 2nd-century liturgy includes preaching that is more than an exegesis of the sacred texts: "... and the memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets are read, as long as there is time. Then, when the reader has finished, the president of the assembly verbally admonishes and invites all to imitate such examples of virtue" (I Apology, 67). The first and foremost of all Christian homilists was Origen who strove through allegorical exegesis to adapt the scripture to all levels of his congregation through "spiritual understandings" (Hom. Lev., 1.4).

The Peace of Constantine (313) brought a new set of circumstances to the church which affected the character of preaching: the increased number of catechumens; the theological debates of the day; the birth of new liturgical seasons and feast days of saints and martyrs; the appointment of bishops like Augustine who were schooled in the art of rhetoric. These circumstances gave rise to catechetical, mystagogical, thematic, and rhetorical features which affected the popular exposition of biblical texts. For example, scripture readings were chosen to fit the feast and, therefore, the preacher had the new task of opening up the readings in light of the feast. Nevertheless, from Origen to St. Bernard (12th century), the homily remained a popular exposition of scripture read or sung in the liturgical assembly.

In medieval times, the homily became a speech independent of the liturgy and thus of the sacred text read or sung in the liturgy. The pulpit became a platform for theological debate, denunciations of heresies, and devotional, moralistic tales from the lives of the saints. Medieval preachers often employed biblical citations but, for the most part, the tradition of applying the biblical readings to the liturgical assembly was lost.

The ancient tradition of preaching from scripture was not revived by the Council of Trent. The Catechism of the Council of Trent provided preachers with a guide for doctrinal instruction. The preaching that prevailed during the time immediately before Vatican II was often based on outlines of doctrinal topics with little or no reference to the biblical texts of the liturgy.

The influence of "the biblical movement," however, is clearly found throughout the documents of Vatican II. The council insisted that "all the preaching of the Church must be nourished and ruled by Sacred Scripture" (D.V., 21). Preaching was to "draw its content mainly from scriptural and liturgical sources" (S.C., 35) and the homily was described as flowing "from the sacred text" (S.C., 52). In an instruction which implemented the council's liturgical reforms, a definition of the "sacred text" was given: "an explanation either of certain aspects of the readings from the Sacred Scriptures or of some other text from the ordinary or proper of the day taking into account, however, peculiar needs of the congregation" (I.O., 54). Thus, the reformers of Vatican II returned to the ancient tradition of preaching which flowed directly from the biblical readings proclaimed in the liturgy and led to the celebration of the sacraments.

B. Liturgical

Justin's description of a mid-2nd-century liturgy reveals how the homily acted as a unifying force. It expounded the scriptures and led to an active participation in the eucharist. Ancient Christian homilies contained what some authors name the mystagogical feature of preaching. The homily invited the congregation to the mysteries of Christ celebrated at the eucharist. For Origen, preaching made the Word flesh again in the liturgical assembly.

The homily eventually became cut off from the liturgical action which it once developed and explained. Preaching became an independent and autonomous event which had no relation to worship. The celebration of Masses without a congregation encouraged the elimination of the homily from the rite. The medieval revivals of preaching, such as the ones brought about by the friars, were concerned with sermons delivered outside of the liturgy. The independence of preaching from the celebration of the eucharist is reflected in church architecture where the pulpit came into prominence outside the sanctuary.

In the early 1960s, some liturgists were still referring to preaching as a "secondary interruption" of the Mass. Ordination of bishops, religious professions, the blessing of spouses at marriage that took place within the Mass, were called "primary interruptions." Some authors declared that the sermon was accidental to the Mass. Moralists stressed that one's obligation to "attend Mass" began after the liturgy of the word. Such terminology revealed a loss of appreciation of the liturgical dimensions of preaching.

The sacramental theology of revelation proposed by K. Rahner, O. Semmelroth, Y. Congar, E. Schillebeeckx, et al., provided Vatican II with a renewed understanding of the relation between the liturgy of the word and the eucharist. For these theologians, the sacraments were inconceivable without preaching. They stressed preaching as a proclamation of the saving events celebrated at the table of the Lord. The council, therefore, sought to restore "the intimate connection between rites and words" in the liturgy and declared that the homily was "to be highly esteemed as part of the liturgy itself" (S.C., 35, 52).

C. Kerygmatic

The word most frequently used for preaching in the NT is keryssein, "to proclaim." The preacher is like the herald (keryx) who returns from the battle to proclaim a glorious message (kerygma) to a people waiting in anticipation. The herald proclaims, in the name of the king, the good news that, "We have won! The victory is ours!" The herald metaphor connotes preaching that is beyond the words of a mere human messenger. These are the saving words of God spoken through the herald. It is not the preacher but Christ the Lord who is preached (2 Cor 4:5). Proclamation is not about a teaching but an event. Proclamation is not about doctrines defended but saving acts boldly announced. The primary focus of proclamation is not the future but the present reality. This kind of preaching does not depend upon the persuasive words of rhetoric but upon the demonstration of spirit and power (1 Cor 2:4). Kerygmatic preaching compels those who hear it with the necessity of a response. Such preaching is found in the apostolic preaching of Acts (e.g., 2:14-40; 3:12-26; 10:28-43).

Vatican II insisted that a kerygmatic character permeate the homily. It emphasized "the proclamation of God's wonderful works in the history of salvation, which is the mystery of Christ ever made present and active in us, especially in the celebration of the liturgy" (S.C., 35). Kerygmatic preaching received its original impetus from liturgical scholars such as Joseph A. Jungmann in the late 1930s. Kerygmatic preaching captured the spirit of the preaching of the apostles who proclaimed the good news of Jesus, through whom God has acted and continues to act in our lives. Once again, the council distinguished this form of preaching, which proclaims the wonderful things God has done and is doing for people, from preaching that is a list of do's and don'ts that we must follow in order to win God's favor.

D. Familiar Conversation

The word "homily" is derived from the Greek homou (together) and homilos (a crowd). The word connotes a familiar conversation with a group of people or a pastor conversing with a flock in words and images that they recognize. The crowd is not some haphazard mob of strangers but a gathering of friends, people familiar to the preacher. It is not a conversation of imposition nor of persuasion but, rather cor ad cor loquitur (Newman's motto adopted from Augustine for his coat of arms as Cardinal).

The word is used to describe the conversation that the two disciples engaged in as they were on their way to Emmaus "discussing (homiloun) as they went all that had happened" (Lk 24:14). In the present form, the story of Emmaus reflects the pattern of early Christian worship. Before the risen Lord proclaims the good news, he listens and enters into their story of distress and lost hope. His interpretation of the things that went on in Jerusalem "these past days" is different from their own. The preacher sheds light on their story and makes their hearts burn. The preacher does not force his preaching upon his listeners. He awaits their invitation to "stay with us." The story is literally framed by the theme of recognition which happens in the preaching and at the table. Here word and sacrament are recognized as integral parts of a single coming of Christ to people. The familiar conversation on the road to Emmaus reminds us that preaching is more than information, it is interpretation that leads to recognition of the good news. The purpose of preaching is faith (1 Cor 2:4).

Origen used the word "homily" to describe the familiar style in which he preached. His style was direct and free, in sharp contrast to the Second Sophistic of his day. Origen's homilies manifest a structure of exordium, mystical exegesis of scripture, practical application, and final exhortation, but the tone set is one of familiar conversation rather than the rhetorical elaboration of his contemporaries.

The art of rhetoric came into the pulpit with Augustine who was a former rhetor. Augustine presented a new homiletic style by borrowing from the rhetorical canons of to teach, to please, and to persuade. He deplored poorly fashioned homilies and encouraged preachers to learn from the persuasive rhetoric of his day (De Doctrina Christiana, 4).

While there are traces of familiar conversation throughout the history of Christian preaching, there also exists a firm tradition of a preaching style that more closely resembles a lawyer's brief. It is a style that is deductive and sets out to prove or persuade by arguments and points. Scripture is not opened up for meaning but used as proofs for the preacher's teachings.

The documents of Vatican II offered no models for a new preaching style but hinted that the homily was to be preached as a familiar conversation. The Decree On the Ministry And Life Of Priests (4) states that if today's preaching is to be effective, it "must expound the Word of God not merely in a general and abstract way but by an application of the eternal truth of the Gospel to the concrete circumstances of life." The earliest instruction (1964) on the implementation of S.C. speaks of the homily as attending to "the peculiar needs of the congregation" (I.O., 54).

Developing Trends

The word "homily" continues to develop in meaning. The four characteristics given above: biblical, liturgical, kerygmatic, and familiar, still help to define the word, but must be further nuanced in light of liturgical praxis and cultural shifts.

A. Biblical

Coinciding with the renewal of biblical preaching at the time of Vatican II, was the publication of new biblical commentaries that seemed a blessing to those preachers who were now supposed to base their homilies on the sacred texts. The dominant method of biblical interpretation in the new commentaries was the historical-critical. Indeed, the council officially blessed this method when it insisted that the interpreter of scripture "should carefully search out the meaning which the sacred writers really had in mind" (D.V., 12). A popular homiletic method that followed the council concentrated on applying the insights of a historical-critical study of the sacred texts "to the concrete circumstances of life" (P.O., 4).

The historical-critical method still provides necessary and helpful parameters in which the preacher can move and construct a convincing homiletic. However, preachers are discovering other biblical methods of interpretation, e.g., literary, feminist, sociological, canonical, and liberation criticism, which offer new possibilities for homiletic method.

Recent literature on the homily emphasizes not so much an interpretation of scripture, followed by an application to life, but an interpretation of life in light of the sacred texts. The N.C.C.B.'s 1982 document, Fulfilled in Your Hearing: The Homily in the Sunday Assembly, speaks of "a scriptural interpretation of human existence which enables a community to recognize God's active presence" (F.I.Y.H., 29). In the homily, "the preacher does not so much attempt to explain the scriptures as to interpret the human situation through the Scriptures" (F.I.Y.H., 20). This document advances the definitions of homily found in S.C. It incorporates the "reading of the signs of the times" motif from the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World. This new shift, from an interpretation of scripture with an application to life, to an interpretation of the human situation through scripture, echoes contemporary Christology with the mystery of the word "from below" rather than "from above." The new shift also helps us to name grace not only in the liturgy, but in our world of limitations.

B. Liturgical

Vatican II insisted that since the homily was "highly esteemed as part of the liturgy itself . . . at those Masses which are celebrated on Sundays and holidays of obligation, with the people assisting, it should not be omitted except for a serious reason" (S.C., 52). That rule now seems strange in light of current liturgical praxis where the homily has become an expected part of the liturgy, and not just for those specific times mentioned in the rule. The liturgical homily has achieved its esteemed place in all liturgies. "The homily has a place and must not be neglected in the celebration of all the sacraments, at paraliturgies, and in assemblies of the faithful. It will in every case be a privileged moment for preaching the word of the Lord" (E.N., 43).

Despite the return of the homily to its central place in the liturgy, however, there are still relics of pre-Vatican II liturgical practices. Making the sign of the cross before and after the homily is a remnant from times past when the sermon was an "interruption" in the liturgy and, therefore, needed pious parentheses. Lengthy "meditations" after the homily obscure the homily's function as preaching on the sacred texts which leads to the celebration of eucharist. In paying attention to the fact that the homily should lead to thanksgiving and praise, some preachers tack on a "let us, as we go to the eucharist" ending. Such conclusions are predictable at best. They do not substitute for a homily whose entire tone leads the assembly to celebrate the liturgy "more deeply and more fully—more faithfully—and thus be formed for Christian witness in the world" (F.I.Y.H., 18).

C. Kerygmatic

Although the term "kerygmatic" is not as fashionable as it was during the time of Vatican II, it nevertheless offers a significant bench mark for defining the character that should permeate a homily. The herald image reminds us that the preacher is a minister of the church who preaches from the Bible as the church's book. The herald image challenges the preacher who is narcissistic and ignorant of the church's tradition.

Besides the image of the herald, there exists the image of the witness in early Christian preaching (Acts 20:24). Homiletic literature since Vatican II speaks of the homilist as a witness whose own story of a "wounded healer" might appropriately serve to convey the good news. In a social analysis of contemporary communication style, Paul VI declared, "Modern man (sic) listens more willing to witnesses than to teachers, and if he does listen to preachers, it is because they are witnesses" (A.A.S., 66, 1974, 568).

In the NT, "proclamation" is sometimes joined with "teaching" (Mt 4:23; 9:35; 11:1; Acts 28:31). Teaching is the preaching that naturally follows the proclamation of the gospel. There was lively debate during the writing of The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy concerning the kerygmatic and catechetical nature of the homily. Some were concerned that in emphasizing the kerygmatic nature of the homily, the teaching element of preaching would be sacrificed. Hence, there exists an ambivalence even within the document. In par. 35, the word "sermon" is used, but it is defined more like our contemporary use of the word "homily" since it names it as a "proclamation." In par. 52, the word "homily" is used, but it is defined more like our contemporary use of the word "sermon" since it is defined as the preaching where "the mysteries of faith and the guiding principles of Christian life are expounded from the sacred text during the course of the liturgical year." The Code of Canon Law (1983) locates homily in the "Book on the Teaching Office of the Church" and draws upon par. 52 to supply a definition.

In recent years, there has been a call, in some corners, to highlight the catechetical nature of the liturgical homily. Some have argued for a return to outlines, based on the lectionary readings, which would ensure a systematic presentation of the teachings of the church. But the homily does not "primarily concern itself with a systematic theological understanding of the faith. The liturgical gathering is not primarily an educational assembly (F.I.Y.H., 17-18). While the homily is not primarily a catechetical instruction, Paul VI declared that it can certainly be a means of catechesis for Christian communities, (E.N., 43, 44). There is need for educational opportunities in and through which people can reflect more deeply on the meaning of their faith and the teaching of the church. In the early church this systematic presentation of the mysteries of the faith was given to the newly baptized in the post-baptismal preaching known as mystagogy.

D. Familiar Conversation

The homilist today is defined as a "mediator of meaning" (F.I.Y.H., 7). This phrase is in concert with the familiar manner of preaching that marks the homily. "The preacher represents this community voicing its concerns, by naming its demons, and thus enabling it to gain some understanding and control of the evil which afflicts it. He represents the Lord by offering the community another word, a word of healing and pardon, of acceptance and love" (F.I.Y.H., 7). The primary task of the homilist, therefore, is not to explain but to interpret. As "mediator of meaning," the homilist seeks to attend to the present moment as revelatory of God. Past events and future possibilities are seen in light of present theophanies.

Although Vatican II hinted at the homily as familiar conversation, it offered no new models for the shape of the homily. Post-conciliar documents in generic ways stress that the homily should be preached "in a way that is suited to the community's capacity and way of life and that is relevant to the circumstances of the celebration" (E.P., April 27, 1973, 15); "it (the homily) should be neither too long nor too short" (C.T., October 16, 1979, 48).

Current homileticians stress the importance of creating homilies in word and images that the assembly will recognize. In the present homiletic literature, one traditional form, the deductive (introduction, three "points" and an exhortation) is challenged as not appropriate to a familiar mode of preaching and not effective in a media-bombarded society. Other forms, such as inductive and narrative, are suggested as effective alternatives to a didactic style. These forms, rather than other forms of rhetorical discourse, seem more appropriate to serving the function of the homily as enabling God's people to recognize a living word of meaning in the eucharist and in the "concrete circumstances of their lives."

HOSPITALITY

Hospitality is defined as "the art or practice of being hospitable; the reception and entertainment of guests, visitors or strangers with liberality and good will" (Oxford English Dictionary). It is related to hospital, host, hostel, hotel, and, finally, hot.

The term has gained liturgical currency in the reforms of Vatican II, particularly in the council's stress on "full and active participation of all the faithful" (S.C., 14). It is not, however, without biblical warrant. Paul writes to the Christians at Rome: "Contribute to the needs of the saints, practice hospitality. . . . Rejoice with those who rejoice, weep with those who weep. Live in harmony with one another. . . . 'If your enemy is hungry, feed him; if he is thirsty, give him drink; for by doing so you will heap burning coals upon his head'" (Rom 12:13-21).

Hospitality, which is a dominant element contributing to the climate of group experience, influences architectural and environmental form. An intangible ingredient affecting how people act in groups, hospitality calls from deep within an individual a sense of identity and a feeling of being "at home." Although hospitality may take many forms, that which Paul recommends to the Christians at Rome is one of gracious, almost embarrassing, generosity.

To convey the importance of hospitality, one might call upon Raymond Panikkar's definition of freedom: "not simply the power of option, but the power of creating possibilities" (Myth, Faith and Hermeneutics, p. 209). In worship, hospitality allows the participants to be at one in freedom with what is expected of them.

Although it originates in attitudes of people, hospitality is also projected by the design of a place. Church architecture might have developed simply in function of geographical climate. In fact, however, the "climate of life" shared by Christians at various times and places is far more determinative of church architectural style. The strongest architectural statements emerge when the communal climate is assumed or well understood. This communal climate, as it affects and influences liturgical worship, is largely a function of the sacramental theology that is in vogue. As culture, theology, scriptural focus and the interpretation of history change, the ritual form and its required environment likewise change.

We consider here four forms of hospitality: (a) domestic, (b) monarchical, (c) hierarchical, and (d) relational or circular. We conclude with some focus on hospitality in light of Vatican II.

Domestic Hospitality

The earliest known architectural environment designated for Christian communal ritual is the Roman house church found at Dura-Europos. This was used during the first half of the 3rd century.

The only fixed architectural space for sacrament in this environment was the area for the baptismal bath. Richly decorated, this was located deep within the interior rooms. The font is scaled for adult baptism, for the room is small and private. Its location within the floor plan indicates that the ritual it served was not conducted in the midst of the gathering. Its spatial proportions imply that only a few could have attended the actual baptism. The available evidence suggests a climate of privacy, secrecy and protectiveness, qualities for which a domestic hospitality associated with a house would have been appropriate.

Except for the baptistry, the rooms of the house church do not contain fixed furnishings such as altar, seats or stone benches. Therefore their use in regard to the word and the eucharist can only be speculated.

The family-oriented architectural form of this early Christian ritual site contrasts with that of temple buildings which offered a more public kind of hospitality. Public, however, does not mean simply "a public building." Andre Grabar (Early Christian Art) observes a similarity between the decoration in the house church and that in the synagogue in the same community and suggests from this that the Christians and Jews were in close communication with each other. The fact that the synagogue at Dura was a public building indicates that its ritual use was acceptable to civil authority. The users of the Christian space apparently felt that their worship would not be welcomed in a public structure. Environmentally, however, both were shaped by the domestic form.

Monarchical Hospitality

The climate and style of Christian ritual hospitality changed when Christian beliefs were adopted by Constantine and successive monarchs. Architecturally, this shift was reflected in the use of the basilica form. Apparently, the monarchs recognized that architecture would strengthen their endorsement of Christianity. According to Grabar, the specifications for the basilica form were neither derived from previous Christian experience nor prescribed by Constantine. Rather, the form was accepted by architects to serve the need for a structure whose importance was befitting monarchical patrons.

Although the basilica is a monumental structure, its emphasis on interior space distinguished it from classical temples with their stress on external form. The basilica's fixed presbytery seating in the apse presents a strong, authoritative statement that serves monarchical hospitality and clerical authority.

Constantine called the early church councils to define doctrinal orthodoxy. In this climate of monarchical control, the role of the ritual leader included assuring the faithful that they could depend on and trust authority.

Spiro Kostof (A History of Architecture) cites a description of an early ritual as it took place in a setting designed to serve a climate of monarchical hospitality. In such a building, the appropriate iconography for the major wall was the image of Christ enthroned in a seat of judgment. Great domed spaces, designed to inspire awe, are organic to this style of hospitality.

Hierarchical Hospitality

Prior to Vatican II, Roman Catholic ritual environments served a specific sacramental theology which was coded by rubrics and a climate of what might be called parochial or hierarchical hospitality. The interior spaces in churches, as well as the furniture and liturgical objects conformed to well-defined standards. For example, the communion rail separated the ordained from the non-ordained. The aula seating pattern, with parallel rows of pews screwed down to the floor, kept the laity lined up like a platoon. This is a pattern that discouraged communication among the laity themselves. In such spaces the meaning of the term hierarchical is clear. One is obliged to be in the presence of the ordained who prays for and on behalf of those who are present.

Hierarchical refers to a body of priests or ecclesiastical leaders. It can itself vary in specific tonality. It is clear that the post-Vatican II church continues a focus on the liturgical assembly as hierarchical: "The celebration of the Mass (is) an action of Christ and the people of God hierarchically ordered . . ." (General Instruction of the Roman Missal, chap. 1, 1). The role of the priest in the assembly is to represent this gathering Christ. The proper sense of the term hierarchical, however, as it is used in contemporary sacramental theology, needs to be clearly understood not only to ritualize it, but also to give it proper architectural form. It could revert to the monarchical (Christ the King). It could also, however, refer to quite different understandings of the gathering Christ, such as host (Christ of the eucharistic table) or servant (Christ washing feet). In the post-Vatican II church, even where the term hierarchical continues to be used, more welcoming images of the Christ who gathers begin to surface.

Relational or Circular Hospitality

Susanne Langer (Feeling and Form) proposed that the "magic circular dance," in which participants faced each other, was the beginning of defined architectural space. The circular pattern reflects a form of hospitality in which all present are of equal importance. The format is that of the dining room table, which supports family rituals. It is the format for entrepreneurial decision-making groups in which everyone's input is valued. The circular pattern matches the context of the invitation to sacrament in the documents of Vatican II, where the "full and active participation by all the people is the aim to be considered before all else" (S.C., 14). The ordained are to draw those present into the prayer of the church, and thus appear to be praying with the people, and not only on their behalf.

Interestingly enough, the council hall itself arranged the bishops in a relational, if not quite circular, form. Photographs of the Vatican II meetings showed two seas of white mitres facing each other in grandstands. This pattern of seating serves to support communal presence, in this case, of the hierarchy to each other.

This shift toward the relational and the inclusive does mark a definite shift from earlier architectural environments, whether Romanesque, Gothic or Renaissance, where the liturgical action of the ordained was clearly separated from that of the laity. In these earlier forms, ritual involvement occurred on two distinct levels, that of the enactor and that of the spectator. The latter was drawn into the former, though frequently only indirectly. In the Gothic form, for example, with its enclosed divided choir, the sound of chant, flowing in one-note-at-a-time mathematical rhythms, flowed beyond the screens to touch those outside with an awesome sense of the sacred. These outsiders, however, were not directly involved in the chanting. In the post-Vatican II liturgy there are no "outsiders," and all are invited to enter the liturgical action on the same level.

Hospitality in Light of Vatican II

In their document, Environment and Art in Catholic Worship, the American bishops gave strong notice to the importance of hospitality in worship. "As common prayer and ecclesial experience, liturgy flourishes in a climate of hospitality: a situation in which people are comfortable with one another, either knowing or being introduced to one another; a space in which people are seated together, with mobility, in view of one another as well as the focal points of the rite, involved as participants and not as spectators" (11). Later, in the same document, they speak of "the gathering of the faith community in a participatory and hospitable atmosphere for word and eucharist, for initiation and reconciliation, for prayer and praise and song" (40).

This open style of hospitality was emphasized by inclusion of the sense of touch in ritual, e.g., in approved practices of lay distribution of the eucharist, communion in the hand, receiving from a common cup and offering the sign of peace. It also shows itself in a much greater openness to such things as reception of the eucharist at ecumenical weddings, absolution in communal reconciliation, and the inclusion of both women and men in a variety of liturgical functions. In this regard, the note on hospitality offered by Levi-Strauss (The Origin of Table Manners) is most descriptive: hospitality determines how table manners will be acted out in ritual.

It must be said, however, that since the publication of Environment and Art in Catholic Worship, some of the openness and invitational generosity has been edited out, whether because of the comfort of old habit or reversal by authority.

What is clear is that in the contemporary church, those forms of hospitality which welcome all into the ritual space are those most appreciated and responded to. In a world where there is an abundance of loneliness, alienation and broken relationships, as well as a general distrust of authority, environments that are monarchical or separatist fail to touch the human spirit effectively. In a culture where people prefer having things done with them, rather than for them, there is need for ritual and ritual space that exudes this inclusive and welcoming hospitality. Such hospitality need not exclude a hierarchical perspective. People can be moved by generosity and inspired by dedicated spiritual leaders. It must, however, be an open hospitality where all, strangers included, are welcome.

To envision such a form of public hospitality in relation to present day needs is for ritual and ritual space to respond to Jungman's prophetic plea (The Good News Yesterday and Today, p. 178), for "not so much a better method as a better understanding and a more relevant presentation of the very core and substance of the Christian message."

HOURS, LITURGY OF THE

History

Communal prayer was a chief activity of the church in its earliest days (Acts 1:14; 2:42; 4:24; 12:5, 12). This prayer developed structured forms for daily celebration throughout the universal church in both parochial and monastic settings by the 4th century, and gradually, especially in the West, became a monastic and clerical preserve for which laity largely substituted popular devotions. The liturgical reform following the Second Vatican Council included a reform in the Roman rite of the Divine Office (a term by which liturgy of the hours was more frequently designated before the council). The intention of the reformers was to restore at least the chief hours, morning prayer and evening prayer, to popular participation. This restoration remains generally unrealized, but a thorough examination of salient aspects of the long and complex history of the hours would reveal not only the tenaciousness of prayer in common within the church (and thus the possibility for renewal of and popular participation in forms of liturgy of the hours) but also shifts in ecclesial consciousness, sacramental practice, and societal perspectives which today militate against ecclesial prayer (and thus the great difficulty of restoration and renewal of the liturgy of the hours on the popular level). No more than a cursory glance at that history is possible here.

Jewish Precedents. Claims have been made for direct continuity between primitive Christian communal prayer and Jewish synagogal and temple practice, but the evidence for such is not universally definitive. Several systems of daily prayer were prevalent in Palestinian and Egyptian Judaism at the time of the NT. Not only was the Shema (Deut 6:4-9; 11:13-21; Num 15:37-41) recited twice daily, morning and evening, with accompanying benedictions or prayers of thanksgiving, but tefillah or benedictions were prayed three times daily. The tefillah for the morning and for the evening were eventually combined with the recitations of the Shema both in private and in synagogue services. Perhaps the morning and evening tefillah were meant to correspond to the morning and evening sacrifices in the temple, but it can be said at least that the morning and evening hours both in and outside of Jerusalem became the principal times in a day for communal and for private prayer.

The Prayer of Jesus. Not only was Jesus given to praying privately (e.g., Mk 7:34; Lk 3:21-22; 6:12; 9:28-29), but, "as was his custom," he engaged regularly in the communal prayer of the synagogue (Lk 4:16). He prayed the customary blessings over food and drink (Mt 14:19; 15:36; 26:26; Lk 24:30) and publicly uttered praise, thanks, and petition to God, his abba, at significant moments in his life (e.g., Mt 19:13; 26:26; Mk 14:36; Lk 10:21-22; Jn 17:1-26). To his disciples he commanded prayer (e.g., Mt 5:44; Mk 13:33; Lk 6:28), but did not leave them without a model for fulfilling that command (Mt 6:9-13; Lk 11:2-4). The author of the Letter to the Hebrews understood prayer as a central component of the life of Jesus (Heb 5:7) and of the existence of the glorified Christ (Heb 7:25).

The Prayer of the Early Church. According to the NT constant and daily prayer was characteristic of the earliest Christians (Acts 2:46; 1 Thess 1:2) whether they were alone (Acts 20:36-38; 21:5) or gathered together at home (Acts 2:46), in the synagogue (Acts 13:14-15), or in the temple (Acts 3:1). Like the Jews, at least some Christians prayed at set times of the day (Didache 8:2-3; 1 Clem 40:1-4) although the structure and form of their prayer differed more or less from that of their Jewish neighbors. Exhortations, however, to "pray without ceasing" (1 Thess 5:16-18; Eph 6:18; Lk 18:1) provided not only the basis for some caution regarding prayer at fixed times (Clement of Alexandria, Stromata VII, 7, 40:3) but also for the development of such prayer in what became the liturgy of the hours precisely in order to foster ceaseless prayer. Some sources of the 3rd century (Origen, On Prayer 12:2; 32 and Clement of Alexandria, Stromata VII, 7, 40:3; 49:3-4; Pedagogue 2:9-10) suggest that a pattern of prayer at morning, noon, evening, and night may have prevailed in Egypt. North African sources of the same century (Tertullian, On Prayer 25 and Cyprian, On the Lord's Prayer 14-36) as well as The Apostolic Tradition, presumably of Roman provenance (ca. 215), all witness to a pattern which will become the standard cursus in the 4th century; prayer on rising; at the third, sixth, and ninth hours; at the time of retiring; during the night. Tertullian regarded prayer in the morning and in the evening as orationes legitimae, thus suggesting their major importance, and Cyprian indicated that morning prayer commemorated the Lord's resurrection while evening prayer looked to his eschatological coming. Scattered references to the content of the prayers of this period reveal that biblical psalms and canticles as well as some non-scriptural hymns were used. Both Tertullian (Apolo- gy 39:18) and the author of The Apostolic Tradition (41) knew a ritual surrounding the lighting of the evening lamps (precursor of the later lucernarium) symbolizing Christ, the Light of the World. The practice of orientation in prayer, to which Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Tertullian witness, suggests that the rising sun, too, symbolized the risen Christ expected to come again. Both morning and evening prayer times for at least some Christian communities, then, evoked the mystery of Jesus' passover from death to life. To the other hours of prayer were given various significations. The third, sixth, and ninth hours recalled events of the passion according to Mark (The Apostolic Tradition) or events in the apostolic church recounted in Acts (Tertullian and Cyprian). Prayer at night fostered vigilance for the coming of Christ (Clement of Alexandria and The Apostolic Tradition).

The Cathedral Office. The Peace of Constantine in the 4th century allowed for the development of structured communal prayer in local churches throughout the Mediterranean area. Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea in Palestine in the early part of that century, noted that throughout the Christian world, morning and evening prayer were celebrated publicly and daily (Commentary on Ps 64). He alluded to the widespread use of Psalm 62 (63) at morning prayer and of Psalm 140 (141) at evening prayer (Commentary on Ps 64 and Commentary on Ps 142). Later 4th and 5th-century sources (e.g., Gregory of Nyssa, Life of St. Macrina 22; John Chrysostom, Homily on Ps 140; The Apostolic Constitutions II, 59; VII, 47-48; VIII, 34-39; Egeria's diary, chap 24, and Theodoret of Cyr, Questions on Exodus 28) confirm Eusebius' claims and provide evidence of additional elements: a lucernarium (light service) to begin evening prayer; the ceremonial offering of incense within it; and intercessions together with blessing to conclude both morning and evening prayer. Western sources from the 4th through the 8th centuries, especially in Gaul and in Spain (e.g., 6th and 7th-century synodal canons of Agde, Tours, Barcelona, and Toledo and the homilies of Caesarius of Arles) indicate the use of additional psalms and biblical canticles at both morning and evening prayer. Psalm 50 (51) enjoyed widespread use as the initial morning psalm, and Psalms 148-150 (the laudes) formed the climax of the morning psalmody. On Sundays and feasts, morning prayer usually included the Canticle of the Three Young Men from Daniel 3. Thus, a typical morning prayer (matins) would consist of selected morning psalms and canticles usually including Psalm 62 (63), Gloria in excelsis, Psalms 148-150, intercessions, blessing, and dismissal. Evening prayer (vespers) would include the lucernarium or light service with evening hymn; evening psalmody including Psalm 140 (141), incensation, intercessions, blessing, and dismissal.

In addition to daily morning and evening prayer, a weekly nighttime vigil marked the celebration of the Lord's Day in many of the local churches throughout the Mediterranean world (cf. Apostolic Constitutions II, 59; Egeria's diary, chap 24). The weekly nighttime or resurrection vigil would typically include three responsorial psalms or canticles (commemorating the three-day entombment of Jesus' body), intercessions, incensation (recalling the myrrh-bearing women), proclamation of a gospel account of the Lord's resurrection, blessing, and dismissal. In time other occasional vigils consisting of psalmody, readings, prayers, and preaching developed within this "cathedral office."

The ecclesial prayer of a local church was termed "cathedral office" by the liturgiologist Anton Baumstark (1872-1948; see Comparative Liturgy, chap 7) because it was common prayer celebrated in the physical edifice housing a local church and presided over by its bishop and clergy. The term also served to contrast this type of ecclesial prayer with that designated "monastic office" utilized by the early monks. The cathedral office, in contrast to the monastic, was almost entirely invariable in structure and in content; selective in its use and christological in its interpretation of psalmody; related to the time of day at which it was prayed; inclusive of non-verbal symbols (incense, darkness, light); usually without readings, and consisting predominantly of praise, thanksgiving, adoration, and petition.

The Egyptian Monastic Office. Within primitive Egyptian monasticism there originated types of communal prayer designed to express and to foster the ceaseless prayer which the early monks strove to cultivate. In marked contrast to the communal prayer of the urban churches, "pure" monastic prayer of the second half of the 4th century generally had no relation to the time of day at which it was prayed; employed the integral psalter over a determined period of time, and incorporated lectio continua (the continuous reading of the scriptures). Thus, while maintaining a fixed structure for prayer, this monastic office allowed for variety in psalmody and readings. One type of this prayer to which John Cassian gives witness in Books II and III of his Institutes was that of the monks of Scetis in Lower Egypt. Cassian's description of the prayer of the semi-anchors of this region, while somewhat idealized and probably incorporating elements from other monastic traditions, gives at least roughly the form and the content of the two meetings or synaxes which these monks had for prayer, one in the early morning (cock-crow) and the other in the evening of at least every Saturday and Sunday. While they may not have met daily in full assembly for these offices as Cassian thought they did (Institutes III, 2), the monks undoubtedly prayed them alone or with a few others on weekdays. The two hours had the same structure: twelve psalms, currente psalterio, i.e., as they occur in the psalter, recited by a soloist; silent prayer by all standing and with arms extended; brief prostration and silent prayer; prayer again standing and with arms extended; collect recited by the one presiding; responsorial psalmody (with Gloria Patri concluding it as it concluded all the psalms); two scriptural readings, one from the Hebrew scriptures, the other from the NT on weekdays. On Saturday, Sunday, and during the Easter season, both readings were from the NT, one from the epistles or Acts, the other from one of the gospel accounts. Cassian had been accused of combining elements (e.g., readings) from another monastic tradition, the Pachomian, with that of the tradition of Scetis in his description of Egyptian monastic prayer, but it seems probable that he gives a substantially accurate description of the monastic prayer of Lower Egypt.

Pachomius' monks in Upper Egypt, however, seem to have used a somewhat different format for their customary morning and evening prayer. At each office a monk read a scriptural passage (on Sundays, a psalm). At a signal all of the monks then made the sign of the cross on their foreheads. Standing, they said the Our Father with arms extended and again signed themselves. Prostrated, they prayed in silence and, standing again, once more signed themselves and prayed in silence until a signal was given to be seated. They then listened to another scriptural passage read by a monk, and the cycle began again. Perhaps six such cycles occurred at each meeting for prayer. The entire monastery of Pachomian monks seems to have prayed together at dawn (rather than at cockcrow as in Lower Egypt), but in the evening each house (division of a monastery) prayed by itself the evening prayer.

In some contrast, then, to the cathedral offices, the primitive Egyptian monastic offices, designed to foster that ceaseless prayer so characteristic of the early monks, displayed a stimulative rather than a worshipful emphasis. It may even be possible that Cassian's structure of twelve psalms for each daily office was a later development from an early practice which encouraged ceaseless prayer by having monks pray twelve times during the day and twelve times during the night.

The Urban Monastic Office. Fourth-century monks not only populated the Egyptian deserts but dwelt near and within the urban centers of Palestine, Syria, Cappadocia, and Mesopotamia. Spreading throughout the East and the West in succeeding centuries, they exerted sometimes powerful influences on the liturgical practices of local churches. Urban monasteries knew both the traditions of Egyptian monks and the tradition of the cathedral office in their respective areas. Through various combinations of elements from the cathedral and monastic traditions, these monks created what has conveniently been termed the urban monastic office. It is this hybrid tradition which has shaped the structure and content of the liturgy of the hours in virtually all Christian rites. The urban monks added to the twice-daily common prayer of the Egyptian monks (Cassian, Institutes II and III) both a communal prayer at the ancient times for Christian private prayer, viz., the third, sixth, and ninth hours (terce, sext, and none) and a communal prayer before retiring at night (compline). The hour later known as prime may also owe its origin to a morning prayer (novella sollemnitas) established, according to Cassian (Institutes III, 4), in a monastery at Bethlehem. Three psalms were characteristic of each of the minor hours of terce, sext, and none; Psalm 90 enjoyed widespread use at compline, and prime contained elements borrowed from cathedral morning prayer. The urban monks combined the monastic and cathedral elements at morning prayer (matins) and evening prayer (vespers) in various ways.

In Palestine and Syria the tendency seems to have been to add the laudes (Psalms 148-150) of cathedral matins to the nocturnal monastic psalmody to form morning prayer. In Cappadocia, on the other hand, cathedral matins remained intact, and the monastic continuous psalmody constituted a separate office (nocturns or vigils) at midnight. It is more difficult to discern the shape of vespers in the initial stages of the urban monastic tradition, but given later developments, especially in the East, it would seem that the cathedral elements of lucernarium, Psalm 140 (141) with incense, and intercessions were appended to the continuous monastic psalmody.

Eastern Offices. The many rites of the Christian East have variously developed their inheritance of the liturgy of the hours from antiquity. The Armenian and East-Syrian rites have preserved much of the cathedral tradition in their morning and evening offices. West-Syrian and Maronite rites have juxtaposed cathedral and monastic elements within some hours, whereas the Coptic rite and, to some extent, the Ethiopian rite have maintained the monastic elements of the hours separate from the cathedral elements. The residue of the latter can be found in services outside the monastic cursus. The most widely known of the Eastern rites, the Byzantine, has interwoven monastic and cathedral elements extensively.

The Armenian office developed seven hours: night, morning, sunrise, midday, evening hours, the hour of peace, and the hour of rest. The only hour which has continuous monastic psalmody is the night hour. Matins and vespers, still celebrated (often together in the morning) by many parishes, contain the elements of ancient cathedral morning and evening prayers with additional material.

Chaldean and Malabar Christians, who worship in the East-Syrian or Assyro-Chaldean rites, can today still experience the full cycle of the cathedral office in their parish worship; matins (Sapra), vespers (Ramša), and the early Sunday morning vigil (Qale d šahra) which is appended to the monastic night office. The monastic nocturnal office (Lelya) contains continuous psalmody divided so that the entire psalter is used in the course of six weeknights. The other hours are today celebrated only occasionally or united in abridged form to other offices. Terce and sext are said only on Lenten weekdays; compline occurs only on some feasts; some remnants of terce appear in the opening of the eucharistic liturgy, and a residue of none is attached to the beginning of vespers. To the ancient elements of these hours have been added in the course of the centuries what has characterized East-Syrian liturgy—hymns and prayers of praise without petition.

The liturgy of the hours in the West-Syrian (Syro-Antiochene) rite and related Maronite rite contains all the usual hours; nocturns, matins, terce, sext, none, vespers, and compline. Matins (Safro) in both Syrian and Maronite rites is essentially a cathedral office which has absorbed some elements of the cathedral vigil. Poetic chants have in the course of time replaced some of the original elements of matins and especially the psalmody in nocturns (Lilyo), terce, sext, and none. The offering of incense is highlighted in vespers (Ramšo) which, in the Maronite rite at least, clearly juxtaposes monastic and cathedral elements. Compline (Sutoro) still contains psalmody in which are included Psalms 4 and 90 (91). The common practice today, where the liturgy of the hours is celebrated outside monastic communities, groups the hours in two synaxes. The first, in the morning, includes nocturns (Lilyo), matins (Safro), terce, and sext; the second, in the evening, includes none, vespers (Ramšo), and compline (Sutoro). Among the Syro-Malankarese Catholics in Kerala, India, and among Maronite Catholics in the United States a vigorous liturgical renewal shows great promise of a revitalized celebration of the hours.

In the Coptic rite with its heavy monastic influence, the hours in the horologion (office book) have, not surprisingly, a monastic cast. Six hours (matins, terce, sext, none, eleventh hour [vespers], and compline) have essentially the same structure: initial prayers, psalmody (twelve psalms, ideally, from the psalter distributed throughout the six hours), gospel reading, troparia (poetic refrains), Kyrie eleison (repeated at length), Trisagion, Our Father, prayer of absolution, and final prayer. Two hours, "Prayer of the Veil" (a second, monastic compline) and a midnight office of three nocturns do not conform to the usual structure and repeat psalmody already found in the other hours. These are undoubtedly late additions to the cursus. Remnants of the cathedral office can be found in additional services: Offering of Incense for morning and for evening and Psalmody for the night, for the morning, and for the evening.

The complexity of material for the hours in the Ethiopian rite has yet to be thoroughly subjected to scholarly analysis. The cathedral office consisting of vespers (Wāzēmā), Sunday nocturns (Mawaddes), and matins (Sebehāta nagh) is still celebrated in large churches on especially solemn days by professional cantors in the intricate chant of this rite. Other services, including the third, sixth, and ninth hours, are added at certain times. Elements from both monastic and cathedral traditions are interwoven in most of these offices. The monastic traditions of the hours is perhaps more prominently represented in four distinct horologia or sa'ātāta which contain offices other than the cathedral services, but even here cathedral elements are interspersed with monastic. Of the four horologia, that known as the Sa'ātāt of Abba Giyorgis Saglawi is the common cursus for the Ethiopian Orthodox church. Only in monasteries of this church is the complete office celebrated.

The Byzantine rite, as a liturgical tradition which has combined cathedral usages of Antioch and Jerusalem synthesized in the practice of Hagia Sophia, the Great Church of Constantinople, with monastic usages of the Laura of St. Sabas in Palestine and the monasteries in Constantinople influenced by St. Theodore Studites (d. 826), offers a rich complexity of traditions in its liturgy of the hours. The cathedral office of Hagia Sophia yielded almost entirely to the monastic "Sabaitic" and "Studite" practices after the fall of Constantinople to the Latin crusaders in 1204. Today the Byzantine office combines elements of nocturns, cathedral matins, and (on Sundays) the cathedral vigil in orthros. Poetic odes of monastic origin called the "canon" have virtually replaced the biblical canticles once part of orthros. Vespers (hesperinos) retains most of the elements of evening prayer in the cathedral office, but opens with a derivative of monastic vespers. Parish worship still includes orthros and hesperinos, generally with some adaptation. On Saturday nights in parishes of Russian tradition the "all-night vigil" (pannychis or vsenoshchnoe bdenie) occurs. Though lengthy, this office does not ordinarily last the whole night long. It combines vespers and orthros usually without the additional psalmody of the monasteries. To the monasteries belong the additional hours of prime, terce, sext, none, and compline.

Characteristic, certainly, of the liturgy of the hours, especially of vespers, in the Eastern churches is the preservation of elements and distinct units of the cathedral office. Even when monasticized, vespers and matins remained viable and popular forms of common prayer in parishes.

Western Offices. The history of the liturgy of the hours in the West is primarily its history in the Roman rite. It is well to recall, however, that other pre-Reformation rites existed in the West and, within them, diverse forms of the hours. Evidence of the monastic office from the 4th through the 11th centuries is certainly more abundant than evidence of the cathedral office due in great measure to the significant role monasteries played in the destabilized society of that period. Throughout the West monastic practice overwhelmed cathedral practice and left fewer traces of the cathedral office than can be found in the Eastern rites. The Spanish rites as a notable exception, however, preserved both diversity and popular participation in forms of the cathedral office until Pope Gregory VII (1073-1085) suppressed them and imposed the Roman office. In the 16th century some churches of the Reformation attempted to reform the massive, monasticized, and clericalized Roman office and to restore it as parochial worship. In the case of Archbishop Cranmer and the Church of England, the reforming effort was ingenious and the restorative effort, eminently successful. Despite periodic attempts at reform in the Roman rite before the Second Vatican Council, the Roman office remained largely a privatized and clericalized activity. The reform of the office after the council, while in many respects thorough and offering hope of its restoration as parochial liturgy, remains still generally an achievement of new books, not of renewed practice.

Western Monastic Offices. The 4th-century Ordo monasterii, which influenced both St. Augustine's and St. Caesarius' rules, prescribed six hours—matins, terce, sext, none, lucernarium, and nocturns—in which were employed responsorial and antiphonal psalmody as well as scriptural readings. From Cassian's Institutes II and III can be gleaned some characteristics of the monastic office in southern Gaul in the 5th century. Generally similar to the Palestinian monastic office, the Provençal office seems not to have concluded nocturns with the laudes (Psalms 148-150) but to have used them at the conclusion of a separate morning office or matins. Cassian's system was modified in the 6th century as witnessed by the rules of Sts. Caesarius and Aurelian of Arles. Here cathedral hours of matins and lucernarium exist together with their respective monastic equivalents, nocturns and duodecima. The little hours and, with Aurelian, prime and compline round out the cursus. On feasts the cathedral hours were celebrated by the monks for the people in a public oratory. In the same century, with St. Columban's Rule of Monks, one encounters an Irish monastic office in which the amount of psalmody, especially in the night office, is staggering—almost a hundred psalms on a weekend night in winter! Sts. Isidore of Seville (d. 633) and Fructuosus of Braga (d. ca. 665) provide in their respective monastic rules descriptions of Spanish monastic offices similar to those in southern Gaul. The most important pre-Benedictine rule by far to supply information on the monastic office in Italy is the Rule of the Master. Here the hours—nocturns, matins, the little hours, vespers, and compline—have each basically the same structure—psalmody (antiphonal and responsorial), reading from St. Paul, gospel reading (at matins and vespers probably gospel canticle), and intercessions (rogus dei). Psalms used antiphonally, except at matins and compline, were taken as they occur in the psalter, and each psalm was prayed in a unit (inpositio) comprising psalm, Gloria Patri, prostration, and silent prayer.

The prescriptions for the office in The Rule of the Master and some form of the basilican (monastic) office of the church of Rome were the two major sources for the content and structure of the office in the Rule of St. Benedict. Little is known directly of the old Roman basilican office, ancestor of the modern Roman office, but through Benedict's rule, the Rule of the Master (itself a derivative of a form of the basilican office), and 8th-century ordines Romani something of its nature can be reconstructed. The monastic predilection for the use of the integral psalter over a given period of time found expression in this office in the weekly distribution of Psalms 1-107 (108) continuously at vigils (nocturns) and Psalms 108 (109)-150 at vespers. The continuous reading of the scriptures at nocturns (vigils), another monastic predilection, was undoubtedly part of the basilican office, for the 8th-century Ordo XIV, giving the order of readings for the office in St. Peter's basilica in the late 6th or early 7th century, indicates that all of scripture was read from the beginning of a year to its end. Matins, the minor hours (including prime), and compline had fixed psalms. There were twelve psalms (twenty-four on Sundays) at nocturns, six (including the laudes) at matins, six at vespers, and three at each of the little hours and compline. St. Benedict is credited with modifying this arrangement by distributing the variable psalms of vigils and vespers throughout all the hours of a day except compline; by reducing to twelve the number of psalms at Sunday vigils; by removing psalms used at other hours from the cursus of vigils and vespers; by placing the readings after the first six psalms of vigils rather than at the end of the twelve, and by introducing hymnody into each of the hours. This office supplanted almost all other monastic offices in the West by the 11th century.

Some years after the Second Vatican Council the Benedictine Confederation under the leadership of its Abbot Primate, Rembert Weakland, O.S.B., provided a rich source in Thesaurus Liturgiae Horarum Monasticae (Rome, 1976) for Benedictine monasteries to shape the monastic office according to their local needs and circumstances. The introduction to this work is available in English translation and is entitled "The Directory for the Celebration of the Work of God." It remains an outstanding statement of the rationale for and the principles of not only the monastic office but also, in great measure, of the liturgy of the hours for any local church or group of Christians.

Western Cathedral Offices. Evidence for the cathedral office in the West is scattered and late. St. Ambrose (339-397) witnesses to the existence of cathedral matins, vespers, and vigils in Milan as does St. Augustine (354-430) for North Africa. In addition to the Gallic synods already mentioned, St. Gregory of Tours (538-594) in his History of the Franks and Lives of the Fathers attests to a cathedral office in Gaul of which matins undoubtedly consisted of Psalm 50 [51], the canticle from Daniel 3, Psalms 148-150, and capitella, intercessions composed from verses of psalms. In his homilies and Vita, St. Caesarius of Arles provides scattered information on the rather full cathedral office in Arles. Matins, which seems to have had basically the same structure attested to by St. Gregory at Tours and at which Caesarius preached, was preceded by a vigil in which scripture readings were interspersed with psalms each followed by prayer in silence and an oration (collect) by the presider. Caesarius himself introduced the minor hours into the cathedral cursus and sometimes preached also at lucernarium which with the monastic duodecima constituted cathedral vespers.

The cathedral office in Visigothic Spain is known, as previously indicated, principally through the canons of numerous Iberian councils. Of particular significance in Iberian vespers was the opening light ritual, oblatio luminis, in which a lighted candle was elevated with the proclamation, "In the name of Our Lord Jesus Christ, light and peace!" To this the congregation answered, "Thanks be to God!" In addition to the customary Psalm 140 [141] other vesperal psalms having the theme of light (e.g., Psalms 17 [18], 35 [36], 111 [112]) found place. Otherwise, vespers and matins were apparently similar to the respective hours in southern Gaul.

Evidence of a distinct cathedral office in Rome is sparse. Some would see in units of the 5th-century basilican nocturns, matins, and vespers as reflected in Benedict's Rule remnants of ancient Roman cathedral hours. For example, the third nocturn of Sunday vigils in the Rule consists of three biblical canticles with "alleluia" refrain and a proclamation of a passage from the gospel—a striking parallel to the weekly cathedral vigil. Such units may indeed be cathedral remnants, but the monastic influence in the Roman basilicas was early and heavy. It marked their offices with a stamp that has survived in the one Roman office eventually issuing from them even through the reform of that office following the Second Vatican Council.

As in the East, the monastic office of the West was integrated with the cathedral office in various ways. Unlike the office in the East, however, the distinction between monastic and cathedral elements in the Western parochial offices did not remain as clear, nor did the hybrid forms long survive as vibrant worship among the faithful.

The Roman Office. The first clear statement of what constituted the structure and content of the Roman office comes from Amalarius of Metz (ca. 780-850) in his Liber Officialis, IV, 1-2 and Liber de ordine antiphonarii, 1-7. By the time these works were written, of course, some form of the Roman basilican office had been transmitted to the British Isles in the Romanization of the Celtic church and thence to German and Frankish lands in the missionary effort of the Anglo-Irish monks. What Amalarius describes, then, is a Romano-Frankish office which in the process of transmission and use has undergone some modification. From Amalarius' works and from a Roman ordo (Ordo XII) of his time can be outlined the form of the Roman office which remained essentially the same into the 20th century. Nocturns (vigils, much later termed matins) began with an invitational which included Psalm 94 (95) with antiphon. A first nocturn of twelve psalms without antiphons on Sundays, but with antiphons on weekdays, and only three psalms on feasts followed. Three readings with responsories concluded the nocturn. Two other nocturns arranged similarly followed, each having three psalms (with antiphons). The hymn Te Deum replaced the final responsory in the third nocturn. Matins (later termed lauds) consisted of seven psalms (Psalms 50 [51] on weekdays and 92 [93] on Sundays, 62 [63], 65 [66], a variable psalm, and 148-150), a biblical cantic, capitulum (short reading), the gospel cantic Benedictus, and inter-cessions. Prime included Psalm 53 (54), two sections of Psalm 118 (119), versicle, Kyrie, Pater, Apostles' Creed, Psalm 50 (51), versicle, and collect. The minor hours of terce, sext, and none comprised three octonaries from Psalm 118 (119) without antiphons, a short reading, response, and preces (intercessions). The core of vespers consisted of five variable psalms (drawn from Psalms 109 [110]-147), capitulum, responsory, versicle (Ps 140 [141]:2 with incense offering in Amalarius' time), the gospel canticle Magnificat, intercessions (on weekdays only for Amalarius), and collect. Compline used Psalms 4, 30 (31):1-6, 90 (91), and 133 (134) without antiphons daily and the gospel canticle Nunc dimittis.

Local celebration of the Roman office before the 8th century did not necessarily mean the performance of all hours in a given church. Often enough the office was parceled out among the various churches of an area. But beginning shortly before and continuing throughout the Carolingian reform of the 8th and 9th centuries, the obligation for all clergy to celebrate all the hours in each church gradually became the norm. Between the 11th and 15th centuries both the doubling of offices (ferial and festal) on feasts and various additions to the office, including hymns at all the hours, a considerable extension of prime, offices of the dead and of the Blessed Virgin Mary, gradual psalms, penitential psalms, suffrages, and lengthened preces, made the performance of the office burdensome to the clergy who gradually became, along with monks, almost the only celebrants of the hours. Lay people, also finding the office burdensome as well as incomprehensible, abandoned the hours to focus on popular devotions such as the rosary or on the recent and apparently more palatable accretions to the hours as these were collected in primers, books of hours, and, somewhat later, in manuals of piety.

frequent use of festal or sanctoral offices which were shorter than the ferial offices but limited in their use of the psalms. Relief was also discovered in the adoption of the 13th-century office of the Roman Curia, itself an abridgement of the Roman office as used by the pope and his household. The propagation of this office by the Franciscans, however, did not displace the Roman office which continued to suffer both the expansion of legendary hagiographical readings and the contraction and elimination of scriptural and patristic readings at nocturns. Dispensations from choral celebration with consequent obligation to private recitation of the hours increased, as education and other activities took clergy away from their local churches. From its original purpose as a kind of ordo to find one's way among the books utilized for the hours, viz., psalter, antiphonary, lectionary, and collectary, the breviary gradually became a compendium of the entire office for those reciting it privately and gave further impetus to an already existing practice of bunching hours together.

Feeble efforts to reform the office came to naught until Francisco Cardinal Quiñonez (1485-1540) and his associates at the direction of Pope Clement VII (1523-1534) produced what came to be known as The Breviary of the Holy Cross. Designed for private recitation and spiritual edification, this breviary featured three psalms at each hour and scriptural readings arranged at matins (nocturns) in semi-continuous fashion such that most of the Bible would be read in the course of a year. Psalms were placed according to their suitability for each hour, the whole psalter being distributed over the course of a week. Two editions and over 100 printings testify to the popularity of this breviary, but the objection of theologians that this office vitiated the very nature of the hours as communal worship won the day. The Council of Trent (1545-1563) decreed a correction of the old Roman office, and Pope Pius V in publishing it in 1568 banned further use of Quiñonez's breviary.

French reforms of the office in the 17th and 18th centuries were the most notable between Quiñonez's and that of Pope Pius X (1903-1914). The so called neo-Gallican breviaries were the products of diocesan reforms founded on some of the principles Quiñonez had used. Most utilized scripture more extensively, redistributed the psalms to allow for relatively equal length at most hours, abbreviated nocturns (matins), permitted only one of the laudes (Psalms 148-150) at matins (lauds), and used ferial psalms on all but major feasts to encourage recitation of the whole psalter weekly. All was directed primarily to the private recitation and edification of the clergy even though choral celebration of the office still existed in cathedrals and parishes, and laity continued to attend at least vespers on Sundays.

Despite other minor reforming efforts, the structure and content of the Roman office remained essentially the same until the reform of Pope Pius X in 1911. Beyond the celebration of the full office in monasteries and of Sunday vespers in many parishes, the office had become the private affair of clergy and some religious who were considered deputed or mandated to pray the hours in the name of the church. Pius X's bull, Divino afflatu (November 1, 1911) decreed what was intended to be the first stage of a comprehensive reform of the office. The psalms were redistributed, divided where necessary, and the number for each day reduced. Entailed in this redistribution and reduction was the loss of Psalms 148-150 as a daily component of lauds (matins)—a rupture with a centuries-old, universal tradition. Weekly recitation of the psalter was restored by suppressing supplementary offices as daily obligations and restoring priority of the temporal cycle over the sanctoral. The number of psalms at matins (nocturns) was reduced to nine and at lauds (matins), four. Too brief scriptural readings and unhistorical hagiographic readings at matins (nocturns) were, however, left unrevised. Something of Pius X's reform was continued in the work of the historical section of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, established within the Congregation by Pope Pius XI (1922-1939) in 1930, and by the Pontifical Commission for the Reform of the Liturgy formed under Pope Pius XII (1939-1958) with the aid of the historical section of the Congregation. A major project of the Pisan Commission was reform of the Roman office. Study of needed reforms was prolonged and thorough, but actual reforms were few. The major result could be considered the reduction of matins (nocturns) to one nocturn on most days of the year, and this change was promulgated in the Codex rubricarum of 1960. The Preparatory Liturgical Commission for the Second Vatican Council, established by Pope John XXIII (1958-1963), prepared in its schema for reform of the liturgy a chapter on the office and advocated restoration of the traditional sequence of the hours prayed at their appropriate times (veritas horarum), recognition of lauds and vespers as the chief hours of the day, reform of matins (nocturns) for use at any hour and of the minor hours for use at the appropriate times. The commission also rejected a plea by some for a double office, one for private recitation, the other for communal celebration. A distribution of the psalms over a period of time longer than one week was recommended. All of these proposals, together with one which abolished the hour of prime, found expression in Chapter IV of the definitive conciliar constitution, Sacrosanctum concilium, promulgated by Pope Paul VI (1963-1978) on December 4, 1963.

The post-conciliar commission for the reform of the liturgy, while scrupulously faithful to the text of Chapter IV of the constitution, moved beyond its concern to provide primarily a better office for private recitation of the clergy, and clearly summoned all in the church to the communal celebration especially of the chief hours of lauds and vespers (General Instruction on the Liturgy of the Hours, nn. 20-27). The psalms were distributed over a four-week cycle, divided where appropriate, and placed more fittingly at the various hours. Matins (nocturns) became the office of readings, suitable for use at any time, its readings fully revised. A hymn now began each hour, and the minor hours, still obligatory for those bound to communal celebration, could be reduced to one midday hour by those not so bound. The number of biblical canticles was increased, the invitatory at matins (nocturns) recommended for lauds (matins) if the latter were the first hour in the day, and the structure of all the hours simplified and rendered similar. Morning prayer and evening prayer begin with opening verse (or invitatory in morning prayer) and are followed by psalmody (morning psalm, or canticle, psalm of praise in the morning; two psalms and NT canticle in the evening), scriptural reading, short response, gospel canticle (Benedictus in the morning, Magnificat in the evening), prayers (offering and praise in the morning, intercessions in the evening), Lord's prayer, concluding prayer, and blessing. The minor hours or midday prayer consist essentially of a hymn, three psalms (or sections of psalms), short reading and response, concluding prayer, and blessing. Compline, on a one week cycle, has a hymn, usually one psalm, short reading, response, gospel canticle (Nunc dimittis), prayer, and blessing. The office of readings, expandable on Saturday nights to a lengthier vigil office, has (after the invitatory), three psalms (or sections of psalms), versicle, biblical and patristic or hagiographical readings each with responsory, Te Deum, prayer, and blessing.

Although the possibility for radical revision was available to the reformers of the Roman office and was urged by some among them, they chose to compromise and thus retain the essentially monastic structure of this office. The reform, nevertheless, was substantial and laboriously achieved. Its imaginative implementation and indigenization will undoubtedly make apparent its possibilities as contemporary yet traditional communal prayer.

The Office in Reformation Churches. There have been many attempts to restore liturgy of the hours in churches of the Reformation. Among the more notable are those in the Lutheran tradition, in the Church of England, and in the community of Taizé.

Martin Luther's attempt to reform matins (morning prayer) and vespers by making them services for all was a commendable attempt to restore these hours to the people, but his emphasis on scripture reading and preaching in these cathedral hours was an unavoidable misunderstanding of them. Twentieth-century Lutherans in the United States have recovered better the components of a traditional cathedral office in their Lutheran Book of Worship. Matins contains, among other elements, selected psalmody, hymn, optional gospel canticle, and Lord's Prayer. A light service can begin vespers, and other elements include the vespereal Psalm 140 (141), selected psalmody (including NT canticle), Magnificat, litany, and Lord's Prayer.

Relying on Quiñonez' reforming principles, Archbishop Cranmer produced two daily offices for the Church of England which restored communal celebration of liturgy of the hours to both clergy and people. Both the morning and evening hours, inserted in The Book of Common Prayer, had essentially identical structures of which the core was psalmody, scriptural reading, canticle, scriptural reading, canticle. While matins was a combination of elements from the Sarum usage of Roman nocturns, lauds, and prime, Cranmer's evensong brought together portions of vespers and compline. These hours, like Luther's, emphasized the orderly reading of scripture. Within the Anglican communion there have been a number of recent refinements of the daily offices as these appear in new service books such as The Alternative Service Book (1980) in England and The Book of Common Prayer (1979) in the United States.

Perhaps the most notable modern restoration of the liturgy of the hours is the Taizé office. Published in 1963 for the ecumenical religious community in Taizé, France, it has undergone revision throughout the years and has been experienced by thousands of people from all walks of life who visit the community each year. While this office has a simplified form of the little hours and compline, the principal hours are morning prayer and evening prayer. The latter is expanded on Saturday evening and eves of feasts to form a vigil office. Morning and evening prayers now have the basic structure of introduction, psalmody, reading, response, silence, hymn, intercessions, collect for the week, free prayer, general collect, and blessing.

Offices in The Book of Common Prayer, L'Office de Taizé, and other Protestant offices, especially L'Office Divin de chaque jour edited by R. Paquier and A. Bardet for Swiss Calvinists, were utilized in the preparation of the Roman Liturgia horarum after the Second Vatican Council. Although the influence of these offices on the structure and content of the new Roman liturgy of the hours is negligible, those engaged in the reform of that office gained a better understanding and appreciation of the Protestant offices themselves and through them, of what should be retained or modified in the Roman hours.

Theology and Practice

The various hours which constitute the office in all traditions have a basic structure which has been termed dialogical. Some elements of the structure demand attentive listening to the word of God through which God calls or teaches us. Other elements are responsive in nature. Through them we respond to God's call in praise, thanksgiving, or petition. The readings and even the psalmody, from one point of view, manifest the call or address of God to us. Hymns, prayers, intercessory elements, and psalmody manifest our response to that call. While such a view certainly represents something of the theological meaning of the liturgy of the hours, it is inadequate. All Christian liturgy is fundamentally a celebration of the paschal mystery of Christ, of his dying and rising not simply as action inaugurating salvation, but as present event actualized here and now in the lives of his faithful people who constitute his body, the church. The hours, as liturgy, are truly that, and in being that, are dialogical, for the paschal mystery is itself a dialogue, personalized in Christ who is both the Word of God to humankind and the ultimate and absolutely faithful human response of praise, thanksgiving, self-offering, and petition to God.

Both the ancient cathedral and monastic forms of liturgy of the hours were ritualized actualizations of the paschal mystery and of its dialogical dimension. But each form can be said to have had a different emphasis. Whereas the cathedral hours emphasized the human response to the salvific approach of God in Christ, i.e., put the accent on worship, the monastic office tended to focus on the divine offer of salvation and human receptivity to it in Christ. Both forms were ritualized expressions of a mystery that must be lived first in order for those expressions to be authentic and to be means of further deepening the living of the mystery. Of course, both forms coalesced in the urban monastic office and its derivatives so that the emphasis distinctive of each was diminished. The diminishment in emphasis, however, did not lessen the significance of the liturgy of the hours as a ritual celebration of the paschal mystery of Christ even if that significance, especially in the West, became unclear due to the clericalization and privatization of the office and to a concern with fulfillment of obligation and of mandate.

One of the purposes of the liturgy of the hours is sometimes stated as the "sanctification of time" (General Instruction on the Liturgy of the Hours, nn. 10-11). This phrase, often unexamined, can lend itself to misinterpretation. It should not mean that the liturgy of the hours somehow renders secular time sacred, but that this liturgy suggests at certain times of a day what the quality of all times should be, i.e., an experience of time which is sacramental or revelatory of the mystery of Christ and a means of union with God in him. Matins and vespers, for example, in the cathedral tradition were intended for the "sanctification of time" in the sense that their rites and texts illuminated critical moments of the day, evening and morning, as revealing certain aspects of the paschal mystery of Christ (viz., his dying and rising), which grounds and suffuses all of Christian life. They thus encouraged the seeing of all moments of a day as sacramental expressions of that mystery.

The hours as sanctification of time have been misunderstood in another way. Dom Gregory Dix suggested in his Shape of the Liturgy that the early church celebrated the eucharist as an eschatological cult, but eventually, when private devotional prayer assumed a communal form as the offering of human endeavor to God, a kind of liturgy very different from the eschatological eucharist was introduced into Christian worship. Thus the hours, as a liturgy sanctifying time, were opposed to the eucharist, a liturgy wholly focused on the eschatological. Such a dichotomy does not exist. Both eucharist and hours have eschatological and temporal dimensions since they both celebrate, albeit in different modes, the one mystery of Christ which is both temporal and eschatological.

Similarity in the content of what is celebrated in eucharist and hours, however, has led some to posit a close relationship between them. The widespread notion of an intimate link is even expressed in The General Instruction on the Liturgy of the Hours, n. 12. There it is said that the praise, thanksgiving, memorial of the mysteries of salvation, petitions, and foretaste of heaven present in the eucharist are extended throughout the day by the liturgy of the hours as if the hours could not be of themselves sacramental celebrations of the mystery of Christ. History, however, shows "that for centuries eucharist and hours were not regarded as related ritual actions such that eucharist was, so to speak, the culmination of the hours or their source in sanctifying time. Rather, the hours have stood independent of the eucharist and have focused their celebration on the mystery as present in every moment of time, modelling and encouraging that ceaseless prayer which must be the concomitant of lives caught up in that mystery.

The linking of hours to eucharist, however, may not be as major a problem for their proper understanding and use as the seeing inability or lack of opportunity of many within the Roman rite to experience liturgy of the hours as prayer. The remarkable, contemporary revival of and interest in personal prayer has hardly contributed to an appreciation or use of the hours as prayer. Perhaps centuries-long abuse of the office as a clerical and monastic preserve, an obligatory ceremonial more often than not performed in private and, until recently, in a foreign language, has rendered the prayerful possibilities of the office obscure. The unfortunate distinction, too, between liturgy as public, communal activity and prayer as a personal and private undertaking seems to have kept many from experiencing the hours as communal prayer which is also personal. Authentic Christian life has both personal and communal or social dimensions which need to be present in all forms of prayer, would cease to express and to nourish a community's life of faith if it were not also a personal form of prayer for each one engaged in it.

That the liturgy of the hours can be a kind of "school of prayer" wherein one can learn how to pray well is attributable, among other things, to its objectivity and its metaphoric quality. Its objectivity lies in its universality with respect to the mystery it ritually symbolizes, its unfetteredness to particular subjective needs and concerns. Its metaphoric quality is that of any sacramental activity of the church, an activity which does not merely denote the mystery it symbolizes but connotes its rich complexity, inviting participants to ever deeper immersion in it. The liturgy of the hours, then, can be a framework in which the authentic dimensions of Christian prayer are apprehended, practiced, and made one's own. Schooled in the common prayer of the hours, one can enter more deeply into "private" prayer and, thus enriched, bring ever greater intensity and sensitivity to the liturgy of the hours.

HUMAN SCIENCES, SACRAMENTS AND THE

Before the Second Vatican Council it was common to find the sacraments treated in manuals of theology together with various moral and disciplinary directives for the clergy. The principal focus of this treatment was the proper performance of the rites and the effects they had on those who participated in them. As such it fell largely within the province of Canon Law.

The canons of proper performance specified the appropriate minister of the sacrament (e.g., bishop, priest, lay person), the matter of the sacrament (e.g., bread and wine, chrism, water, laying on of hands) and the form of the sacrament (the words to be used, e.g., "I baptize you in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit"). If the canons were duly observed, the sacrament was said to be licit (i.e., lawfully performed) and valid (i.e., juridically and ontologically effective). If minor infractions of the canons occurred, the sacrament was said to be illicit but still valid. If a major infraction occurred (e.g., totally inappropriate minister, matter or form), the sacrament was said to be invalid, that is, it was regarded as being completely ineffective.

In its outlook, this approach to the church's sacraments was individualistic and essentialistic. It directed attention toward the individual performers in the rituals and toward the essential effects bestowed on the recipients. Theological speculation as to the types of effects was limited by the essentialist and non-empirical method of classical philosophy. Although the manuals acknowledged communal and existential dimensions of the sacraments, these further dimensions were for the most part unexplored or left to the province of pastoral and spiritual theology.

The liturgical movement which gained momentum during the decades prior to Vatican II broadened the Catholic perspective on the sacraments so that they could be seen as having greater significance for the lives of all Christians as well as for the corporate life of the church itself. In addition, the ecumenical movement expanded the Catholic awareness of sacraments so that they could be seen as having parallels in other Christian churches and even in non-Christian religions. Viewed under these lights, the sacraments fell under the scrutiny of a wider variety of the human sciences than classical philosophy.

It should be noted that in this context the sacraments are the rites themselves, not the metaphysical concomitants of the rites spoken of in scholastic theology (e.g., as in the phrase, "receiving the sacraments") nor the speculative dimensions of the rites proposed by other theological systems (e.g., that sacraments are encounters with Christ). Only the observable and recordable aspects of the sacraments are open to empirical investigation, although the reportable experiences of the participants in the rites also need to be included under this rubric. In this article the human sciences shall be taken to encompass all studies of human behavior and experience which claim to have a methodology which yields conclusions that can be verified through similar methodological investigation.

Philosophy

The most ancient of the human sciences is philosophy, which goes back to the ancient Greeks, and which in the Middle Ages was called the handmaiden of theology. The Fathers of the church used Platonic and neo-Platonic philosophy to understand the workings of the sacraments, and their effort was superseded by the Scholastics who used the Aristotelian categories of matter and form, substance and accidents cause and effect to analyze and explain the sacraments. As can be seen from the discussion above, a number of these terms were incorporated into the church's Canon Law, which still regulates the proper performance of the sacraments.

Shunning the apparently antagonistic philosophies of the Enlightenment, Catholic theologians through the Modern Era continued to follow the Aristotelian method of investigation. Contemporary sacramental theology, however, has returned to the practice of utilizing categories and systems of thought borrowed from non-Catholic and even non-Christian philosophies to understand the sacraments, much as the Church Fathers used Plato and the Scholastics used Aristotle.

Edward Schillebeeckx (Christ the Sacrament of the Encounter with God, 1963), Karl Rahner (The Church and the Sacraments, 1963) and others in the neo-Thomistic movement were the first to break out of the strictly scholastic mold by drawing on phenomenology and existentialism to amplify the personal and interpersonal dimensions of sacramental worship. Juan Luis Segundo (The Sacraments Today, 1974) and other liberation theologians have incorporated Marxist elements into their examination of how the sacraments operate in Christian society. Bernard Lee (The Becoming of the Church, 1974) has developed a theology of the church and sacraments within the framework of Whitehead's process philosophy. Even linguistic analysis has been put to use by theologians to interpret the various functions of language within sacramental rituals.

A consequence of this return to the practice of adapting philosophies to the needs of theology has been an increase in the number of ways that the sacraments can be understood. When all theologians used the Aristotelian system exclusively, there was basically a single sacramental theology within the church. Variations within this framework divided theologians into different schools of thought over minor issues, but all discussion took place within the single framework of scholastic philosophy. The adoption of multiple frameworks or systems of thought has bred a multiplicity of systematic theologies in all areas including systematic reflection on the sacraments. Rather than there being a single Catholic sacramental theology, therefore, there now exists a plurality of sacramental theologies, such as those referred to above.

Today the unity of the philosophical endeavor to understand the sacraments is located on the underlying level of methodology rather than on the surface level of results. Even though different theologians may say widely diverse things about the sacraments, they are united in a common effort to understand the sacraments from a philosophical perspective that sheds light on one or more of the many dimensions of sacramental worship.

History

Although history as a study of human behavior also dates from ancient Greece, the historical investigation of the sacraments dates only from the 19th century. Before the inquiry of Prosper Gueranger and the monks of Solesmes into the origins of the liturgy and Gregorian chant, it had been largely assumed that the sacraments had remained virtually unchanged since the time of Christ and the apostles.

Even the earliest investigations, however, showed that the church's sacramental history had been marked by diversity as well as continuity. By the turn of the century, researchers were discovering, collecting and cataloguing ancient and medieval liturgical texts that had remained hidden for centuries in the libraries of the Vatican and numerous monasteries. During the first half of the 20th century, scholars built on this foundational research and constructed detailed histories of the sacramental rites of both Eastern and Western Christianity, culminating in such works as J. Jungmann's The Mass of the Roman Rite and a number of the volumes of Herder's Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte and Edition du Cerf's Lex Orandi. By the Second Vatican Council in the 1960s, the acknowledgement of liturgical change in the past made it possible for the church's bishops to decide that the Latin rites, which had been stabilized since the Counter-Reformation in the 16th century, should be allowed to change again.

Among the discoveries of the historians regarding the development of the sacraments, the following can be cited as some of the more notable.

Baptism and confirmation were originally not separate rites but two moments in a lengthy ceremony which completed the initiation of adult catechumens into the church. This discovery has led to a restoration of adult catechesis and baptism as the primary analogue for understanding the sacrament and to the development of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults as a catechetical process for unbaptized persons seeking to become Catholics. At the same time that confirmation has received new meaning as an integral part of the initiation process, however, confirmation as a separate sacrament for Catholics baptized in infancy has suffered a loss of meaning. The medieval explanation, introduced to justify the practice of the separate sacrament, namely, that it bestows an increase of the Holy Spirit to prepare souls for the spiritual battles of adulthood, no longer seems tenable, and a completely satisfactory alternative has yet to be developed.

Penance or the sacrament of reconciliation in the form of private and repeatable confession to a priest evolved from an extra-canonical practice of Celtic monks who introduced it to the European mainland in the 5th and 6th centuries, after which it received approval by the hierarchy and became standard in the church. An earlier form of penance, the public repentance of notorious sinners, had emerged in the 2nd century out of the necessity of reconciling apostates and others who had left the Christian community, without resorting to a second baptism. This practice, presided over by the bishop and limited to once in a penitent's lifetime, was never extended to more than a small fraction of the Christian population, and by the 6th century it had practically disappeared. The adaptability of reconciliation in the church to cultural change accounts on the one hand for the development of three new rites since Vatican II, and on the other hand for the tendency of Catholics today to frequent the sacrament less than they had in the recent past.

Anointing of the sick was an extra-canonical practice with many regional variations until it was entered into the Gregorian Sacramentary in the 9th century and promulgated throughout the Holy Roman Empire. Originally intended for the sick, conditions in the Middle Ages led to the sacrament being performed mainly for the dying, as a result of which its name was changed to extreme unction, meaning "last anointing." The original name and intention of the sacrament have been restored in recent decades, although the revised rite makes provision for its use both in the case of serious illness and in the case of proximate death.

Even though the sacredness of Christian marriage had been recognized since the time of the apostles and the sacramentality of marriage had been discussed by Augustine, matrimony as an ecclesiastical ritual was not officially introduced in the Latin church until the 12th century. After some initial hesitance to call marriage a sacrament because of negative attitudes towards sexuality, the church's deep involvement in the ceremony and its consequences led to its being designated as a sacrament similar to the other six. The major developments since that time have occurred quite recently, both in the rite itself and in the theology of marriage, as a consequence of Vatican II.

Ordination in the sense of passing on ministerial office through the laying on of hands has been practiced since NT times, but the designation of some of the ordained as priests (hiereis, sacerdotes) emerged only gradually, first being applied to local church supervisors or bishops and later to community elders or presbyters. Many early ministers were married and they supported themselves by work apart from their ministry, but by the 4th century they constituted a separate class with diverse duties and ranks, whence the name holy orders. Beginning in the 6th century celibate monks were ordained for missionary work and Christian Europe became accustomed to an unmarried clergy, which custom became church law in the 12th century. Clerical training and ordination took place through a series of seven steps (minor and major orders), but since Vatican II this number has been reduced to three (diaconate, presbyterate and episcopate), and married men are again ordained to the diaconate. During the Middle Ages and afterwards the theology of the sacrament emphasized priestly power (e.g., to consecrate the eucharist and to administer absolution), but the revised rite focuses attention on the ministry of priestly service.

The weekly celebration of eucharist originated as a communal supper with a ritual sharing of bread and wine, but rather early the full meal was replaced by preparatory prayers and readings from the Sacred Scriptures. During the patristic era this simple liturgy was greatly expanded and embellished in the manner still observable in the Eastern churches. At the same time, the development of a high Christology and emphasis on the bread and wine as the body and blood of Christ led many to refrain from communion out of a sense of unworthiness. During the Middle Ages the laity were further excluded from participation in the liturgy by its being said in Latin and, for the most part, in silence. Devotional and theological attention was directed toward the consecration of the bread and wine, which the Scholastics explained by the theory of transubstantiation, while the Mass itself was interpreted as a participation in Christ's sacrifice. To counteract liberties which were taken with the sacrament, strict rubrics were enforced after the Council of Trent, and the Mass remained virtually unchanged for four centuries. More frequent reception of communion was encouraged, but preparation by first going to confession was regarded as the norm. After Vatican II the liturgy was revised with a more patristic model in mind, translated into modern languages, and allowed to be adapted to different cultures. Eucharistic theology returned to an emphasis on the sacred meal, and in that light the reception of communion has greatly increased.

Perhaps the greatest insight to be gleaned from the historical study of the sacraments is that the church has exercised tremendous liturgical creativity in response to pastoral need and cultural change. This creativity has been initiated sometimes within and sometimes outside the limits of Canon Law, but changes which were perceived as beneficial were eventually endorsed by the hierarchy.

Contemporary Human Sciences

The human sciences which have emerged in the modern era have shed additional light on the individual and social dimensions of ritual worship. Researchers and theorists in these fields study the outer and inner behavior of participants in religious rituals (or the records of such behavior) in order to arrive at general conclusions which describe and in some measure explain the human experience of such practices. To the extent that the sacraments are similar to practices in other religions, the conclusions of these investigators can be used to understand the Catholic experience of worship.

The history of religions and comparative religions reveal similarities between types of rituals and the symbolism they employ to refer to sacred mysteries and unseen realities. Almost all religions make use of initiation rites to mark a person's entry into a religious group or into a special class within that group. The initiate's new status is often signified by distinctive clothing and other appropriate symbols, such as the white garment which is received in baptism and the vestments which are worn in ordination. Transition rites, which are similar but broader in scope, designate passage from one condition to another within the larger religious community. Confirmation, when separate from baptism, can be perceived as such a ritual, as can matrimony, although marriage also brings with it duties and privileges which could qualify it as an initiation rite. Healing rites can be employed to effect either spiritual or physical well-being or both, especially in cultures which do not distinguish sharply between the two. Anointing of the sick, in its original and present forms, can be seen as being for both physical and spiritual healing, but in the later Middle Ages it was primarily for spiritual healing. Penance has always been a sacrament of spiritual healing, but as its new designation as the sacrament of reconciliation implies, the rite has also been an instrument of social healing. Ritual meals and sacrifices are also common in the world's religions, and it is understood better today than in the past why the two are usually found together. The essence of sacrifice is not killing or destruction but self-giving, symbolized by the sharing of food (that necessarily has to be prepared in some way), which results in an experience of communion. In the eucharistic liturgy all of these aspects are found: the self-giving of Christ to the Father and to the church, and the self-giving of the assembly to their Lord and to one another, recalled and symbolized in thankful offering and communion.

Although the above topologies are mainly for the purpose of classification, understanding the different types of rites provides helpful insights into the Catholic sacraments. An anthropologically more accurate understanding of sacrifice, for example, helps correct misunderstandings which were prevalent in medieval interpretations of the Mass, and a deeper appreciation of the nature of religious meals can help in the preparation of liturgies to highlight the dynamics of self-giving and communion. Similarly, specifying confirmation as a transition ritual raises questions about the nature of the transition which is celebrated in that sacrament, and leads to an examination of how Christians are or should be different after they are confirmed.

The sociology of religion and religious anthropology study the social aspects of religion present and past, including the social aspects of religious ritual. Arnold van Gennep (The Rites of Passage, 1960) in a now classical work on "rites of passage" has shown how initiation and transition rites contain the same basic three-fold structure. At the beginning of the rite, the subject or subjects of the ritual are in one condition, at the end of it they are in a different condition, and during their participation in the ritual they are strictly speaking in neither condition but in a state of passage from one to the other. The bride and groom at a wedding, for example, are neither single nor married while the ceremony is being performed but in transition from the single to the married state. Similar descriptions could be given for ordination, baptism and confirmation. The same analysis could be analogously extended even to healing rites, which effect a passage from a condition of illness to one of well-being. The traditional Catholic insistence that the sacraments are effective rituals (that they "effect what they signify") is thus supported by the findings of the human sciences.

In contrast to rites of passage are rites of intensification, which celebrate a condition already achieved and intensify the awareness of it. The ceremonies of religious feasts (such as Christmas and Easter) and of secular holidays (such as Thanksgiving and Independence Day) celebrate not something new but something already real and present in the life of the community. Participation in the rituals intensifies the awareness of the realities being celebrated. Of the seven sacraments, eucharist alone is primarily a rite of intensification, celebrating the reality of unity with and in Christ, although all rituals can intensify the awareness of the sacred realities symbolized. Important to point out in this context is the necessity of the actual presence of the reality being celebrated. To the extent, for example, that a parish lacks real unity as a cohesive body of Christ, there is less to celebrate than could otherwise be the case.

It is possible, however, for ritual to create as well as to reflect human realities. As a result of initiation and transition rites, for instance, human beings actually become something that they were not prior to the performance of the rite, e.g., members of the church, priests, married persons. Because they embody and communicate the ideas and values of a religious group, rituals also invite participants to believe more firmly in those ideas and to live according to those values. Nevertheless, rituals are not automatically effective in this way, but only to the extent that the rites vividly convey a convincing sense of the reality that they symbolize, and to the extent that participants actually perceive the ritual as revelatory of a sacred reality.

From the perspective of the sociology of knowledge, religious rites such as the sacraments perform a number of cognitive functions, some of which have already been alluded to. They have a unifying function since they gather a group in common performance around common symbols, thus enabling the members to perceive themselves as united in faith. They have a legitimating function since they publicly express values, beliefs and hopes, and thus give these ideas and ideals an objective standing in the social world. They have a communicating function since they pass knowledge of the religion from one generation to the next and from the more to the less initiated members of the community, and provide a social space in which to internalize that knowledge. They also have what may be termed a prophetic function inasmuch as they symbolically speak out the deepest beliefs and highest values of the group, calling the members to live out in their everyday lives what they say about themselves in ritual.

On the one hand, generalizations such as these may be taken as descriptions of what occurs in sacramental rituals, but on the other hand they can also serve as prescriptions of what ought to be happening during these celebrations. That is, they provide heuristic clues as to what is often occurring during the ceremonies, but they also provide general norms as to what ought to be occurring in and for the religious community. To the extent that a particular celebration fails to fulfill these functions, liturgists and congregations have reason to examine their performance and participation in the sacrament in order to discover and correct the shortcomings in the next celebration.

This attitude of critical self-examination can help overcome the complacency which is endemic to all rituals inasmuch as the language of ritual is commonly declarative. That is, the words of the rite overtly declare what is happening in and through the ritual and only covertly disclose what ought to be happening but might in fact not be happening in any particular instance or series of instances. For example, in the baptism of an infant the words declare that the child is beginning a new life of faith in Christ, yet in a particular instance it might actually be the case that the parents have no intention of raising the child as an active member of the church. The same sort of analysis could also be extended to couples who want a church wedding but who do not fully appreciate the implications of Christian marriage, to young people who allow themselves to be confirmed but who are not in a position to live out their commitment, and to congregations that attend Mass every Sunday but are hardly a community who know one another and give themselves in service to one another.

Turning attention from the participants in the ritual to the celebration itself, one can search for shortcomings in the ritual that might be surmounted by more careful liturgical planning or more deliberate liturgical performance. Sacraments which do not unite participants but allow individuals to look on as scattered spectators, or which do not communicate but speak their message weakly and obscurely, are not living up to their full potential as symbolic acts of a religious community. An analysis of the sacraments from a variety of sociological perspectives can intensify the awareness of what they are and what they ought to be, not only generically as rituals but also specifically as celebrations of the particular realities they purport to symbolize. Such a study can help to perfect the congruence between the symbolic act and the living out of what the symbols refer to in the church.

Language, Symbol and Religious Psychology

The relation between symbols and what they symbolize has been an object of investigation in a number of human sciences ranging from philosophy to linguistics and from sociology to psychology. On the one hand, all language is conceded to be symbolic to a greater or lesser extent, and on the other, any symbol system has many of the properties of a language. Just as a language has a grammar and syntax which govern the proper use of words, a symbol system is governed by rules which determine the proper use of symbols.

In Christianity these rules are supplied by nature, tradition and doctrine. Natural symbols such as water, fire, light and darkness have a spontaneous propensity to convey meanings analogous to their symbolic forms, for example, refreshment, warmth, goodness and evil. Traditional symbols such as oil and the laying on of hands can convey meanings such as healing and empowerment, but only to those who are familiar with their traditional significance, since their use in ritual is somewhat removed from their occurrence in everyday life. Doctrine also governs the use of symbols, sometimes restricting the range of appropriate symbols as in the case of bread and wine for the eucharistic meal, but always designating the specifically Christian meaning of the symbols.

One reason for the doctrinal regulation of symbols is that in themselves symbols can have a variety of disparate meanings, not all of which are intended in any given symbolic act. At the same time, however, this richness of potential meaning is what gives symbols their power in ritual. Unlike ordinary words that have commonly accepted and well understood meanings, and unlike simple signs that have a one-to-one correspondence to what they signify, symbols can convey many meanings simultaneously. Water, for example, can mean not only refreshment and cleansing but also destruction and drowning. Touching can convey meanings of healing, forgiveness and empowerment. Eating can symbolize nourishment, sharing and communion. Even when some one meaning is intended in the symbolic act, other meanings may be evoked consciously or unconsciously.

This depth and richness of symbolism is one reason why psychology has been brought to bear on the understanding of symbolic ritual. The depth psychology of Carl Jung (Psychology and Religion, 1960) suggests not only that all symbols connect with hidden meanings in the personal unconscious of individuals but that some symbols point to universal meanings in the collective unconscious of all human beings. Many of these so-called archetypal symbols are natural symbols in the sense discussed above, but some of them have more to do with human nature than with the world of nature, referring to birth and death, strength and weakness, masculinity and femininity, age and youth, wisdom and folly. When symbolic rituals connect with these universal human meanings, they arouse feelings for what is most fundamental in life and a sense of solidarity with all who share the experience of being human.

If religion is taken in its etymological sense of binding back or reconnecting, religious ritual can be understood as providing opportunities in the life of the individual or community wherein they can feel reconnected with divine and transcendent mysteries. Such religious experiences have been termed hierophanies or manifestations of the sacred by Mircea Eliade (The Sacred and the Profane, 1959) in his work on the history of religions. Those who enter affectively and intentionally into a religious ritual find themselves psychologically transported from the world of ordinary space and time to a realm of sacred space and time in which the most meaningful realities become manifest to them. In this altered state of consciousness the participants encounter the divine and respond to its presence, acknowledge its truth and importance in their lives, and perceive its relevance to the human situation which is the occasion for the ritual.

This state of being in felt relationship with the transcendent has been variously described in the psychology of religion. William James (The Varieties of Religious Experience, 1932) called it a feeling of objective presence and a sense of the palpably real. Rudolph Otto (The Idea of the Holy, 1950) referred to it as the experience of the holy, something at once both awesome and fascinating, utterly different and profoundly entrancing. Victor Turner (Forests of Symbols, 1967) termed it a state of liminality, a condition on the edge of the ordinary but not entirely divorced from it, in which the sense of unity with the divine and community with others is heightened.

This type of human experience, found not just in Christianity but in all religions, suggests an experiential basis for some of the basic terminology in Catholicism's understanding of its sacraments. The most obvious is the doctrine of the real presence with regard to the eucharist, but to this must be added the belief that the presence and action of God are found in all the sacraments. The theology of sacramental grace, which at times seems very abstract and theoretical, is arguably rooted in experiences of God's graciousness encountered in sacramental worship. The new life which is begun through baptism, the strengthening which is attributed to confirmation, the forgiveness which is received in confession, and the healing which is bestowed through the anointing of the sick are all concepts which can be correlated to religious experiences. Likewise, the bond of marital love and the empowerment of priestly ministry can be understood as sacred realities which are perceived as initiating in their fullness from an assent to their disclosure in a sacramental moment.

Just as the sociological analysis of sacramental worship can reveal both what is and what ought to be occurring in the life of a religious community, so also a psychological analysis can reveal what is and ought to be happening for participants in symbolic rituals. To the extent that the symbols are actually functioning as symbols connecting or reconnecting participants with transcendent realities, religious persons encounter sacred meaning in the realm sacred time and space. To the extent that the symbols fall short of their purpose, however, participants fail to encounter the sacred and their experience is little different from their ordinary awareness of themselves and the world around them.

As suggested earlier, this shortfall may be traceable to inadequacies in the performance of liturgical rites which fail to evoke an experience of the sacred in the participants. In this case the performance itself has to be examined to determine what improvements could be made in order to elicit the appropriate response. But the shortfall may on the other hand be traceable to inabilities in the participants themselves to enter the realm of the sacred, in which case the participants' psychological capacity for ritual needs to be examined.

This psychological inability to fully engage in symbolic ritual or to fully appreciate its effects may be due to a number of factors both individual and cultural. Developmental psychology, especially the work of Erik Erikson (Toys and Reasons, 1977), suggests that individuals acquire the ability to engage in ritual through a series of stages, each of which builds upon and complements the preceding ones as the individual matures. Inadequate mastery of the earlier stages has a negative effect on the individual's ability to complete the later stages, and in the case of religious ritual such incompleteness could well result in an individual's going through the outward motions without having the inner experiences to which the rite symbolically refers.

The remedies for such incomplete development would seem to lie in religious education and catechesis, especially in preparation for the sacraments, through which individuals could be helped to understand the nature of religious ritual, appreciate its symbolism, and perceive its relevance to their lives. Moreover, since individuals develop not only during childhood but also through various phases of adult maturing, such efforts need to extend through the entire life cycle. This is true not only for sacraments which mark passages into different stages of the Christian life, but also for those which, like eucharist and reconciliation, are celebrated regularly.

Ritual and Culture

More difficult to remedy is an incapacity for ritual that may arise not on an individual but on a cultural level. Anthropologist Mary Douglas (Natural Symbols, 1973) has observed that in stable and socially stratified cultures, people enter more easily into ritual and are willing to be governed by its symbolized values and ideals, whereas in changing and socially mobile cultures people do not find ritual as meaningful. Along the same lines, Robert Bellah (Habits of the Heart, 1986) and others have argued that the individualism and pragmatism of contemporary culture make it difficult for people to affirm common beliefs such as those embodied in traditional religious ritual apart from those which have practical or personal significance.

One solution to this modern cultural trend would be to exercise tight canonical controls on the performance of the sacraments and strict doctrinal controls on their allowable meanings. This approach would have some sociological benefits for the institutional church inasmuch as the public celebration and interpretation of the sacraments would be clearly defined for those within and outside the church. On the other hand, given the diversity of global cultures in which Catholicism finds itself and the general fluidity of post-industrial culture, this approach would seem to be of questionable utility in meeting the diverse psychological needs of individuals and groups in those cultures. A more complex but potentially more satisfactory solution would seem to lie in the direction of permitting responsible experimentation in catechesis and celebration under broad canonical guidelines in order to discover ways to make the sacraments as meaningful and effective as possible.

Conclusion

The full range of human sciences could be enlisted in such an endeavor to revitalize the sacraments in a variety of cultures and local situations. Psychology could help to understand the cognitive and affective impact of different ritual styles on different ethnic and age groups. Sociology could help to uncover the group dynamics which work best catechetically and liturgically. History could at once provide both examples from the past and instruction in pastoral sensitivity for creatively meeting the needs of the church both local and universal. And philosophy could supply a number of intellectual frameworks for interpreting the sacraments in ways that are theologically in keeping with the fundamental doctrines of Christianity.

IMAGINATION AND WORSHIP

Imagination is itself an “imaginative” word. In contrast to words like analysis, reflection, or explanation, which tend to narrow the focus of attention towards ordering, clarification and understanding, the term imagination, along with its verbal ally creativity, is evocative, opens out, points to the world of the new, the untried, the possible. Imagination plays many roles in its relation to Christian worship. Four will be examined here: (a) imagination in its popular sense as “creative” of worlds, i.e., worlds of fantasy, of fiction, of “make believe”; (b) imagination as a practical tool for planning and serving liturgical acts; (c) imagination as a personal appeal to human affections; and (d) imagination as a theological resource and an agent in human conversion. The overall aim is to uncover the service which imagination renders to the church in the worship of God and to God in the salvation and redemption of the world.

Imagination and the Creation of Worlds

In its popular sense imagination is a power to create new worlds. It produces Oz, Middle Earth, the Enterprise, Gotham City, the First and Second Foundations. It peoples these worlds with creatures of great variety: hobbits and Vulcans, witches and wizards, animals that talk and trees that walk. It sets people on great adventures and gives them bold undertakings. The worlds of imagination parallel our own, follow their own rules, offer their own terrors and delights. At first glance, imagination in this popular sense would seem to have little or nothing to do with Christian worship. A second glance, however, yields just the opposite.

The imaginative creation of worlds has a very definite role to play in Christian worship. Worship brings us into the reign of God, and the reign of God, as scripture portrays it, is not unlike some of the magical worlds of fiction and fantasy. The reign of God is inhabited by angels with six wings (two to cover their face, two to cover their feet, and two with which to fly), who touch coals to the prophet's tongue and give new boldness to the prophet's heart (Is 6:1-10); by dry bones that take on new flesh and new life (Ezek 37-6); by a woman who brings forth a child and a dragon who waits to devour it (Rev 12:1-6). It is peopled by children who die for the Prince of Peace, by a rider on a white horse, by a Lamb who opens scrolls. It is a land where milk and honey freely flow; a field where creatures cast themselves before a throne and cry “Worthy” (Rev 5:1-6:4). It is a world where a young boy sold into slavery rises to save both his family and his nation; where seas are parted and shepherds become kings, where devils are cast out and lame beggars walk. It is a mustard seed, a pearl of great price, a new city descending from on high. And it has its own rules. In the reign of God the poor are rich, the lowly are raised up, the dead are brought back to life. In the reign of God a carpenter turns his gaze to a city that welcomes, rejects, and then stands humbly and silent before him.

The worlds of fantasy delight those who enter them. They create new affinities among people; they fire up vision; they inspire great and noble deeds. They produce laughter and wonder, romance and bravado, and they awaken, as they say, the "little child" that resides in all of us. The reign of God is likewise a world that delights: lambs and lions play together and people rejoice as at a wedding feast. It summons forth hermits who dwell in its wonder, missionaries who travel far to tell its tale, martyrs who embrace even death in the serenity of its hope and its promise. And its cardinal rule? Unless you become as a little child, you cannot enter the reign of God.

In the action of Christian worship, men and women encounter God and enter into God's reign. There they meet all the creatures who inhabit God's reign, and form with them a voice that cries: "Holy," "Worthy," "Hosanna," "Amen." In Christian worship new relationships are forged, a wonderful vision is set out, and noble deeds are inspired and set in motion. Imagination is a powerful force to signify the holy deeds of God and to draw men and women mightily into those deeds. While it may seem at first glance that this popular sense of the imagination can have little or nothing to do with Christian worship, on second glance it is very much at worship's core.

Imagination and the Liturgical Act

Beyond the popular level, however,

imagination means more than the creation of worlds. It is also a practical tool that serves both in planning and in bringing to life the liturgical actions of the church at prayer. Liturgical ritual is presented to the church in the most meager form of written text interspersed with even more meager rubrics or directives for its enactment. It falls to imagination to help transform those written texts into living actions by which people may "express in their lives and manifest to others the mystery of Christ and the nature of the true church" (S.C., 2). Imagination fulfills this task in three primary ways: translation, adaptation and creation.

Translation immediately suggests linguistic translation, e.g., from Latin text into English text. This is the narrowest sense of translation, and but the first undertaking of the practical imagination. Where linguistic translation needs to be made, four norms laid down for translation in the Foreward to the English edition of the Roman Sacramentary offer a helpful guide. (a) Translation should aim to preserve the intent and substance of the original; it should not be a literal transmission of each individual word. (b) The unit of meaning is the whole passage, not the individual word. (c) Translation should not exaggerate the importance of individual phrases to the extent that it weakens the meaning of the whole. (d) Some expressions may need to be paraphrased in order to concretize them for the celebration and needs of today.

In its larger sense, translation is from written text to liturgical act. This is not simply a piece by piece enactment, much less a mere recital, of the written text. There is substance and intent to every ritual act, and to each part of the ritual act, and this substance and intent need to be preserved and served.

The four norms given above for linguistic translation can serve this larger translation task as well. The ritual act is analogous to the linguistic sentence; it has its own proper order, logic, structure, and patterns of meaning. As with the sentence, so with the ritual act, it is the whole more than the individual pieces that is to be served. The unit of meaning is the sections of the ritual rather than the individual prayers or gestures that comprise it. Individual elements ought not be exaggerated in importance to the extent that the ritual section or the ritual as a whole is weakened or distorted. Some prayers already translated and possibly paraphrased may need to be paraphrased even further, and some ritual actions may need the non-verbal analogue of paraphrasing, to concretize them for the celebration and needs of today.

The liturgical documents recognize that even this larger sense of translation may not be sufficient in the transit from liturgical text to liturgical act. Adaptation may be required as well. "Even in the liturgy the Church has no wish to impose a rigid uniformity in matters that to not affect the faith or the good of the whole community" (S.C., 37). Two levels of adaptation are envisioned. "Provisions shall also be made, even in the revision of liturgical books, for legitimate variations and adaptations to different groups, regions and people. . . ." (S.C., 38). "In some places and circumstances, however, an even more radical adaptation of the liturgy is needed" (S.C., 40).

A careful use of imagination is required in the process of adaptation. Two dangers in particular present themselves. The first is superficiality, the transfer from one symbolic form to another without sufficiently grasping the intent, the purpose, or the symbolic context of either. The suggestion to use pizza and coke for eucharist with teenagers on the grounds that this is their "common food" is an example of such superficial transfer. The second is a form of rationalism, the transfer to a new symbolic form based on an idea drawn from the old form. Reduction of the flowing waters of the baptismal font to a sarcophagus-shaped pool to represent the death into which one is baptized is an example of rationalistic transfer. Imagination needs to grasp the emotional content or affect of a symbol as well as its suggestive possibilities, and not simply its "meaning," before it can successfully bring forth true symbolic adaptation.

Finally, there is creation. At times new symbolic forms need to be forged. The danger here is to think that symbols can be created ex nihilo, and to forget that it belongs to God alone, and not to humans, to create from nothing. The "bottom line" norm set down in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy for liturgical creativity is not only liturgically sound, it is symbolically sound as well: "Finally, there must be no innovations unless the good of the Church genuinely and certainly requires them; care must be taken that any new forms adopted should in some way grow organically from forms already existing" (S.C., 23).

Symbols arise to express a depth of experience that cannot be expressed in any other way (Paul Ricoeur). Creation of symbols requires newness of experience. Yet experience itself is guided by existing symbols. New symbols are required, not when the old symbols fail, but when they succeed in taking one to a new experiential depth which they themselves can no longer express. New ideas are born by holding together elements of thought that previously were not held together. New symbols are born by holding together symbolic pieces that previously were not held together. It is in this "bringing together" of what was previously held apart that true creativity lies. A triumphant hymn during the Good Friday adoration of the cross, a menorah candle lit between the new fire and the paschal candle of the Easter vigil, photographs of war victims, hunger victims, victims of those who threaten human life as a modern day "stations of the cross" are but some few examples of such creativity.

This practical task of the liturgical imagination, involving translation, adaptation and creation, can be aided by a simple, five-stage process. These stages constitute the passage from liturgical text to liturgical act; they can serve as a process of liturgical planning as well. The five stages are: (1) preparing the text; (2) dwelling with the text; (3) locating the text; (4) enlivening the text; and, (5) enacting the text. Each of these involves the imagination in a variety of ways.

(1) Preparing the Text

By "text" is meant here the entire collection of prayers, readings, introductions and responses that serve as the basic sub-structure of the liturgy. When the liturgy in question does not have a text given (e.g., a prayer service during a retreat), the first task is to draw on liturgical resources and/or creative talent to construct the text. When the liturgy in question does have a text given, the task involves selection, evaluation, and assessment of intent, purpose and aptness for a particular assembly or occasion. "There must be the utmost care to choose and to make wise use of those forms and elements provided by the Church that, in view of the circumstances of the people and the place, will best foster active and full participation and serve the well-being of the faithful" (G.I.R.M., chap. 1, 5).

Things to note in the text: (a) theme or themes that flow through the text, especially those proper to season or occasion; (b) flow of the ritual (preserving the rhythm, giving major stress to major parts, minor stress to minor parts); (c) language and imagery (being sensitive to employ inclusive language and images that invite participation); (d) appropriateness of various options (e.g., penitential rite may not be proper for some celebrations). The liturgical sources contain a rich mine of materials upon which the liturgical imagination can train itself; it is rarely necessary, and seldom possible, to create texts ab ovo.

(2) Dwelling with the Text

The aim here is to come in touch with the inner spirit of the text. This can serve the imagination in coming to a deeper sense of the sub-structure of the text (its inner "feel" or affect). A helpful process: read the liturgical text aloud; identify what stands out; try to name why it stands out; identify clusters of sentiment and mood; put the scripture readings and the inner spirit together in some context of prayer. This second phase is not concerned with concrete details of planning, and should not turn to that too soon. Its aim is to bring the imagination into the inner spirit of the particular liturgical text which it seeks to translate into prayer.

(3) Enlivening the Text

Drawing on the mood surfaced in (b), and with respect for the dynamics of the individual parts of the text, the attempt here is to discover the proper medium of expression for the text and its various parts. Concern is for music (what parts are best expressed in musical mode), movement (are there gestures or movements that need to be incorporated), ritual action (what actions suggest themselves or are integral to the text, and how best to enact them). One has imagined at this point an already highly translated liturgical text: the "enlivened" text. It is with this text the imagination should continue to work.

(4) Locating the Text

Two things are involved here: the proper use of space to allow the liturgy to begin and the proper use of space that allows the liturgy to unfold. Under the first, it should be remembered that the assembly encounters the space before the action of liturgy begins, and for them at least the liturgy begins in this space. The atmosphere and mood of the space need to be appropriate and integral to the liturgical act that will take place in it. Under the second, it should be noted that different parts of the liturgy call for different space configurations. Attention should be paid to those configurations; they should be such as to allow the intended action properly to take place within them. At the same time, they should not be intrusive on other parts of the liturgy where they are inappropriate.

Questions of space involve more than configurations. The document produced by the U.S. Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (1978), is indispensable for "locating the text." To name just some of the elements which the document sets forth: liturgical space should be hospitable (11), convey a sense of mystery (12), and, quite simply, be beautiful (34). The demands which liturgy places on liturgical space and all that fills it are two: quality (20) and appropriateness (21).

(5) Enacting the Text

Text is not liturgy until the people assemble and begin to act. As the liturgy unfolds, proper ministries should be observed and the ministers should be competent to fulfill the assigned ministries. People should be appointed in advance, trained (in walking, reading, speaking, moving, etc.), and urged to carry out their ministry prayerfully. The rhythm and flow of the liturgical action need to be respected, and anything abrupt, haphazard or simply sloppy needs studiously to be avoided. It is important that as many ministers as possible engage in the planning. This way they will grasp both the inner spirit and the outward flow of the liturgical action which they are responsible to enact.

Imagination and Human Affections

As the liturgical act begins to unfold, imagination takes on yet another liturgical task. It serves the action of grace by appealing to and shaping human affections. Imagination here takes on a more profound meaning than either the creation of worlds or the practical transit from liturgical text to liturgical act. It becomes, as William Lynch names it, "all the resources of man, all his faculties, his whole history, his whole life, and his whole heritage, all brought to bear upon the concrete world inside and outside of himself, to form images of the world, and thus to find it, cope with it, shape it, even make it" (Christ and Prometheus, p. 23). Within the liturgical act imagination becomes a power of the human person to reconstruct reality: to liberate from bondage, to transform one's image of oneself, to reshape the way the world sees itself. Within the liturgical act imagination brings new life to the human spirit, and in so doing, can change persons, relationships, indeed the course of human history itself.

To understand the importance and scope of this task, four points of contrast between the pre- and post-conciliar church need to be noted. First, in the 1917 Code of Canon Law sacraments were treated under the heading "de rebus, on things"; they are treated in the revised Code (1983) under the heading "The Office of Sanctifying in the Church." Second, before the council sacraments were seen as vehicles of grace to be conferred by the proper minister and in the proper form upon the recipients; in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy they are liturgical acts of the church in assembly, actions "of Christ the Priest and of his Body which is the Church" (S.C., 7). Third, prior to the council the sign value of sacraments was not given primary treatment in the question of sacramental efficacy; Christ was the agent, and his agency was governed by the minimal observance of matter and form. In the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, the sign value of sacraments is strongly linked to sacramental efficacy: "In the liturgy, by means of signs perceptible to the senses, human sanctification is signified and brought about in ways proper to each of these signs" (ibid.). Finally, the conception of grace as conferred by sacraments was somewhat reified in pre-conciliar sacramental theology: grace as thing. Post-conciliar sacramental theology embraces the conception of grace formulated by E. Schillebeeckx (grace as encounter) and by K. Rahner (grace as a free offer of God's own self).

In the post-conciliar church, therefore, sacraments are envisioned as liturgical events in which God graciously offers God's own self to men and women and seeks to call out from them a free and generous surrender to God's action within them. Since this is done through the medium of signs and symbols, imagination is very much involved in the process. And since the offer is made to the human heart, the desires and the affections of those who enact sacraments are likewise very much involved in the process.

Within the liturgical act, the primary task of imagination is to make God's offer powerful and commanding, and to effect receptivity and response on the part of those to whom it is offered. Imagination can do this only by making appeal to human affections. The action of God cannot be forced or imposed. God's offer is a free gift of love, and must wait upon a free response of love in return. The images set forth in Christian liturgy are not the only images that claim and operate in human life. The resistance to grace, which theology names sin, is also the operation of imagination and affection. The affections of sin are powerful. Christian faith does not diminish, much less erase them. It simply proclaims that the affections of grace are stronger, and more humanly true, and sets forth its own images of faith in the hope that their appeal will be stronger, and that in freedom people will be drawn to embrace them. It sets forth in images the action and desires of God. Imagination serves these by awakening desires in and appealing to the affections of those whose Amen, i.e., free surrender, God desires.

D. Saliers identifies the importance of affections in the human relationship with God: "The concept of affection designates a basic attunement which lies at the heart of a person's way of being and acting. In quite specific ways, our affections qualify our perceptions, our fundamental attitudes, and our behavior" (The Soul in Paraphrase, p. 7). He reminds us that the activities of Christian prayer, and in particular of Christian liturgy, are not just activities. They carry within themselves their own proper affections toward God, toward ourselves and toward each other, affections that are the affections of Jesus Christ himself.

These affections can be powerful in us because Christ himself, as the revelation of God, is likewise the revelation of our own deepest human truth. His affections are not extrinsic or foreign to us; they are our own proper affections, and known to be such, when we touch and are in tune with our own deepest truth. The appeal made by imagination in service of grace is not to graft something alien upon the human heart, but rather to awaken in the human heart what is most properly its own. Christian liturgy exposes human life to itself, and at the same time fashions human life to its own deepest truth.

Imagination in worship, therefore, has a constructive as well as an instructive role to play. The affections are appealed to so that a free response may be given to God. They are at the same time shaped and fashioned in such wise that the more they become the affections of Christ the more they become the true affections of the human heart which the human heart was designed by God to express and follow. Recognition of this identify between what appears to come as imposed from without and what is in fact awakened from within is itself the point of free human response to God's gracious self-offer. Surrender to this identity is salvation and sanctification.

In service of human affections and desires, there are several things both practical and theological that the liturgical imagination must attend to. (a) Both texts and rites should express clearly the holy things they signify (S.C., 21). (b) The symbolic purpose of the rites and symbols is to dispose the faithful to receive the gracious action of God upon them fruitfully and effectively (S.C., 59). (c) Symbols should be employed generously, not sparingly. (d) Symbols gain in power when they are associated with other symbols in a rich "symbolic world" (Ricoeur). (e) Rites and symbols are not designed to communicate information; they convey the personal presence and approach of God; they present God's free offer of love (Rahner). (f) Rites and symbols seek to awaken the response of surrender, Amen, to the approach and action of God. (g) Rites and symbols thus aim to appeal to human freedom and to human affections that humans may choose the way of God over the way of sin. (h) The task of imagination within the liturgical act is to make the ways of God desirable, and to bring one's human affections into such harmony with the affections of Christ that the human affections find there and recognize there their own proper shape and truth.

Imagination and Human Behavior

The final role of imagination which we consider here follows closely upon this last. Imagination serves to transform human behavior and thus serves the process of human conversion.

Ricoeur speaks of the proper response to symbols as "consent wrested from refusal." It is toward that end that imagination needs to make its powerful appeal. Along the path to consent, one must ask, and be guided to ask, "what does this mean to me?" Liturgically this is the deeper sense of participation which S.C. had in mind when it declared: "The Church earnestly desires that all the faithful be led to that full, conscious, and active participation in liturgical celebrations called for by the very nature of the liturgy. Such participation by the Christian people as 'a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people' (1 Pet 2:9) is their right and duty by reason of their baptism. In the reform and promotion of the liturgy this full and active participation by all the people is the aim to be considered before all else. For it is the primary and indispensable source from which the faithful are to derive the true Christian spirit. . . ." (S.C., 14). Participation in the liturgical act is not simply a question of standing, singing, moving, responding; it is finally a question of prayer and conversion.

The existential question includes both meaning and implication for action. As it brings the liturgical rites and symbols to focus on one's concrete human life, it brings both judgment (what does it mean) and possibility for choice (what might it mean). Appeal to the affections contains within itself appeal to behavior as well. Consent, if freely given, internalizes within oneself that which was presented: God's own presence and action. In such internalization one finds that one both wants to do what God's offer of love suggests and that one can do what God's offer of love suggests. It is both conversion of heart and empowerment for action.

William Lynch presents this under the rubric of hope, itself the affection of desire and yearning. Lynch equates hope with imagination (Images of Hope, p. 23), and offers several characteristics of the way hope "imagines" which must be observed if hope is to liberate one from hopelessness and bondage. Hope imagines the real (it transforms one's actual life; it does not provide escape from it). Hope is not unlimited (not everything can be hoped for; to think so is to fall prey to disillusionment). Hope imagines with (hopelessness emerges at the limits of one's own resources; hope requires the imagination of another). Hope is related to wishing and desire (it arises from deep within the person's affections).

Christian liturgy presents its participants with a real option for human life, the way first lived by Jesus Christ. It addresses the participants, not at a superficial level of their life, but at its core, where their own deepest desires as human persons emerge. It presents the imagination of the Other who is capable of seeing into human life far beyond our own limited view, and who therefore can lead us deeper into its mystery. And it does this, not simply by cognitive instruction, but rather by actively engaging us in the behavior that is proper to life in God. In Christian liturgy we do heal, we do forgive, we do greet each other in peace. The way of Christ is presented not as something we might possibly some day be able to live ourselves; for a brief moment in Christian liturgy we do in fact live it. At this point imagination is more than appeal to affection. It is itself the conversion of life, the restructuring of reality according to the ways of Christ. It is not only the actual (as lived by Christ) made possible; it is the possible made actual in our lives. Imagination is the human encounter with God who graciously offers himself in love and even more graciously gives human life its own proper shape.

Conclusion

We have ranged in this article from the playful to the profound in tracking the role of imagination in Christian worship. We have equally ranged from its service to ritual, as a practical tool to shape those special moments of worship which are named sacraments, to its service to grace, as a power to awaken in the lives of men and women that full and true worship of God which Paul proclaimed at Rome (Rom 12:1-2). Through it all imagination emerges as indispensable to the act of worship. It is clear that without imagination one cannot worship God at all. But more becomes clear as well. As a power to transform all creation toward God, human imagination is itself the worship of God, and the power of God made flesh.

INCENSE, USES OF

The word incense comes from the Latin incendere, which means to burn or to kindle. Most of the substances used as incense come from trees and plants. These substances include aloe, camphor, cloves, sandalwood, cinnamon or cassia, myrrh, frankincense, cedar, juniper, and balsam. The most used among these has been frankincense or olibanum. Frankincense is gum or resin yielded from trees of the boswellia species.

The use of incense was a significant part of religious rites in various cultures of the ancient world. In the pre-Christian world, six uses of incense can be identified: 1) as a sacrifice to the deity; 2) as an exorcism to drive away evil spirits; it was also associated with healing and purification; 3) as a sacrifice to the shades of a deceased human being; 4) to give veneration to a living person; 5) as an accompaniment to processions, offering a touch of flair, festivity and rejoicing; 6) as a refreshing perfume at banquets and other occasions.

Underneath these religious and cultic uses for incense is the practical use that it had in attempting to do away with unpleasant odors such as sweat and putrefaction. Early evidence for the use of incense is found in countries and cultures situated in warm climates, where incense would be necessary in attempting to do away with these unpleasant smells. To offer something pleasant to the nostrils seems to be an important motivation for the use of incense in religious rites and in daily life.

The use of incense was a widespread practice in Jewish religious cult, as is attested to in the Hebrew Scriptures, especially the books of Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers. The meaning of incense is proffered in the psalms. Psalm 141, for example, likens the use of incense to an oblation offered to obtain the protection and the blessing of God.

During the early centuries of the Common Era, Christianity was most reluctant to include the use of incense in its worship. In fact, early Christian writers of the first four centuries denounced the use of incense. No doubt, this reluctance was prompted by the association of incense with emperor worship, the ceremonies of the pagan world and the test of loyalty to the emperor which Christians were forced to endure.

The earliest instance of a Christian use of incense is in the funeral procession of St. Peter of Alexandria in 311. The use of incense at funeral processions portrayed the difference between the Christian and the pagan attitudes to death. The pagan attitude understood death as practically an end, without future prospects. The Christian attitude was one of hope in a world where death had lost its sting. Christian funeral processions, therefore, copied triumphal processions in which incense had an important part.

Christian writers of the 4th century slowly began to change their views on the use of incense. The honorific use of incense to venerate the relics of saints, altars, holy places and persons was initially the most common reason for its usage. The introduction of incense into the offices of matins, lauds and vespers signalled a sacrificial use of incense. In his Commentary on Ps 140, John Chrysostom claimed that the vesper service was basically a penitential rite. The use of incense during vespers was thus given a propitiatory meaning. It expressed the human self-offering of repentance.

By the Middle Ages, complex rubrics associated with the many uses of incense were a part of the Western liturgy. From these usages, three principle meanings of incense came to be identified in the medieval world. First, incense was considered an honorific, by which persons, places and things were given veneration and honor. Second, it was regarded as a propitiatory oblation for forgiveness and repentance. Third, the use of incense was understood as a form of exorcism. This third meaning is attested to in the texts of the blessing of the censer which prayed that the incense would dispel demons and protect persons and places from evil.

The liturgical reforms of the Second Vatican Council have modified the uses of incense. In the Roman rite incense continues to be used in various liturgical ceremonies at the choice and discretion of the ministers. In the celebration of the eucharist, incense, if it is used, is used in the entrance procession, at the proclamation of the gospel and at the preparation of the gifts to incense the offerings, the ministers and the assembly. For the celebration of the liturgy of the hours, the people and the altar may be incensed during the gospel canticle of morning and evening prayer. Incense is used around the paschal candle before the singing of the Easter Praeconium. During the celebration of the dedication of a church building, incense is used to consecrate the eucharistic table. This usage originated in the practice of accompanying the procession of the relics of saints with incense. Relics of saints continue to be imbedded in the altar table during its consecration. Incense is used at the celebration of eucharistic devotions and at the rites of Christian burial. The new rubrics stipulate when incense is to be used, but refrain from attributing a meaning to this usage.

Incense continues to be a constitutive part of the celebration of the liturgy in the Eastern churches; its use in the Roman liturgy, since the reforms of the council, is changing. Pastorally, in some parts of the church, there is a tendency to use incense rarely, or not at all. This seems to be because its usage is seen to be connected with attitudes of triumphalism of a former liturgical order. In future developments, other cultural considerations will influence the frequency and the manner of the use of incense.

RICHARD N. FRAGOMENI

INCLUSIVE LANGUAGE

The term "inclusive language" refers to words intentionally selected to redress the bias inherent in centuries-long use of language employed by the dominant culture. It refers to words, therefore, which remove women from the invisibility and inferiority imposed upon them by such phrases as "mankind," "brotherhood of man," "the weaker sex," etc. It refers to the conscious substitutions of positive phrases in referring to people of color, instead of vilifying expressions like "blackmail," "blackball," "blackguard," etc. And it refers to deliberately chosen words which refer to those who suffer patently observable impairments, calling them "mute," for instance, instead of "dumb," or "differently abled" instead of "disabled" or "handicapped."

Inclusive language emphasizes clarity and honesty. It proceeds from an overriding value-judgment that one race or gender is not superior to another, or that one is not less human for being sense-impaired. Inclusive language identifies the positive and equally important contributions of many different peoples and experiences. Inclusive language pertains to verbal and nonverbal images that describe both humankind and God.

Human or "Horizontal" Language

Discriminatory descriptions of women provide the most common illustrations of the need for inclusive language. Women are categorized as inferior to men. Such sexist or exclusive language evolved from the socio-cultural bias against women, where the nouns "man," "men" and "brothers" and the pronoun "he" refer to both women and men. This androcentric language clearly conveys that male is the norm and female is a subspecies of male. Inclusive language corrects this misconception through both gender-specific language and "emancipatory" language, i.e., words and images that acknowledge the distinctive contribution women make to the fullness of human experience (Procter-Smith). In addition to concerns about gender, inclusive language is sensitive to all examples of implicit bias in our language: race superiority (white is purer than black); physical ability ("rectitude" as a word describing right and "sinister" the left; sheep on the right, goats on the left); and a host of others.

History

A cursory glance at significant moments in linguistic history makes clear that the choice of male pronouns and nouns used generically was based on the patriarchal view of the ordering of society. As early as 1560 there is evidence that grammar was determined by the "natural" order, i.e., man precedes woman. By 1850 an Act of Parliament in England eliminated the use of "he or she" when referring to human beings, substituting "he" alone.

Since the beginning of the 20th century, questions have been raised about androcentric words used generically for all humankind. The most serious challenges have occurred since 1960 in conjunction with the civil rights and women's movements. Linguistic scholars suggest that "true generics" implies equal application. This mutuality does not exist with words such as "man," "brothers," and "men" because no one understands woman to imply man, sisters to include brothers, nor women, men. Instead, the use of such language renders women invisible and implies inferiority. Inclusive language offers one of many necessary correctives for this situation.

Theological or "Vertical" Language

The patriarchal context that influenced

"horizontal" language impacted the development of theological language as well. The primacy of male language for God also was fully acceptable. Recent linguistic and theological thinking raises serious questions about the "normative" character of male imagery for God. It offers fresh interpretations of biblical texts and theological positions long used to undergird traditional arguments for the sole use of male metaphors for God, predominantly Father, though also King, Lord, Master, and Prince. Male language limits the revelation of God and promotes idolatry (the worship of any image of God as though it were God).

Theologians throughout history understand their task as one of relating the nature of God to contemporary experience. Christological doctrines and trinitarian formulas have emerged from such study and debate. In the ongoing explanation of these aspects of human/divine relationship questions appear. One such critique concerns the use of exclusively male metaphors for God. They inherently communicate that God is like a man (especially father) and that men are like God. Such implications undermine the power of women to be images of God as well as to mediate God's grace.

Implications for Sacramental Practice

Invitations of God embodied in the process of preparation for and performance of the sacraments involve an offer of freedom, of access to inexhaustible divine mystery and of a relationship of unimaginable love. This articulation requires utmost sensitivity and honesty. Language restrictions that suggest some human participants in this sacramental encounter are more significant than others, or that God's image is more concretely known through male metaphors rather than female ones, limit the fullness of the encounter. Examples span a spectrum from hymns, prayers, gestures, and models of leadership, which do not express an integrated human community, to "essential" theological formulas which use only male metaphors such as Father, Son and Holy Spirit. (Though some suggest that the Holy Spirit has female referents, pronouns do not ordinarily confirm any such tradition.)

Concerns about inclusive language provide a serious critique of sacramental practice. They challenge the post-conciliar church to examine the theology and ecclesiology embodied in the celebration of sacramental liturgies so that the significance of these moments reflects more honestly the fullness of divine/human relationships.

INCULTURATION OF THE LITURGY

As the title of this essay indicates, our concern is not with inculturation and the liturgy, but inculturation of the liturgy. The focus will be on the process, methods, attitudes, and persons involved in assuring that the liturgy truly reflect the culture of those who celebrate it. While many aspects of the church's liturgy deserve attention, we will reflect for the most part on the eucharistic liturgy.

The larger context, however, for a discussion of the inculturation of the liturgy must be the question of authentic living, giving witness to, and celebrating the Christian faith. The liturgy is surely a privileged area of inculturation, one most tangible. But liturgy is the public celebration of the faith of a particular people, and unless that lived faith is inculturated into the customs and culture of that people, the liturgy will remain foreign or even imposed, rather than flowing from the lives of the people.

The goal desired in inculturation of the liturgy is a eucharistic celebration that is vital, challenging, and liberating. The worshipping community is confronted and comforted by the word of God which is explored in a homily that relates the word to their particular context. Then they are sacramentally linked with the paschal mystery of Jesus Christ and strengthened to go forth and live that mystery in their situation. The eucharist, if truly inculturated, is indeed the source and summit of Christian life, and impels those who actively participate to go forward to witness to that life in the marketplace.

The problem of inculturation of the liturgy arises precisely because, in at least the most recent history of the liturgy, there has been in the Latin Catholic church an emphasis preserving the unity of the church's liturgy, often at the expense of her catholicity. The Tridentine rite had been the predominant form of worship in Latin Roman Catholicism from Trent until the breakthrough of the Second Vatican Council. This meant that even as the church expanded from Europe to North and South America, to India and the Far East, and more recently to Africa, it was this same Roman rite that was uniformly celebrated.

In the movement towards full inculturation, authors speak of degrees or stages of inculturation. A first stage, which is really the absence of inculturation is imposition, where the theology and liturgy of Europe, for example, is exported to the Americas or to Africa, with no input from the receiving culture. A second stage or degree is translation, where at least the local languages are employed in catechesis and liturgy. A third stage would be adaptation, or accommodation. Here minor changes are allowed, and at least some attention and respect is given to the local culture. This is explored in Vatican II in S.C. 37-39. Finally, true inculturation can occur where the local culture is seriously studied and supplies new creative impetus and input for liturgical celebrations. S.C. 40 speaks of this deeper or more radical adaptation. Yet in reality, one must admit that there are only a few examples of such true inculturation, e.g., in the liturgy of Zaire and in certain Indian churches.

Vatican II was clearly part of the recent trend to appreciate cultural diversity and richness. The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, with its fostering of the vernacular language in the liturgy, is simply one small beginning in the more difficult and unexplored moves to inculturation of the liturgy. The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World presents a new appreciation of culture and impels the church to dialogue with the modern world rather than withdraw from it. So too, the Decree on the Missionary Activity of the Church sees mission as flowing from the incarnation of the Word, and states that the same pattern of incarnation must take place in every culture on this earth. The seeds of the Word (semina Verbi) are present in all cultures, and thus the missionary treads on holy ground when he or she encounters another culture. All of these provide a foundation and impetus for inculturation in all areas of Christian life, including in a special way the liturgy.

How does this inculturation take place? What are the attitudes that must be present in church leadership and in the people of God for it to occur? Who actually carries out the challenging task of inculturation of the liturgy? We will attempt to address these key questions through the employment of the pastoral circle. Imagine a circle with three points on its circumference, and with arrows pointing back and forth between the points on the circumference. The first point of the circle represents the rich liturgical traditions of the church going back to the NT. This would also include contemporary official church teaching on the liturgy as in Vatican II as well as the rich diversity of liturgical expression found throughout the Catholic church today. The second point of the circle represents the local community in its particular cultural situation or context. This might be in New York or Nairobi or a small village in India or in Africa. The third point refers to the pastoral or liturgical leadership of that local community—those in charge of planning and celebrating the liturgy.

To assure that a liturgy be truly local and hence inculturated, and yet to assure that it be truly Christian and Catholic, the liturgical leaders need familiarity with the various possibilities of liturgical expression and symbolism offered by the Christian tradition (the first point of the circle). They also need to be immersed in their local culture, so that they know how that particular community gathers, prays, sings, expresses its faith most in accord with their cultural heritage (the second point on the circle). The leadership must of course not act on its own, but always in dialogue with the larger church, and with the authorities of the church. And the leadership (the third point on the circle) must realize that it will succeed only to the extent that it calls forth and involves the gifts, talents, and sensibilities of the community for which it is responsible. Liturgy is indeed the public prayer of the people, of the local community, and it must be an expression of their faith and their struggle for a life of justice, their living the Kingdom vision. Thus in the moving to a truly inculturated liturgy, it is the entire community that must eventually take responsibility for the liturgy, even if in its formative stages this will depend heavily upon the liturgical leaders and their collaborators.

Inculturation of the liturgy thus must occur in every local church, and not simply be thought of as applying to Africa or Asia. As a matter of fact, the need for inculturation can be seen most clearly in non-Western cultures. But the need for it can also be seen in a black or Hispanic parish in the U.S. So too, a liturgy for children or you should have a different tone than one for adults, and a liturgy in the heart of New York City must be somewhat different from one in a rural area of Montana. Thus every Christian community has the challenging task of celebrating the liturgy in a manner that is faithful to the Christian tradition (represented by the first point on the circle) and appropriate to its particular context (the second point on the circle).

There are several areas of inculturation of the liturgy, just as there are degrees of inculturation. One might begin with the language of the celebration or with liturgical vestments that better reflect local culture and clothing. The music might be adapted to employ local instruments. Yet these are only small beginnings. Every aspect of liturgy must be creatively examined, including the time and space for the celebration, the gestures and postures (sitting rather than kneeling), the forms of prayer (more use of litany/responses), art and architecture (local or imported stations of the cross), images and symbols that grow from the religious and cultural sensibilities of the people, the mode of leadership (individual or communal, male and/or female). Even the basic elements of the celebration, food and drink, become part of the search of the local community for ways in which to live and celebrate liturgically its Christian faith. If this community, led by the Spirit, with the help of liturgical expertise, and in union with the universal church, creatively and faithfully expresses its faith, then it will in turn be contributing to the growth of the catholicity of the church. We see this already occurring through the church in Zaire, and through the possibilities it offers both to African Catholics and to the universal church.

How did this creative new liturgical expression originate? One must first recall that the Roman rite even at the time of Vatican II was only one, even if very important, rite of the church. One must see that the form of the liturgy as brought to Africa by the missionaries is indeed one form, and one that can be developed in accord with liturgical principles and guidelines from church authorities. And even within the present rite there is space for and a call for adaptation and limited flexibility. Celebrants should take advantage of the various options now possible for the entrance rite, and for the introduction to the Lord's Prayer, to cite two examples. Then through catechesis and discussion, one begins to encourage the local community to explore its own religious heritage and move to an authentic inculturation of the liturgy for that local community. The local community must keep in dialogue with the larger church. The fact that progress can be made is attested to in the evolution and approval of the Zairean liturgy for certain parts of Zaire. But we must immediately admit that the liturgy of Zaire is the exception rather than the rule, and that for 99 percent of Africa, the process of inculturation of the liturgy has scarcely begun.

Inculturation of the liturgy must be seen therefore as a key part of the ongoing process of any local Christian community in its attempts to truly live and witness to its Christian faith. It is universal and ongoing, that is, called for in every local church, and in every time. Cultures are changing. The forces of technology and modernization are offering new possibilities and challenges to Christian communities. Unless the Christian remains in dialogue with these new developments, his or her faith life and subsequent liturgical life will be out of touch and will have no creative impact on these developing cultures. The mission of the church will suffer.

Finally, and this flows from all we have said, inculturation should become something natural, not added on. It simply is the creative living and celebrating of Christian faith in particular contexts. The fact that at present we must single out and focus on inculturation is an indication that we have failed to be engaged in the ongoing inculturation of the liturgy. Our efforts now are corrective. One looks for the time when these corrective efforts are no longer necessary, when every local Christian community takes seriously its charge and challenge to be truly Christian and be truly local, faithful to and yet not uncritical of its particular culture.

INITIATION, CHRISTIAN

Origins

The source of the Christian ritual of baptism is unclear. The custom appears to have been derived from John the Baptist, but the roots of his practice are in turn uncertain. Some scholars have argued that it was based on the ablutions of the Essene community at Qumran, but these were repeated washings related to the need for ritual purity and do not seem to have included an initiatory baptism. Other scholars have suggested that John was influenced by the baptism of new converts to Judaism, but there is some doubt whether this was being done in his time or whether it was only adopted at a later date. A third possibility is that John's baptism arose out of the tradition of prophetic symbolism in the OT, where mention had already been made of God's people being cleansed with pure water in preparation for the advent of the Messianic Age (see, e.g., Ezek 36:25-28).

Whether the Christian adoption of baptism began with Jesus himself or only within the church after his resurrection cannot easily be resolved. All three synoptic gospels record Jesus' own baptism by John but say nothing of him baptizing his followers. The gospel of John, on the other hand, does not mention Jesus being baptized but does speak of him baptizing others (Jn 3:22, 26; 4:1; but cf., 4:2). Mt 28:16-20 contains the command to baptize all nations, but there are difficulties in accepting this as an authentic saying of the risen Lord.

Whatever its origins, however, from early times it seems to have become the usual custom to initiate new converts into the church through a process which included baptism, performed perhaps in a river, a pool, or a domestic bath-house. What else besides the immersion might have been involved in the initiatory process is not made explicit in the NT. There may possibly have been a preliminary period of instruction, and it is likely that the ritual included a confession of faith in Jesus in one form or another. Some scholars would see the references to a post-baptismal imposition of hands in Acts 8:17f, and 19:5f. as indicating that this too was a regular part of all initiation rites at the time (cf. also Heb 6:2). Others would argue that these descriptions are of exceptional situations and tell us nothing about normal baptismal practice, and would point to the fact that a post-baptismal imposition of hands was by no means a universal feature of the initiation rites of the early centuries, a surprising omission if it were of apostolic origin. Similarly, it is sometimes suggested that behind NT expressions such as "anointed with the Holy Spirit" (e.g., 1 Jn 2:20, 27) lies a liturgical practice of a literal anointing with oil, whereas others would see such references simply as vivid metaphors.

Whatever the ritual practices of early Christianity, what is clear from the NT is that the experience of "becoming a Christian" was interpreted and expressed in a variety of different ways. While Paul's principal image is that of union with Christ in his death and resurrection (Rom 6:3f), in the fourth gospel the focus is on rebirth (Jn 3:3f). The early speeches in the Acts of the Apostles speak of receiving forgiveness of sins and the gift of the Holy Spirit (2:38), and these themes recur in other NT books. The experience is also described as being "enlightened" (Heb 6:4; 10:32; 1 Pet 2:9), as having "put off the old nature" and "put on the new" (Col 3:9-10), and as being marked or "sealed" as God's people (2 Cor 1:22; Eph 1:13; 4:30; Rev 7:3). All these images and metaphors are not intended to constitute a systematic explanation of different things which happen when a person becomes a Christian, but are diverse ways of attempting to describe and understand one and the same reality.

Initiation As Process

The evidence for the practice of Christian initiation becomes more solid in the centuries which followed. Here it is clear that "becoming a Christian" was seen as involving not just a liturgical rite, or even a series of such rites, but rather a process which might take a considerable period of time.

According to the Apostolic Tradition attributed to Hippolytus of Rome (c. A.D. 215), the only extensive description of initiation practice which is extant prior to the 4th century, those who desired to become Christians had to undergo a catechumenate which might last up to three years. In order to enter upon this, they were required to have sponsors who could attest to their capacity to "hear the word" and also to their way of life, because certain occupations were held to be incompatible with Christianity. During this preparatory period the catechumens received regular instruction in the faith, but were not permitted to attend the celebration of the eucharist, nor even to pray together with those who were already baptized or to exchange the kiss of peace with them, since they were regarded as not yet holy. At the end of this time their lives were again examined in order to determine whether they were ready to be baptized, and their sponsors had to bear witness to the fact that they had displayed good conduct while catechumens, especially with regard to works of charity.

Only if this evidence of the genuineness of their conversion was forthcoming were the catechumens permitted to proceed to the next stage of the process, the period of final preparation, which was probably only of a few weeks' duration. During this time those who had been chosen (later called electi at Rome) received a daily exorcism to complete their purification from the evil of the world around them, and fasted for the last two days before the baptismal rite took place which seems to have been at the Easter vigil, though the author does not make this entirely clear. The rites began at cockcrow with the blessing by the bishop of the two oils to be used, the oil of exorcism and the oil of thanksgiving (later termed chrism). When the candidates had removed all their clothing, they made a final renunciation of Satan and were anointed with the oil of exorcism, seemingly intended to ward off evil spirits.

Then they went down into the water and were asked to affirm their belief in God the Father, in Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Spirit. As the candidates made their response to each one of these three credal interrogations, they were immediately immersed in the water, thus expressing the intimate connection between faith and baptism. After coming up out of the water their bodies were anointed with the oil of thanksgiving, and they dried themselves and put on their clothes.

Up to this point everything had taken place where water was available and away from the assembly of the faithful, no doubt as much for the sake of propriety as for reasons of convenience. Now, however, the newly baptized joined the congregation for the remaining post-baptismal ceremonies, which were performed by the bishop himself. He laid his hands on them and said a prayer, and then apparently performed a second anointing with the oil of thanksgiving, this time pouring it on the head alone. Finally, he made the sign of the cross on the forehead of each person and greeted them with a kiss, signifying their acceptance into the community of faith. After this the newly baptized immediately joined in the activities which had been denied to them while catechumens, participation in the prayers the faithful, the exchange of the kiss of peace, and the celebration of the eucharist. When they made their communion for the first time, they received not only bread and wine but also water, to symbolize the inner cleansing of their initiation, and milk and honey, to symbolize their rebirth as children and their entry into the promised land.

Evidence from later centuries confirms that the main outlines of the procedure here described continued to be followed at Rome, even if some of the details varied. The most notable development was an increasing stress upon the association of the bestowal of the Holy Spirit with the post-baptismal prayer and anointing performed by the bishop.

In Syria, on the other hand, evidence from the period before the 4th century reveals a somewhat different pattern of Christian initiation. While some preparation was undoubtedly necessary, there does not seem to have been a formalized catechumenate, nor any exorcism of the candidates. Even evidence for a formal renunciation of evil or an expression of adherence to Christ is lacking prior to the 4th century, although it is probable that something like the latter was normally included. This more meager provision seems to reflect a continuation of the earliest practice in Jewish Christianity, when faith in Christ was viewed as the fulfillment of Judaism and hence converts did not need to reject their old religion, reform their way of life, or receive extensive instruction in order to enter the church.

The initiatory rite itself seems to have consisted simply of an anointing with oil followed by an immersion in water. The anointing appears to have been understood not as exorcistic but rather as an identification with Jesus in his messianic anointing with the Holy Spirit at his baptism in the Jordan. The immersion was accompanied by the minister's recitation of an indicative formula that the person was being baptized "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." It is uncertain at this early date whether the immersion formula was spoken in the active voice, "I baptize you," as is typical of later tradition in the West, or in its passive form, "N. is baptized," as is typical of later tradition in the East.

There were no post-baptismal ceremonies at all, but the eucharist followed directly. Unlike the West, the focus in this tradition was not upon the paschal mystery with its principal motif of participation in the death and resurrection of Christ, but upon such images as adoption, rebirth, and divinization, and its practice does not seem to have been especially associated with Easter.

Later Developments

It was not until the 4th century, when Christianity became the established religion of the Roman Empire, that an increasing measure of standardization of the theology and practice of Christian initiation began to emerge. Thus, the East incorporated both a pre-baptismal exorcism and a post-baptismal anointing which was associated with the giving of the Holy Spirit; and Easter, though not necessarily the paschal vigil itself, became the preferred time for the celebration of baptism and was preceded by a formal period of final preparation of the candidates. Similarly, the West eventually moved the triple profession of faith to a preliminary position and adopted the indicative formula from the East to accompany the immersion.

However, much more significant changes than the arrangement of the details of the rites were beginning to take place. First, the catechumenate itself was declining. After the conversion of the emperor Constantine in the 4th century, large numbers of people wanted to join the church, and not always for entirely laudable reasons. In its enthusiasm to win members, the church tended to welcome them as catechumens without as rigorous an examination of the genuineness of their conversion and of their lifestyle as had earlier been customary. Moreover, those who became catechumens did not always want to proceed quickly to baptism. Since it was thought that the remission of sins which baptism was believed to convey could only be obtained once, there was a widespread tendency to delay baptism itself as long as possible in order to be more sure of winning ultimate salvation. As a result the length of the nominal catechumenate tended to grow, while the "real" cate-chumenate shrank to what had previously been the period of final preparation, now tending to be of six to eight weeks' duration as the season of Lent developed.

The second major change in baptismal practice in the post-Constantinian period came about because it could no longer be assumed that those who came to baptism had already undergone a profound conversion experience either before or during their catechumenate. In response to this difficulty, the style of the initiatory rites began to change and to incorporate elements from pagan mystery religions, especially highly theatrical features designed to produce an intense and lasting psychological impression on the candidates and to bring about a change in their lives. The element of secrecy, which in earlier times had sometimes been a practical necessity because of sporadic persecution, was now regularly employed to add dramatic tension to the occasion, the candidates not being told in advance what was going to happen to them and only having the meaning of various striking pre- and post-baptismal ceremonies explained to them after they had undergone them. Thus, the emphasis of the rites shifted from their being a ritualization of a prior experience to their being a means of effecting that experience.

The candidate was also becoming less an active collaborator in the process and more a passive recipient of it. Early Christian theologians emphasized that the reformation of the candidate's way of life was an essential part of becoming a Christian. Thus, for example, Tertullian could say, "we are not washed in order that we may cease sinning but because we have ceased" (De Penitentia 6), and Origen affirmed that "if someone who is still sinning comes to the bath, he does not receive the forgiveness of sins" (Hom. in Luc. 21). However, as time went by, there was a tendency to stress the reality of the invisible, metaphysical baptismal seal bestowed by God through the performance of the rites, at the expense of the necessity of the visible, external transformation of character evidenced in the catechumenate.

Even more striking changes came about when infants began to replace adults as the normal candidates for initiation. Children had begun to be baptized along with adults at least as early as the end of the 2nd century, and the practice may even go back as far as NT times, though the evidence is uncertain. Nevertheless, the majority of baptismal candidates continued to be adults, and no adaptations were made to the rites when infants were included, except that parents or sponsors had to make the responses on their behalf. Even in the 4th century many children of Christian parents were not baptized until they reached maturity. From the 5th century onwards, however, the initiation of infants began to be much more common, and consequently the baptism of adults declined. This development largely resulted from the same fear of failing to obtain salvation which had in the 4th century caused many to delay baptism as long as possible. The high infant mortality rate of the period, coupled with St. Augustine's teaching on original sin, led to a desire to baptize babies as quickly as possible so that they should not risk dying unbaptized.

It was this transition from adult to infant baptism which finally brought about the disappearance of the catechumenate. Because many baptisms could not be delayed until the Easter season but had to be performed soon after the child's birth, this part of the process was in most places either abandoned altogether or highly compressed so as to form the first few minutes of the baptismal rite itself. In conservative Rome, however, for several centuries babies were still solemnly enrolled in the catechumenate at the beginning of Lent and brought to church on the following Sundays to hear instruction and receive exorcism before their baptism at Easter.

The widespread need for such "emergency" or "clinical" baptisms led to another major development, initiation in the absence of the bishop. The normal practice adopted throughout most of Christendom was for a presbyter to take over the bishop's role in the rites, just as had already happened in the case of the eucharist. Although the bishop continued to consecrate the oils which were to be used, the presbyter performed the rest of the rite, including the blessing of the baptismal water and the post-baptismal anointing. Only at Rome was this procedure not followed. Here the stress upon the bishop's exclusive rite to bestow the Holy Spirit resulted in the whole rite, including the first post-baptismal anointing, being delegated to a presbyter in cases of necessity, but the second anointing, which was unique to Rome, being reserved to the bishop and performed by him at a later time. Because of the small size of dioceses in central Italy, the delay between the two parts of the rite was usually very short.

When in the course of time the Roman usage was imposed upon the whole Western church, however, it did not work nearly as well, not least because of the larger size of dioceses and the greater difficulty in travel. Consequently the delay between baptism and what came to be called confirmation grew longer owing to the rarity of episcopal visits. This problem was compounded by the negligence of parents in bringing their children back to church, on occasions when a bishop was there, for a brief ceremony which did not seem to add anything vital—the child having already been admitted as a communicant member of the church and assured of eternal salvation at baptism. In order to try to remedy this unsatisfactory situation, many provincial councils attempted to fix age limits by which children must have been presented for confirmation and to threaten parents with penalties if this were not done. Although some of these set ages as low as three or even one, higher limits were more common. Gradually, however, these maximum upper age limits began to be thought of as the normal minimum ages for confirmation, and so by the end of the medieval period seven years of age or ever later was generally thought appropriate for this.

This lengthy separation of confirmation from baptism in the West was encouraged by the emergence of a theological interpretation of the rite which regarded confirmation as bestowing an additional gift of grace to strengthen, arm, and equip Christians for the struggles and battles of life; clearly such a gift was better received not immediately after baptism but when most needed as the child grew up. This doctrine of confirmation was derived from a sermon included in the collection known as the False Decretals, published about A.D. 850. Since it was wrongly attributed to a 4th century pope, Melchior (instead of to its real author, Faustus of Riez, a 5th century bishop of no particular importance), it gained wide currency in the centuries which followed and was cited by a number of leading medieval theologians.

Although in this way confirmation became detached from the rest of the initiation process, children still continued to be admitted to communion at their baptism, just as they were in the East where chrismation remained part of a unified rite. In the 12th century in the West, however, with the growth in the doctrine of "realism" with regard to Christ's presence in the eucharistic elements, doubts began to be expressed about the propriety of giving bread to infants, because they would be unable to consume it with sufficient reverence. The obvious solution seemed to be to give communion to them with wine alone. Unfortunately, however, it was not long afterwards that communion from the chalice was withdrawn from all the laity, thus effectively—though unintentionally—excommunicating children. It then became the general rule that they should not be admitted to communion until they reached "years of discretion" (but there was some diversity of interpretation as to what age this was), although in a few places infant communion lingered on until it was finally abolished by the Council of Trent in 1552.

Thus, Christian initiation had ceased to be a process and became instead a series of three separate rites in the West—baptism, confirmation, and admission to communion—widely separated in time from one another and associated now with stages of biological development rather than with spiritual growth. It had also largely become privatized and ceased to take place within the context of the community of faith, and its symbolism had been minimized—the dramatic descent into the baptismal waters, for example, had been replaced by the pouring of a few drops on the candidate's head. Moreover, by the end of the Middle Ages much of its meaning had ceased to be understood by ordinary people and superstitious notions about the significance of the baptismal ceremonies were widespread. Unfortunately, the Council of Trent did nothing to remedy the situation, and the Rituale Romanum (1614) and the Pontificale Romanum (1595) effected no reforms: they merely imposed uniformity of practice in baptism and confirmation respectively and brought to an end local variations. The only change of any significance in the centuries which followed was made by Pius X in 1910, who lowered the age for the reception of communion but not that for confirmation. Thus, with penance also being required before communion, the sequence of initiation now became: baptism—penance—communion—confirmation.

The Reforms of the Second Vatican Council

The results of the revision of the rites of Christian initiation were published in three stages—the rite for the baptism of children of 1969, the rite of confirmation in 1971, and the rite of Christian initiation of adults (R.C.I.A.) in 1972, although the interim English translation of the latter did not appear until 1974 and the final version until 1985, being made mandatory in the U.S. from 1988. The R.C.I.A. is also to be used, with appropriate adaptations, for children who have reached “catechetical age.”

The general introduction to the rites implies that it is the R.C.I.A. which is to be considered normative and the other two rites are to be understood in relation to it. It describes baptism, confirmation, and eucharist as “the three sacraments of initiation” which “closely combine to bring us, the faithful of Christ, to his full stature” (2). With regard to baptism, two images prevail. The first is that of the paschal mystery: “we are freed from the power of darkness and joined to Christ’s death, burial, and resurrection” (1); “we pass from the death of sin into life” (6). The second is that of adoption: “we are called and are indeed the children of God” (2); “baptism . . . makes us sharers in God’s own life and his adopted children. . . . Baptism is a cleansing water of rebirth” (5). The ecclesiological dimension of baptism is also stressed: its recipients “are incorporated into the Church and are built up together in the Spirit into a house where God lives, into a holy nation and a royal priesthood” (4).

While it is affirmed that the Holy Spirit is indeed active in baptism, confirmation is regarded as completing baptism and bringing a special gift of the Spirit. In the general introduction this gift is described exclusively in terms of participation in the mission of Christ, “so that we may bear witness to him before all the world and work to bring the body of Christ to its fullness as soon as possible” (2). Only in the introduction to the separate rite of confirmation and in the Apostolic Constitution Divinae consortium naturae which accompanied it, is the medieval concept of “strengthening” explicitly mentioned.

The unity of the three sacraments is further emphasized in the references to the eucharist in the general introduction, where the ecclesiological and missiological themes are repeated: we participate in communion “so that we may have eternal life and show forth the unity of God’s people . . . and we pray for a greater outpouring of the Holy Spirit, so that the whole human race may be brought into the unity of God’s family” (2).

The R.C.I.A.: Its Contents

The R.C.I.A. is not so much a rite but a process, divided into four periods of time which are linked to one another by three liturgical “steps.” It begins with a period of evangelization and precatechumenate of no fixed duration or structure, during which there is a dialogue between the local church and the inquirer. Only when it is judged that the candidates have attained a basic grounding in Christian teaching, the beginnings of faith and a commitment to a changed way of life is it intended that they should be accepted into the catechumenate itself, and a liturgical rite is provided for this step.

This second period may last for several years (a minimum of one year is prescribed in the U.S.) and consists of formation and maturation, through teaching, through the support of others in the Christian life, through regular participation in the church’s worship, and through active involvement in the church’s mission. Several liturgical rites are provided for use during this time. Of particular note is the expectation that the catechumens will generally be dismissed during worship before the eucharistie celebration itself begins—a dramatic, public sign of their status. For while they are rightly regarded, on the one hand, as “joined to the Church . . . part of the household of Christ” [R.C.I.A., 47], they are not yet fully initiated into its eucharistic fellowship.

When those responsible for the catechumens’ formation (clergy, catechists, godparents, and other representatives of the local church) have determined that they are ready, they may proceed to the next stage, known as the period of purification and enlightenment. This will usually coincide with Lent and is intended as a time of spiritual recollection. The whole local church is involved in the rite of election or enrollment of names which constitutes the “step” to this period. This rite usually takes place on the first Sunday of Lent and is presided over by the bishop. Further rites follow during the season: the elect are publicly scrutinized about their intentions and exorcized on the third, fourth, and fifth Sundays; and they are formally presented with the Creed and the Lord’s Prayer at a convenient public celebration and expected to recite them back on a subsequent occasion. All this closely adheres to ancient Roman custom.

The third step, the sacraments of initiation themselves—baptism, confirmation, and the eucharist—will then normally take place within the Easter vigil, though some preparatory rites may be done at an earlier assembly of the elect on Holy Saturday. This transfer of the subordinate parts of the rite gives the central elements a bold simplicity. After the homily at the vigil Mass, the ministers, the elect and their sponsors go to the font for the blessing of the baptismal water. The elect then make their renunciation of evil and the profession of faith and are immediately baptized. In order to give fuller symbolic expression to the meaning of the baptism, the use of immersion is encouraged, and the baptism is followed by further “explanatory rites”—the anointing of the head with chrism; a sign of incorporation into the priestly, prophetic, and kingly body of Christ; the clothing in a white robe, a sign of entry into the new creation; and the presentation of a lighted candle, a sign of the enlightenment of Christ. Unfortunately, the effect of these post-baptismal rites is somewhat diminished by the fact that the second is optional, and the first, though an ancient part of the Roman tradition, is only to be used in the rare situation where confirmation is for some reason deferred.

In normal circumstances, however, confirmation follows immediately. This is made possible by the provision that it may be administered by presbyters and not only by the bishop, to whom it had traditionally been restricted in the Roman rite. The intention is not to deprive the bishop of a part in the initiatory process but to signify more clearly its unified nature and to suggest that the bishop’s true role is to preside, where possible, over the whole sequence, including the rite of election and the other Lenten catechumenal liturgies. The confirmation prayer asks for the traditional sevenfold gifts of the Spirit, and the formula accompanying the anointing is modeled on that used for chrismation in the East and speaks of sealing with the Holy Spirit. The presiding minister greets the newly confirmed and the eucharist continues with the preparation of the gifts, in which some of the newly baptized take part.

There is yet one more stage to the process, and that is the period of post-baptismal catechesis or mystagogia, for initiation does not end with the celebration of the paschal sacraments, but is a continuing reality as the newly baptized are absorbed into the body of the church and strengthened on their way. It is suggested that this be a feature of the Sunday Masses of the Easter season and involve some form of final celebration on Pentecost Sunday. In the U.S. this mystagogy is to be extended until the following Easter with assemblies at least once a month to avoid the problem of the newly baptized being simply cast adrift instead of being fully incorporated into the life and mission of the local community.

The R.C.I.A.: Its Vision

It has been said that the importance of the R.C.I.A. lies "less in its ceremonial details than in its strategic vision of the church local and universal" (Aidan Kavanagh, The Shape of Baptism, p. 127). The image of the church depicted here is of a people brought together by a common experience of conversion and faith in Jesus Christ and endowed with new life in the Spirit through baptism. This is something which has an effect not only on the catechumens themselves but on all the faithful, who are thereby called to reflect on the quality of their own spiritual life and to seek the renewal of their faith. The church is also portrayed as committed to the mission of its Lord through evangelization, conversion, catechesis, and sacramental celebration. Moreover, this task is understood as belonging not merely to clergy alone but to all the baptized; the whole community of faith is involved, not just by witnessing it taking place in their midst, but by actively participating in the variety of ministries which are required (R.C.I.A., 9-16).

The R.C.I.A.'s return to the patristic heritage of the church is not simply a piece of antiquarianism but reflects a renewed understanding. Christian initiation is not a single sacramental moment or event but a gradual process, the duration of which cannot be definitively prescribed. Nor is it just something which is done to the catechumen. It requires active participation in a spiritual journey of response to God's grace. Because its later stages are closely related to the dynamic of the liturgical year, this journey is understood as culminating in entry into the paschal mystery. Thus, catechesis is here understood not primarily as doctrinal instruction but as conversion, that is, allowing one's whole life to be transformed according to the gospel of Jesus Christ. Furthermore, this is not something undertaken by individuals in isolation but within the context of the community of faith into which they are steadily being drawn.

The implementation of the vision, however, is more problematic: process can so easily become nothing but a highly structured program, and enthusiasm for the celebration of rites can mask the absence of the reality which they are meant to ritualize. Nor are the details of the rites themselves entirely without fault: the slavish reconstruction of some ancient features may eventually need to be reconsidered in the light of pastoral experience, the continued adherence to archaic terminology being a case in point. On the other hand, some very ancient elements which failed to find their way into the rites may also deserve a reevaluation: for example, the use of only one post-baptismal unction is a welcome simplification, but it is to be regretted that the Christic and Messianic themes of the first anointing did not find their way into the confirmation anointing, and that the greeting of the newly baptized did not include the traditional kiss of peace. Nevertheless, minor weaknesses such as these should not divert attention from the power of the promise contained in this revision.

Adapting the R.C.I.A. for Baptized Christians

In many places the vast majority of those seeking to grow in the Christian faith and to be incorporated more fully into the life of the church will not be the unbaptized, who are the primary subjects of the R.C.I.A.'s vision. Three categories of people present special problems.

First, there are those who have been fully initiated in a sacramental sense but have never experienced genuine spiritual renewal in their lives. Although they may in many ways be in a similar position to those who have never received any of the sacraments, to allow their association with those entering the catechumenate is to confuse the initial experience of conversion with the ongoing renewal which should be a part of the experience of all Christians. There are other ways in which their needs may be met, not least by a revitalized liturgy of penance which could once again center around the process of recognition, reformation, and reconciliation which characterized it in primitive times.

Second, there are those who have already been baptized but not confirmed or communicated. They may legitimately be included in the appropriate parts of the process and rites of the R.C.I.A., since their original initiation was incomplete, and in the U.S. additional (optional) rites are provided for such groups. Care needs to be taken, however, that their numerical strength does not distort the character of the R.C.I.A. as centered around baptism, and a clear distinction should be made by the manner in which the rites are celebrated with these candidates and with the catechumens who are being baptized.

Finally, there are those who have already been members of another Christian denomination and who are now seeking admission to the Roman Catholic church. No rules can be laid down for their treatment, but each case will have to be examined in order to discern how much of the initiatory process is requisite or appropriate for the individual.

The Rites of Baptism for Children and Confirmation

Several unresolved points of tension between the treatment of those baptized in infancy and those entering the church through the R.C.I.A. as older children or adults still remain. The most obvious difference between the two is the continuing deferral for several years of confirmation and admission to communion in the case of those baptized in infancy, which sharply contrasts with the unitive character of the R.C.I.A.. The latter affirms that the conjunction of baptism and confirmation "signifies the unity of the paschal mystery, the close link between the mission of the Son and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit" (215). What then is signified by their separation?

On the other hand, while the temporal delay still exists, efforts have nevertheless been made in the rite of confirmation to bring out its connection to baptism, especially by the inclusion of a renewal of baptismal promises by the candidates. Moreover, the rite insists that "Christian initiation reaches its culmination in the communion of the body and blood of Christ. The newly confirmed therefore participate in the eucharist, which completes their Christian initiation" (13). Thus, both here and in other official documents, there is a clear expectation that the normal sequence will be baptism—confirmation—first communion.

Unfortunately, while confirmation at about seven years of age is affirmed as the general practice of the Latin church, the possibility of deferring the rite until "the recipients are more mature" is still admitted (11). This not only destroys the initiatory sequence and makes its theological unity more obscure; it effectively changes the emphasis of confirmation from the perfection of baptism through the reception of the Holy Spirit to a personal ratification of the candidates' baptismal faith. While it may well be argued that the creation of such a rite is pastorally desirable, confirmation should not be asked to play that role.

The second major difference is the fact that the catechumenate is not as integral a part of the rites as it is in the R.C.I.A. Catechesis after baptism is certainly implied, not least by the stress which the rite lays upon the responsibility of the parents to bring the child up in the practice of the faith, and by the renewal of baptismal promises in the rite of confirmation. But there is less of a sense of a continuing process of spiritual growth with appropriate points of ritualization and more of an impression of a series of disparate rites linked to certain stages of biological development. A further problem is caused by the interpretation of canon 914 in the 1983 Code of Canon Law as continuing to require first penance before the reception of first communion in the case of those baptized in infancy. This not only adds yet another rite to the sequence but creates the theologically anomalous situation of ritually reconciling the child to a community into which he/she has not yet been fully initiated!

In general, the rite of baptism for children is modelled on the baptismal rite of the R.C.I.A. Preference is expressed for its celebration on a Sunday and in the presence of the faithful, which represents an important step towards the restoration of its communal character, although this is not insisted upon and the force of the statement is considerably reduced by the permitted alternative, "or at least of relatives, friends and neighbors" (32). Moreover, the parents are given a more central role in the rite than the godparents (5), and they are no longer required to make the profession of faith on behalf of the infant. Instead they profess their own adherence to the faith of the church into which it is said that the child is being baptized. While these developments express the importance of the nurturing of faith which is required of the community and of the family, they leave unresolved the question of the relationship of the communal faith of the church to that of the candidate, which is seen as a prerequisite for baptism in the R.C.I.A.

Developments in Other Churches

Most of the other Western churches have also recently undertaken revisions of their rites of initiation, and these display a number of similarities to the Roman Catholic reforms. In many cases adult baptism has now been set forth as the archetypal rite, with the baptism of infants an adaptation of it. They generally presuppose a communal celebration of the sacrament both for adults and for infants and include a more extensive use of symbolism, especially in the introduction of appropriate post-baptismal ceremonies. In the case of infant baptism, they tend to display a similar ambivalence to the Roman rite over the faith which is required: some emphasize strongly the faith of the community, most stress the importance of the parents' own faith, but some still insist that the profession of faith is also made on behalf of the child in some way.

On the other hand, those churches which include a separate rite of confirmation tend to see it as chiefly concerned with the personal ratification of the candidate's faith. The Holy Spirit is regarded as having been bestowed in baptism, and the baptismal rite generally includes a post-baptismal imposition of hands and/or anointing especially associated with the Spirit. In some churches confirmation constitutes the gateway to the eucharist, but in others young children who have not yet been confirmed are admitted to communion. The most significant difference from the Roman Catholic reforms, however, is that these churches have been concerned chiefly to produce new rites: they have not taken the major step of setting these explicitly within an ongoing, unitive process of conversion.

INSTALLATION OF MINISTERS

The term installation refers to actions and rites other than ordination which in general have to do with the beginning of a specific ministry or with a community's initial or renewed recognition of individual ministers or groups of ministers. Other terms that are sometimes used include affirmation, commissioning, deputation, induction, institution, reception, and recognition. These terms may or may not be used as synonyms, and their precise meaning in each particular circumstance needs to be discerned. Both ordained ministers and lay ministers may be installed.

Ordained ministers. The only official Roman Catholic liturgy of installation is the "Reception of the Bishop in the Cathedral Church," printed as an appendix to The Roman Pontifical (Eng. tr. 1978). This rite itself uses installation as a synonym for reception. In addition, an unofficial rite for the installation of a pastor has been published in the National Bulletin on Liturgy (September-October 1987).

Other churches celebrate installations more frequently. The Book of Common Prayer (1979) of the Episcopal church contains a "Celebration of New Ministry" which may be used, with appropriate adaptations, for rectors of parishes, assistant presbyters, vicars of missions, deans and canons of cathedrals, chaplains of institutions, non-stipendiary clergy, as well as for deacons and lay persons with pastoral responsibilities. The Book of Occasional Services (1979) of the same church includes rites of "Recognition and Investiture of a Diocesan Bishop" and of "Welcoming and Seating of a Bishop in the Cathedral."

The Lutheran liturgical book, Occasional Services (1982), includes rites for the "Installation of a Bishop," "Installation of a Pastor," and "Installation of a Regional or Churchwide Office." To give another example, the Book of Worship (1986) of the United Church of Christ contains an "Order for Installation of a Pastor."

Lay Persons. As indicated above, the rite of "Celebration of a New Ministry" of The Book of Common Prayer (1979) may be used for lay persons who have pastoral responsibilities. In addition, The Book of Occasional Services (1979) of the Episcopal church includes a liturgy of "Commissioning for Lay Ministries in the Church." This may be used for 15 specific categories of persons, e.g., wardens and members of the vestry, servers at the altar, singers, parish visitors. The list concludes with "other lay ministers." The rite begins by stating that "lay persons are commissioned for their ministry by the Sacrament of Holy Baptism, and no form of commissioning for special functions is necessary." It explains further that the rite "is intended for use when a public recognition of a special function is desired."

The Lutheran Occasional Services (1982) includes rites for the "Installation of Elected Parish Officers," both the "Installation of a Lay Professional Leader" and the "Commissioning of a Lay Professional Leader," the "Induction of a Christian Day School Teacher," and the "Commissioning of Missionaries" (who may be ordained as well as lay). In addition, there is a rite of "Recognition of Ministries in the Congregation," which "brings to the attention of the congregation the ministry which is part of the life of all the baptized, and specifically recognizes those who are or will be offering themselves in a particular ministry of the congregation." Areas of ministry that may be recognized include worship, education, witness, service, and stewardship. Finally, Occasional Services contains a rite of "Affirmation of the Vocation of Christians in the World," as lay persons "serve through family, occupation, voluntary organizations, the community and nation."

The Book of Worship (1986) of the United Church of Christ contains both an "Order for Commissioning" and an "Order for Affirmation of Ministry" (Installation of Lay Leaders). In the first, "the people of God celebrate Christ's gift of diverse ministries to the church." The rite explains that "Commissioning . . . recognizes and authorizes that member whom God has called to a specific church-related ministry which is recognized by [the church] but not requiring ordination or licensing." The second Order is "a service of recognition and installation for those who consent to serve in an elected or appointed office in the church. Equally, it is a service of recognition and affirmation for those actively engaged in a variety of ministries in the world It is used when people want to be recognized and supported and to be called to accountability by the local church of which they are members."

The modern history of installing lay ministers in the Roman Catholic church begins in 1972 with the publication by Pope Paul VI of the motu proprio Ministeria quaedam. This abolished the traditional minor orders and established two "ministries," those of reader and of acolyte; both are restricted to males. They have a dual character in that they are required of candidates for ordination to the diaconate and presbyterate, but are open to other lay men as well. (As entrance into the clerical state is now joined to the diaconate, seminarians are still lay men.)

These two instituted ministries are distinct from the much more common uninstituted ministries of reader and acolyte, which are exercised by women as well as men. For various reasons, including the sexual distinction made, many local churches have not made use of the instituted ministries.

The conferring of these ministries is known as "institution," whereas formerly young men were ordained to the minor orders. Institution is carried out by the bishop or the major superior of a clerical religious institute, and the designated liturgical rites are included in the Roman Pontifical (Eng. tr. 1978).

In 1973 the instruction Immensae caritatis was issued to make provision "lest reception of Communion become impossible or difficult because of insufficient [ordained] ministers." It allowed for communion to be distributed by lay persons in a variety of circumstances. However, this role is not officially viewed as lay ministry, but as a "special," "auxiliary," or "extraordinary" ministry that is carried out in the physical or moral absence of a deacon or presbyter. Two rites of installation are provided. The "Rite of Commissioning Special Ministers of Holy Communion" is for those who will carry out this ministry on a regular basis. The second is the "Rite of Commissioning a Special Minister to Distribute Holy Communion on a Single Occasion."

Finally, the Roman Book of Blessing (Eng. tr. 1987) contains both an "Order for the Blessing of Missionaries Sent to Proclaim the Gospel" and an "Order for the Blessing of Those Appointed as Catechists." The first order may be used for clerics as well as laity. It is to be noted that the title "catechist" is used for those who exercise a ministry of catechesis properly so called as well as for those who exercise a more general pastoral and liturgical leadership role in the absence of a resident presbyter.

These official liturgies are complemented by a widespread practice of installing many other lay ministers and by the use of a wide variety of installation rites prepared by various national, diocesan and parochial bodies. In Canada, for example, A Book of Blessings (1981) and the September-October 1987 issue of the National Bulletin on Liturgy propose installation rites for a large number of lay church ministries as well as for those who minister in the broader community.

Several issues arise in relation to the installation of lay ministers. First, the term "ministry" is used in various ways. Some use it in a very broad way to include the whole of Christian life and hence all baptized persons. Others go in the opposite direction to include only ordained persons. A middle ground is taken by those who use it to include liturgical ministers and other church ministries, or to include these plus certain types of work outside the church community. Finally, some try to use the term in all of these ways, but distinguish among the different meanings.

Use of "ministry" to include all the baptized may lead to rites of installation that recognize everyone in a congregation or parish. In other cases such an understanding leads to an unwillingness to install lay persons in any specific ministries, as such an action is seen to exclude others who are also considered ministers. The question is asked, "Why install some lay ministers but not others? And who is to choose?" This whole question continues to be discussed.

Ministries that are proper to lay persons need to be distinguished from those exercised by laity as temporary replacements for ordained ministers. Special ministers of communion are officially considered to be in the latter category, though parochial practice and popular understanding may view them differently. Real lay ministries have their roots in baptism and not in deputation, establishment or the bestowal of new gifts on laity by ordained ministers.

Installation of lay ministers can have a variety of meanings, including the following: (a) prayer and intercession for ministers, whether at the beginning of a ministry or regularly or occasionally in the midst of it; (b) support for or affirmation of a ministry already undertaken; (c) recognition of satisfactory completion of some educational training or formation program or experience that has prepared one for a new ministry or that enables one to carry out his or her present ministry better; (d) public commitment and dedication on the part of individuals to their ministries; (e) the commissioning of a minister by the community as its representatives; (f) the indication of a new relationship between the community and someone who is singled out or designated for a particular ministry; (g) confirmation of the authority that goes with certain ministries; (h) an indication that one has certain competencies required in one or another ministry; (i) the incorporation into one or another body or association of ministers; (j) a farewell and assurance of support for those being sent out from their communities for particular ministries; (k) the authentication of an individual's claim to be gifted in a certain ministry.

Particular acts of explicit recognition or installation may have more than one meaning and purpose, and, to the extent that it is possible to do so, these should be identified, stated, and distinguished. In the case of lay ministers it is best to place an emphasis on the recognition of baptismal gifts, on prayers of thanksgiving for these gifts and on prayers of support, rather than on commissioning and empowering by the clergy.

INTERNAL FORUM

The expression, a symbolic one, signifies the internal world of the human spirit and describes it as a "place," forum, where laws are operating and judgments are made. It is distinct from the "external forum" where human laws are enacted and enforced, and where justice is dispensed by courts on the basis of visible and tangible evidence.

"Internal forum" is a broad expression that allows for several interpretations, overlapping but not identical. While each construction can claim legitimacy in its context, none of them should be regarded as exclusive of the others.

In a Christian context and at the deepest theological level, the internal forum is where a human person meets the Spirit of God, takes cognizance of his demands, and decides to accept or reject a divine call. There too he or she is judged through the voice of conscience.

In a humanistic context and at a purely philosophical level, the internal forum is where the human spirit operates, forms rational judgments and makes responsible decisions, following an internal light which acts as guide and judge.

In a merely juridical context internal forum may mean that aspect of the conscience which can be reached and bound by external laws, be they ecclesiastical or civil. Thus some canon lawyers speak of the one and undivided power of the church that can bind and loose the faithful in both the external and internal forum. Similar arguments can be presented in favor of a secular authority and its laws and decrees: they too can impose not only external performance but also an internal obligation.

The theological and philosophical explanations have in common that they fully identify the internal forum with the conscience of a human person. For them, the source of any further explanation is then in the doctrine of conscience, as it has developed historically and as it is interpreted systematically.

The juridical explanations of internal forum speak of the conscience in a restricted way only: insofar as it can be subject to external laws and decrees. They are undoubtedly correct in asserting that there are external laws which can generate an internal obligation. But if they went further and claimed that the whole internal world of a human person is always under external laws, they would subvert a sacred hierarchy.

Catholic theology acknowledges the absolute priority of conscience, hence of the internal forum over the external one in matters of religious or moral duties. Vatican II both implies and explains this in its Declaration on Religious Freedom: "It is through his conscience that man sees and recognizes the demands of the divine law. He is bound to follow this conscience faithfully in all his activity so that he may come to God, who is his last end. Therefore he must not be forced to act contrary to his conscience. Nor must he be prevented from acting according to his conscience, especially in religious matters" (D.H., 3). Such an absolute priority, however, can be operative only if the process leading up to a decision of conscience is at least subjectively impeccable, which means that the person took pains to gather all necessary information and formulated a critically well-grounded judgment about the action to be taken.

Catholic Canon Law distinguishes carefully between the external and internal forum: "The power of governance is normally exercised in the external forum, but sometimes it is exercised in the internal forum only, but in such a way that the effects which its exercise normally has in the external forum are not acknowledged in this forum except as is established by law in certain instances" (can. 130, Code of Canon Law, trans. by CLSA). This means that the church vindicates the use of the "power of the keys" or "the power of binding and loosing" not only in external matters which can be brought before its courts, but also in internal matters which are manifest to God alone. This exercise of power in the internal forum can be sacramental, as when sins are forgiven in the sacrament of penance, or non-sacramental as when a dispensation is given from a marriage impediment which is occult and cannot be proved before any court.

In an ideal universe, there should be full harmony between the external and internal forums. In our less than perfect world we should strive for this harmony but with the awareness that it can never be achieved, not even in the church. All laws and decrees made by human beings are marked by their limited knowledge; they are also impersonal and abstract. The source of the dictates of conscience is ultimately in divine grace; the internal promptings always refer to a concrete and personal action. Thus conflicts may develop: the demands of external laws and decrees may appear incompatible with those of the conscience, or they may attempt to withdraw liberties which the conscience grants. Should such an event occur, the clue for the resolution of the conflict is in determining the correct hierarchy among the values that the person must pursue. Before God the highest value is in a fidelity to that internal light by which a person is guided and judged.

In sacramental worship such conflicts may arise especially concerning the reception of the sacraments: there could be cases where a person is under a legal sanction but is innocent before God; or vice-versa: someone is legally pure but corrupt in heart. Such cases are usually complex and they require both the learning and the wisdom of an expert in moral theology and Canon Law to unravel them.

A great deal of relevant material can be found in Vatican II's Declaration on Religious Freedom and its commentaries. The Code of Canon Law contains numerous references to the external and internal forum and their mutual relationship in matters of dispensations, marriage cases, remission of penalties, etc. (see Coriden).

JEWISH ROOTS OF CHRISTIAN WORSHIP

Introduction

Hardly a year goes by that students of Christian origins are not made more aware of the Jewish roots of those origins. NT studies increasingly show that Christianity began not as an already fully reformed and monolithic movement but as a variety of "schools" which reacted differently to the ministry and death of Jesus, known as the Christos, Anointed One, or Messiah foretold in rich ambiguity by Jewish tradition. Among these schools of thought and practical living was the pre-dispersion Palestinian one centered in the pentecostal Mother Church of Jerusalem (Acts 1-11). With the dispersion of Jew and Christian from the City in the Roman destruction of 70 C.E., other schools appeared: one centered in Antioch, perhaps around the author or editor of Matthew; another grew around Paul's peripatetic ministry; still another around the Johannine corpus; and others which produced the canonical books of 1 and 2 Peter, James, Jude, Hebrews (?) and the post-canonical writings of 1 Clement, the Letter of Barnabas and those of Ignatius. In all these schools Jewish influence is felt in greater or lesser degree, the OT remaining for early Christians the Holy Scriptures they still shared, even in tension of interpretation, with Jews "of the circumcision." But recent research makes clear that scriptural sharing between Jews and Christians had its practical base in liturgical worship throughout the year, and early Christians had their precedents and paradigms for the most part from Jewish patterns of worship, or seders, found in temple, synagogue, and home. However much evolving Christian schools of thought and practice might differ, one thing that held them together was their adaptation of this pattern of worship, which remains, along with the Hebrew Bible, Judaism's most lasting contribution to historic Christianity.

Jewish Liturgical Sources

These fall into four main categories. First are the Jewish canonical scriptures, "The Law and Prophets," in which one gets historic notice of how such liturgical foci as Passover (pesach), Sabbath, feasts, sacrifices, and prayer were understood. Second are later codifications, made well into the Christian era, of traditional lore assembled by various schools of rabbis. Among these are the great Babylonian and lesser Palestinian Talmuds, which are collections of rabbinical studies of scripture and oral tradition, and the Mishna (ed. H. Danby 1933). The Mishna embodies three types of teaching: 1) midrash, which interprets or comments on scripture, especially the Law (Torah); 2) halaka, which are categorical laws deriving from Torah and developed in traditional observance; 3) haggada, which are expositions of scripture by way of narrative accounts and parables. The three types of teaching, which are roughly equivalent to theory (midrash), law (halaka), and history (haggada), are woven together into six sections which touch matters of prayer, feasts and liturgical order. Third are actual orders of worship (seder) with commentary, such as Seder R. Amram Gaon (ed. D. Hedegard, 1951), one of the two earliest texts of the full synagogue service (8th century C.E.). Fourth are Jewish authorized daily prayer books used in modern synagogues and homes. Although none of these sources dates from the time of Jesus (in fact not from much before the 4th century C.E.) they all contain elements that certainly date from much earlier times—particularly liturgical elements, which tend to be most conservative and resistive to change.

The Liturgical Year

The Christian liturgical year owes its origins to the Jewish liturgical year, and many of the concepts basic to such a year-of-worship are common to the two. The Jewish notion of time was neither rectilinear (modern) nor cyclical (pagan), but what might be called structured linearity. That is, time moved from a beginning toward an end, being structured throughout by God's gracious will in a series of "due seasons" based in the annual order of nature observed in agriculture and animal husbandry as well as in the much larger order of God's will for Israel. Judaism's responses to these "due seasons," whether in field or synagogue, temple or home, constituted its fidelity (or infidelity) to God.

The Jewish festal system rested on four major such seasons: Passover (pesach), which seems to have predated the Exodus (Exod 5:1; 10:9), and the three agricultural feasts which were adopted in Canaan, i.e., Unleavened Bread, which became associated with the domestic and sacrificial pesach to constitute the developed Passover; the Feast of Weeks or Harvest, observed for a "week of weeks" or fifty days (and hence Pentecost); and Tabernacles or Tents or Ingathering. With the exception of Tabernacles (given some prominence in John), all these survive in the Christian year along with the seven-day week, in which the day of religious emphasis was shifted from Sabbath (Saturday) to Sunday (the "Lord's Day" of resurrection), a shift which also appears to have pulled the weekly fast days with it from Monday and Thursday to Wednesday and Friday (Didache, 8). Passover becomes the Christian Pascha (from the Aramaic form of pesach), the day commemorating Christ's death; Pentecost becomes the Christian fifty days of jubilation following the Sunday of Pascha culminating in the great octave of octaves on the fiftieth day, which concludes the Easter season. Unleavened Bread remains merged with pesach as it had done already in Judaism.

Determining the crucial date of Pascha required reckoning what was the 14th day of the first month, Nisan, according to lunar rather than solar calculations (Exodus 12). The feast, being movable, could fall on any day of the week, but there were different calendars for this computation in the Judaism of Jesus' time. Thus the synoptic gospels have Jesus eating the Passover meal on 14 Nisan and dying on the 15th, while in John he dies on the 14th as the lambs were being slain in the temple, a chronology Paul also seems to follow (1 Cor 5:7). The discrepancy may be explained (Jaubert) by the Synoptics using the official calendar, John, a Qumran calendar in which Passover that year occurred on Tuesday-Wednesday (the day ran from sundown to sundown) rather than on Thursday-Friday. Jesus could thus have eaten the Passover meal on Tuesday evening, been tried and judged on Wednesday and Thursday, and then been crucified on the Friday, 14 Nisan according to the official calendar. This hypothesis not only reconciles divergent chronologies between two groups of early Christian writings, but it also provides a more ample chronology for the passion events and diminishes the likelihood that Jesus' last meal with his closest disciples was anything less than a Passover meal—the origin of subsequent Christian reflection on the eucharist.

Early Christian attempts at reconciling the lunar 14 Nisan with Gentile solar calendars yielded different dates for Jesus' actual death. Yet this computation was embedded still in rabbinical tendencies to set the birth and death of patriarchs on the same day, either at Passover or Tabernacles in the autumn month of Tishri. The anonymous Christian De solstitiis et aequinoctiis computes Christ's conception, birth, and death similarly, beginning with the conception of the Baptist six months prior to Jesus' conception (Lk 1:36) since Zechariah, while performing his priestly duties during Tishri at the autumn equinox, was informed by an angel that Elizabeth his wife had conceived. John would then be born nine months later, at the summer solstice, and Jesus six months after that, at the winter solstice. Counting back nine months from that date, Jesus would have been conceived on 25 March or 6 April, the spring equinox depending on which solar calendar, Eastern or Western, was used. Jesus' conception date was a priori his death date, his nativity nine months later falling either on 25 December or on 6 January (Epiphany).

The method of these determinations, curious to us today, is nonetheless resolutely scriptural and rabbinical, giving us not only the date of the Lord's death but the feasts of the Annunciation to Mary (his conception), Christmas, Epiphany, Lent, and the paschal fast of Holy Week. The paschal fast seems to have originated in the Jewish custom of fasting during the afternoon of 14 Nisan while the Passover lambs were being slaughtered. Lent originated in Christian Egypt, where the beginning of the year on 6 January, Epiphany, began a course reading of Mark with the account of Jesus's baptism and temptation during his forty days in the desert (Mk 1:1-12). The Egyptian church thus fasted for forty days after Epiphany, ending with baptisms and Palm Sunday (Mk 11:1-11)—a fixed sequence not yet coordinated with the moveable Pascha and its preceding week of fast (Talley, 203-214). Only later would this Epiphany fast be moved to just before Holy Week and Easter. All these determinations helped anchor the reality of Jesus' life and ministry in real time and place against Gnostic attempts to mythologize him. They also provided a starting point for lectionary systems to begin course reading the gospels at the beginning of each year, the winter solstice, when the incarnate Word of God was manifested in the world by his nativity and baptism.

Orders of Service

There are three orders of worship service, or seders, of particular concern to Christian liturgical tradition: temple, synagogue, and domestic.

The temple seder involved a complex round of prayer, psalm, and sacrifice (Leviticus), certain elements of which influence later Christian usage. Two of these elements were the communion sacrifice, zebach todah (Greek thusia eucharistein) or "sacrifice of thanksgiving" which Philo commented on (Laporte), and the liturgy of the Day of Atonement (yom kippur), which forms a core image in the epistle to the Hebrews concerning the nature and work of Christ. Further, the times of temple sacrifice (morning, evening and, later, midday) determined the times of synagogue worship, and through this medium the times of early Christian prayer as well, the basis of the later liturgy of the hours or divine office. Yet the temple seder as such was regarded by Christians as having been rendered obsolete by the sacrificial death of the true Lamb of God. This attitude, combined with the destruction of the temple and its cult by the Romans in 70 C.E., meant that the temple seder would not have the same liturgical influence on Christian procedures as would synagogue and domestic seders.

For it is in the synagogue seder, full texts of which emerge by the Gaonic period in the 8th-9th centuries C.E., that the prayer structures of Jewish worship may be seen in their deployed liturgical forms (Hedegard, Hoffman). The service may be schematically outlined as follows:

1. "Passages of Song"—hallel psalms recited quietly before the service proper begins.
2. Shema (Deut 6:4-9; 11:13-21; Num 15:37-41)—at dawn with prayers of blessing (berakoth) and Kaddosh (Isaiah 6).
3. Tefilla—eighteen public petitionary berakoth, also known as sh'mone esre ("the eighteen") and amida ("standing," since they were said standing).
4. Tachanunim—quasi-private supplications.
5. Readings from Torah and Prophets, done on Monday, Thursday, and especially Sabbath according to three or seven year cycles, between Tachanunim and the evening service.

Less a single service, this is an order of distinct and self-sufficient "offices" which might be spread out from dawn through an entire morning. The seder is strictly one of prayer, and may originally have terminated with the priestly blessing from the temple liturgy (Num 7:24-26) which concludes the Tefilla section. Of all its parts Shema and Tefilla are the oldest, going back to the time of Jesus and beyond. Tachanunim and the Readings seem less formal, and the latter may have undergirded commentary by rabbis (teachers) on the texts read, whence may have been generated the wealth of rabbinical teachings gradually codified by the academies in the Persian and Palestinian Talmuds and Mishna. Both morning and evening services are consciously related to the temple sacrifices being accomplished at the same times, a fact which cautions against too facile views on opposing the "carnal" temple and the "spiritual" synagogue cults; the two were a single complementary worship system.

It is however, especially in the prayer forms (Heinemann) that insight into later Christian evolutions are to be found. Three of these deserve comment.

1. Berakah (euologia). Created things are never blessed, only their creator, and this blessing both opens and closes the form: "Blessed are you . . . for you nourish us and the whole universe. Blessed are you . . ." The statement of motive, "you nourish us . . .," is expandable even to great length (e.g., Gen 24:27; 1 Chr 29:10-19; 2 Chr 6:1-11; Neh 9:5-10:40; etc.). Sometimes, especially when another berakah follows, the concluding blessing (hatima, seal) is omitted. In the synagogue service Shema is surrounded by lengthy berakoth which lead up to recitation of kaddosh. Berakah is for creation.

2. Yadah (eucharistia). God is thanked for revelation. "We will give you thanks . . . for you have given us . . . the covenant and the law . . . For all these things we will give you thanks . . ." (cf. Mt 11:25-30; Jn 11:41-44). Often the statement of motive includes haggada (narrative) expansion on salvation history as revelation of God. God is thanked for revelation.

3. Tefilla (proseuche). God is petitioned or begged for redemption both now and in the future. "Have mercy . . . on us your people Israel and on your city Jerusalem . . . Blessed are you who build Jerusalem." The statement of motive here is also often greatly expanded. God is petitioned for Jerusalem.

The forms, simple and often short, are capable of being expanded and linked together so that they undergird a vast reservoir not only of prayer but of proclamation and confession in all circumstances of Jewish life whether informal or formal. This euchology is the source of all subsequent Christian liturgical prayer, which centers on and revolves around eucharistia and proseuche, thanksgiving and petition, to this day.

The third category of seder, the domestic, includes procedural orders for meals, especially the weekly Sabbath kiddush meal hallowing the day on Friday evenings, and the once-yearly Passover meal, which follows the same order with some additions. The meal seder is simple:

1. Short opening berakah over an un-mixed cup of wine.
2. Berakah over broken bread.
3. The meal itself.
4. Concluding "table blessing" (birkat ha mazon) over a cup of wine and water mixed:
 - a. Berakah of God who nourishes creation).
 - b. Yadah to God for the land, covenant, law (revelation).
 - c. Tefilla of God for Jerusalem (redemption).

The same order is observed on Passover, except that: 1) between breaking the unleavened "bread of affliction our fathers ate in the desert" and its berakah, the haggadah of Exodus and *midrash*es of it are given; 2) a second cup of wine, the "Cup of Redemption," is blessed and drunk before the meal begins with bread and bitter herbs; and 3) the tefillah for Jerusalem is expanded with an eschatological "remembrance" of the Messiah to come.

Last Supper and Eucharist

The temple seder gives imagery for Christ's work of atonement in the Christian "sacrifice of thanksgiving" of the eucharist; the synagogue seder deploys statutory prayer forms used in the eucharist; and the domestic meal seders of Sabbath and Passover suggest how the Last Supper may well have gone, particularly if that supper was, as seems likely (pace Dix), a Passover seder.

Concerning that Supper there are two NT traditions, one represented in Mk 14:17-26 and Mt 26:26-30, another in Lk 22:14-20 and 1 Cor 11:23-29. Neither tradition gives a full description of the Supper, being more concerned to report what Jesus said (his own *midrash*es of the Supper) than what he did in so familiar a meal. The two traditions describe the Supper thus:

Mk-Mt

1. As they were eating...

2. He took bread,
Blessed,
Broke,
Gave,
Said:
"Take, eat, this is my body."

- 3.
4. He took a cup....
Gave thanks,
Gave, they drank.
He said:
"This is my blood of the covenant, poured out for many. I shall not drink it again

Lk-1 Cor

1. He sat at table....
He took a cup....
He gave thanks and gave it, saying:
"Take this and divide it ... I shall not drink the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God comes."

2. He took bread,
Gave thanks
Broke,
Gave,
Said:
"This is my body [given] for you. Do this as my commemoration."

3. (The meal follows)
4. Likewise the cup after Supper...
Saying:
"This is the new covenant in my blood [poured out for you]. Do this as often outside the kingdom."

as you drink
it, as my commemoration."

5. They sang a hymn and went out. . . .

5. And he came out . . .
(Lk 22:39).

The differences between the two traditions are striking. In Mk-Mt there is no "first" cup; the bread is "blessed" rather than given thanks over as in Lk-1 Cor; no meal section is mentioned; and Jesus' words about the first cup in Lk-1 Cor are transposed to the (final?) cup. In Lk-1 Cor there is no "blessing" (berakah) terminology, only "thanksgiving" (yadah) terminology; there are two cups mentioned; a meal is clearly implied; and the command to repeat the act as "my commemoration" is reiterated twice.

The structural contrasts between the two reports suggest that Lk-1 Cor is recounting the Last Supper historically as a Passover seder beginning with that seder's second cup, the "Cup of Redemption," which would have been hallowed and drunk at the conclusion of the Exodus midrash before the bread was hallowed and eaten. It is not impossible that those great midrashes, unreported in Lk-1 Cor, may be found summarized in Jn 13-18:1, midrashes in this unique event on Jesus' own "exodus" consummating his earthly life and ministry. Such a context helps clarify his "I shall not drink the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God comes": when he then drinks the final mixed cup after the meal at the birkat ha mazon of the paschal seder, his hearers would have understood the kingdom to be indeed revealed and present among them. This final cup Paul, the rabbi, calls by its Jewish name, "the cup of blessing" (1 Cor 10:16), drunk now always in the Kingdom into which Christ's death has ushered us.

Mk-Mt on the other hand seems to report the Last Supper in terms of one primitive form of eucharistic usage in which there is no preliminary cup and the bread and "cup of blessing" are no longer separated by a meal. Such a eucharist may have taken place either within a meal ("As they were eating. . .") or after it, as 1 Cor 11 suggests. The retention of "bless" to describe the bread prayer suggests the primitiveness of this usage: in Lk-1 Cor and Didache 9-10 the prayers are all "thanksgiving," a change that implies a Christian move toward making Christ the Revealer the major motive for Christian address to God, and perhaps Christian regard of the eucharist as the definitive sacrifice—of thanksgiving (zebach todah)—thus continuing the highest form of temple sacrifice consummated and transformed in the Messiah or Christ himself to have become the "pure offering" of all nations (Mal 1:11). The whole remains anchored for Mk-Mt in the holy food—the seder's "bread of affliction" become the body of Christ, the "cup of blessing" the poured out blood of the true paschal Lamb of God drunk now in the Kingdom of God revealed by that same Lamb during his last meal with all those whom he loves, and for them. The whole is nothing less than an entire new covenant.

In addition to the eucharistic order apparent in Mk-Mt, an order (unlike Lk-1 Cor) unprecedented in the seder service, there is another perhaps equally primitive order in Didache 9-10 (Jasper and Cuming, 23-24). This document, dated prior to 100 C.E., and possibly as early as 40-60, comes from Syria and is replete with Jewish influence. Chapters 1-6 detail how one teaches those coming to baptism (chap. 7) the "way of life" and the "way of death," themes in rabbinical teaching and in OT wisdom literature (Kavanagh, 1-12). Chaps. 8-10 describe baptized life as one of prayer and fasting on days different from those of the Jews (chap. 8), and of "thanksgiving" (chaps. 9-10). The eucharist does not follow the complex Passover seder but the simpler seder of the Sabbath kiddush meal. It opens with a brief thanksgiving over a cup of wine and then a thanksgiving over broken bread. The meal follows. After this there is a Christian birkat ha mazon over an implied mixed cup involving 1) thanksgiving for revelation, 2) thanksgiving for creation and food and non-carnal gifts, and 3) petition for redemption represented in the new Israel, the church. The relationship of this three-fold structure to the Jewish form is clear, but the sequence of creation-revelation-redemption has been altered and only thanks is given in 1) and 2). What we may have here is a Christianization of the kiddush meal moved from Friday to Saturday evening or Sunday morning. The short "eucharistic" prayers and the proseuche for redemption clearly betray Jewish euchology, and the meal is kept, separating the bread and (second) cup, unlike Mk-Mt whose order of service is consequently somewhat less Jewish than this one. It is plausible that Didache represents a eucharist in conservative Judaeo-Christian churches, the Mk-Mt order a eucharist-within-a-meal among churches of the Gentile missions, whose sensitivity to Jewish forms would have been weak or nonexistent.

Conclusions

Christians generally, and the origins of their worship forms in particular, have never been easy to explain, but apart from Judaism they are inexplicable. Their year, basic methods of teaching and living, fundamental worship events, prayer forms, and indeed their very Bible for some generations are all Jewish in origin because there were no other precedents available at the time. Nowhere is this more clear than in the earliest forms of Christian worship, where God is thanked for a Revealer and Redeemer who was himself Jewish to the core and, precisely because of this, entirely universal in his care and love for all nations.

JEWISH WORSHIP

Institutional Origins

Jewish worship is simultaneously rabbinic worship, that is, worship as defined by the generations of authorities known loosely as "the rabbis," namely: the Pharisees (circa, 2nd century B.C.E.-70 C.E.); the tannaim (sing. tanna, 70-200 C.E.); the amoraim (sing. amora, 200-circa 6th/7th centuries); and the geonim (sing. gaon, 757-1038). Rabbinic myths of origins date some rabbinic customs as far back as Moses and even the patriarchs, but in fact, it is difficult to establish even elementary rabbinic worship prior to the 2nd century B.C.E., and only in the 1st century C.E. does it come clearly into focus. The tannaim, particularly, are responsible for the structure of rabbinic worship, and the geonim are responsible for canonizing a particular set of prayers as the liturgy of preference for later generations.

It was once believed that the tannaim established rabbinic worship by well-defined general proclamations reached by central bodies able to enforce a monolithic rabbinic will on a willing population. Philologically oriented scholars thus sought out putative "original texts" of prayer out of which current variations had grown, along with the exact dates and circumstances that gave rise to the latter. We now know that the tannaim were a diverse group with often ineffective centralized authority; that despite general agreement on certain principles, variation of interpretation was the rule; and that, consequently, there are no single authoritative "original" prayers to be found. Instead, tannaitic (and even amoraic) worship is characterized by relatively freewheeling expressions of specific worship themes, and an abundance of equally old prayer texts, most of which have been lost to history.

Three institutions, especially, contributed to the earliest rabbinic worship: the Temple, the chavurah and the synagogue. The Temple is pre-rabbinic, but lasted until the tannaim who knew its worship forms—which they respected as scripturally ordained. Even after the Temple's fall in 70 C.E., the rabbis accepted its sacrificial system as paradigmatic for ideal worship and predicted a rebuilt Temple with a restored cult at the end of time. Until then, they consciously modeled their own worship after real or imaginary cultic blueprints, characterizing prayer itself, for example, as "an offering of the lips," likening the householder's table around which prayers were said to an altar, and announcing that the primary rabbinic prayer, the Tefillah, was in lieu of the defunct Tamid or daily sacrifice.

Nonetheless, two alternative loci for worship, the chavurah, and the synagogue, both of which had predated the Temple's fall, now rose to prominence. The chavurah (pi. chavurot) appears in our records by Pharisaic times. Chavurot are tableship groups emphasizing worship around meals, and featuring purity rules that liken average Israelites to priests, and tables to Temple altars. They were either ad hoc gatherings, or ongoing associations, where men (but not women) went to celebrate such things as feast days and the birth of children. Out of this milieu grew the Passover seder, benedictions over food, and the Grace after meals (Birkat hamazon).

The synagogue too predates the Temple's fall, but not by the many centuries often imagined. Evident in the gospels, and known both to Paul and to Josephus, the synagogue must have been well established by the first century C.E. But neither written nor archeological data indicate origins much prior to that, certainly not before the 2nd century B.C.E. Sources prior to the Hasmonean revolt (167 B.C.E.)—including Daniel, written on its very eve—are alike in knowing nothing of synagogues, which, therefore, can certainly not be dated to the Babylonian exile, as is often claimed.

Texts reflecting conditions in the 2nd–1st century B.C.E. portray public worship in village squares under the institutional aegis of a ma'amad. The ma'amad was originally an extension of the cult in that it was a local gathering for worship at the time that the sacrifices were being offered in Jerusalem; but we hear also of extensive worship there, complete with a Tefillah (the rabbinic prayer par excellence), by assemblies seeking relief from drought. It is thus probable that the synagogue developed out of the ma'amad.

We know little about the relationship of the rabbis to the early synagogue. They seem to have preferred other institutions, especially the study academy, for their prayers. The ma'amad ritual had been led by Elders (zekenim), and early synagogue worship was probably conducted by a new functionary, the chazzan (pi. chazzanim). Nonetheless, the ritual followed there was increasingly that of the rabbis, who emerged as the dominant force behind synagogue worship, whether they actually attended prayers there or not.

The ma'amad/synagogue and the chavurah/home thus became twin foci for Jewish worship, following the Temple's fall. Though Jews can and do worship elsewhere, worship to this day is normally enacted at set times in either or both of these locales, three times daily (see below) and even more extensively on holy days.

The Liturgical Text

a. The Primacy of the Blessing

Rabbinic prayers hark back to biblical prototypes, but they are unique in that they feature a standardized prose style known as a berakhah (a blessing or benediction). Stylistic rules for benedictions evolved through the centuries but were largely in place by the 3rd century C.E. Blessings are either short or long. Short blessings are one-line formulas of the following sort: "Blessed art Thou, Lord our God, Ruler of the Universe, who . . ." Long Blessings may or may not feature an introduction ("Blessed art Thou . . ."), but they always conclude with a chatimah (lit.: "seal") which sums up the blessing's theme ("Blessed art Thou who . . ."); they are "long" in that they contain thematic development in the body of the benediction, so that each one is in essence a small essay on some aspect of rabbinic thought. Worship services are constituted by a variety of verbal material, but primarily by clusters of blessings strung one after the other. Of these, the following two stand out: the blessings that surround the Shema and the Tefillah (see below).

These "blessing/essays" however are not the product of single authors; they are composite works reflecting centuries of oral transmission and editorial redaction. They thus betray the fact that the rabbinic tradition is far from monolithic. One major strand, for example, is Jewish gnosticism (known generally as the praxis of Yordei Merkavah, the "Chariot" or "Throne" mystics) which, from as early as the 2nd or 3rd centuries C.E., emphasized mantra-like formulas, word strings of synonyms that produced rhythmic regularity without any necessary cognitive enrichment; sometimes accompanied by fasting and body movement, this worship was trance-inducing, the goal being to join the heavenly angels seen by Isaiah (chap. 6), there to praise God.

At the same time, other rabbinic strands stressed the cognitive pole of meaning, by mandating regular worship organized according to set themes. Indeed, for centuries, it was this unvarying thematic progression that identified worship as properly rabbinic despite its many verbal manifestations in different synagogues. Generally speaking, each theme was allotted its own blessing, the style of which allowed for great variation, in that even after the basic rules for beginning and ending it were in place, there still remained the blessing's body where the theme could be elaborated freely. Thus expression of a theme varied widely from place to place, and even from time to time in the same place, as prayer leaders exercised considerable imagination in their renditions. Regardless of the vast differences in wording that resulted, however, the same order of blessings, and thus, the same progression of themes, was the rule, so that even a highly unusual version of a worship service would be recognizable as just one more interesting delivery of the appropriate thematic element.

b. From Unfixed Text to Prayer Book

Somewhere between the 3rd and the 8th centuries the various strands of prayer coalesced into fixed liturgies. Lengthy poetic versions of benedictions known as piyyutim, originally, perhaps, every-day alternatives, were eventually reserved for fast or feast days. The mystical mantra-like strata were combined with information-rich theological expressions of the themes, to produce final formulations of composite texts betraying both the mystical affective side of worship and the theological cognitive pole as well. More than one such amalgam persisted for centuries, with two recognizable clusters of them taking shape: the Palestinian rite in Palestine and Egypt, and the Babylonian rite in the Tigris-Euphrates basin. The former remained particularly rich in poetry, preferring to continue the age-old tradition of encouraging novel expressions of the mandated blessings at the expense of a single "canonized" prayer text. The latter, however, chose fixity as its goal: it limited poetry to a bare minimum and established set texts to be recited from beginning to end of the standard worship services.

In the middle of the 9th century, Amram Gaon, the titular leader of Babylonian Jewry, established his own particular set of texts as incumbent on all Jews. His decree, our first known comprehensive prayer book, is known as Seder Rav Amram ("The Seder [or order of prayers according to] Rav Amram"). Accepted as normative by the young Jewish communities in western Europe especially, it eventually became the basis for all subsequent rites, particularly in the wake of Palestinian Jewry's destruction at the hands of the Crusaders, and the parallel success of the Babylonian legal tradition in establishing its cultural hegemony over its Palestinian parallel.

Seder Rav Amram contained all required prayer texts for home and synagogue devotion, along with the halakhic regulations for saying them. To be sure, it omitted much more than it included, in that Palestinian alternatives especially were overlooked. But in principle, Jewish worship was henceforth associated with the act of reading one's way through relevant paragraphs of a book, following the requisite halakhic guidelines regarding such things as bodily position, congregation/prayer-leader antiphony, and musical rendition. In the centuries that followed, the book expanded with new poetry expressive of this or that community's identity. But before turning to these expansions, we should look briefly at the contents of Seder Rav Amram's basic service, since it was to remain the essential outline of Jewish worship in all branches of Judaism to this day.

c. Outline of Services—Structure and Theology

In apt continuity with rabbinic tradition generally, Seder Rav Amram does not feature the Bible among its prayers. True, three biblical citations (Deut 6:4-9; 11:13-21; Num 15:37-41) constitute the well-known Shema Yisra'el, which is recited morning and evening; and psalms too appear here and there in their totality, especially in psalm collections known as Hallel. But the Shema has been recast as only a centerpiece bracketed by introductory and concluding blessings; and psalmody is decidedly insignificant here, relative to the blessing structure that predominates. The theology of rabbinic worship thus reflects the rabbinic doctrine that the written Bible requires interpretation according to the insights of the oral tradition.

The most important worship units are 1) the Shema and its benedictions, and 2) the Tefillah, or "The Prayer" par excellence, which singly or together had constituted the bulk of every synagogue service since the 1st century at least.

The Shema resembles a Jewish creed, in which the assertion of God's unity is elaborated through the accompanying blessings which acknowledge God as 1) Creator of light and darkness, 2) Revealer of Torah = Covenant-maker with Israel, and 3) Redeemer of Israel from Egyptian bondage. God is thus the sole deity, who, moreover, is responsible for creation, revelation, and redemption. Historical recollection is anamnetically linked to eschatological expectation in that God's redeeming act at the Red Sea is merely the archetype for a future act whereby

Israel will receive final deliverance at the end of created time, when the covenant's promise comes ultimately to its fruition.

Eschatological hope figures even more prominently in the Tefillah, a series of 19 (originally 18) benedictions, largely petitionary, organized at the end of the 1st century. God is asked to grant the necessary insight that leads to repentance, and thus to divine pardon and salvation. The blessings that follow define the paradigmatic rabbinic doctrine of salvation: God will heal the sick, restore fertility to the Land of Israel, return the exiles to their land, reestablish the Jewish justice system, punish heretics, reward the righteous, rebuild Jerusalem, and bring the messiah son of David to rule in perfect peace.

Along with the Shema and the Tefillah, early worship featured the reading of Torah (the first five books of the Bible), on Mondays, Thursdays and Sabbaths. More than one lectionary seems to have been in effect: Palestinians favored the so-called triennial cycle (actually, a 3 1/2-4 year cycle, despite its title), while Babylonian Jewry developed an annual cycle, which prevails today, as a consequence of the Babylonian cultural victory described above. Saturday mornings saw an additional reading (called Haftarah), drawn from the prophets (and the narrative books—known also as “prophets” in Jewish tradition) and linked in some way to the primary Torah text. But scripture was customarily followed by an interpretive homily (or midrash), which ended with a nechemta (a word of hope) and then with the Kaddish, a prayer calling for the coming of the reign of God. By the 8th century, the Kaddish was associated with mourning and assumed to be of benefit to the dead, but its earliest appearance is as a concluding prayer to the study of Torah.

The rabbis favored private spirituality as well, and thus introduced benedictions (usually the short ones) as a means of injecting religious significance into everyday events, as disparate as eating an apple to seeing a rainbow, or even to going to the bathroom (at which time, one was to marvel at the system of ducts and tubes that constitute the human body). Similarly, benedictions preceded the performance of commandments (or mitzvot, sing. mitzvah) affirming that the act about to be performed—kindling Chanukkah lights, perhaps, or performing a circumcision—was of covenantal magnitude. Perhaps the most significant mitzvah was the study of Torah, understood generically as the ongoing revelation of God's word and including both written scripture and oral tradition. Rabbinic spirituality favored such study every morning upon awakening, especially with texts describing the defunct Temple cult, as if reading about sacrifice was the next best thing to doing it. In his Seder, Amram included a particular collection of all such texts—the Bible and the rabbis on sacrifice, blessings over the mitzvah of Torah study, and benedictions related to the daily miracle of waking up in the world—but he appended them to the beginning of his synagogue liturgy, thus transforming home devotion into preliminary synagogue meditation and study. There it remains to this day, as does a second sort of introductory material Amram included: songs of praise highlighted by a Hallel (Pss. 145-150).

We saw above the petition for salvation as defined in the Tefillah and as represented in the metaphor of the ultimate reign of God (from the Kaddish). But the arrival of God's promised realm presupposes the prior forgiveness of sin. The amoraim thus suggested a daily confession following the Tefillah. Amram went further, including not only the opportunity for private devotion there, but also an official supplication rubric (the Tachanun), composed of a collection of prayers acknowledging the lowliness of the human condition. These supplications later grew in importance among western European Chasidei Ashkenaz (see below), but were already present in Amram's Seder, as an apt continuation of the amoraic anthropology he inherited.

Thus with but one exception (the Alenu—see below) the major prayers of the daily morning service were in place by Amram's day. Beginning with 1) morning blessings and the study of sacrificial texts, the worshipper then recited 2) a Hallel and songs of praise. These introduced the two most important rubrics, namely: 3) the Shema and its blessings, and 4) the Tefillah. The Tefillah, technically a replacement for the Temple Tamid sacrifice, conjured up the cult's penitential function, and thus led to 5) private prayer, especially the supplicatory Tachanun. On appropriate days, 6) scripture and 7) a sermon followed, but in any case, 8) a concluding Kaddish, calling for God's promised reign on earth was the norm. The only important addition over the years has been the Alenu, composed originally as an introduction to Rosh Hashanah's blowing of the Shofar, but by the 14th century, added to the concluding prayers. It too calls for God's ultimate reign on earth.

With slight alteration, the above outline of daily morning prayer (shacharit) characterizes every other synagogue service. Mandated afternoon (minchah) and evening (arvit or ma'ariv) services featuring similar liturgies have by now coalesced into back-to-back services held at sunset. These daily occasions are suitably altered for Sabbaths, fasts and festivals, when, in addition, the home as worship setting usually looms larger than the daily norm. Thus, for example, Passover calls for additional synagogue poetry on the theme of the Exodus; but it also features the home seder ritual with family and friends. Home liturgy for Sabbaths and holy days includes, above all, 1) the kindling of lights, along with a prayer called Kiddush, an announcement of the onset of sacred time; and 2) a Havdalah (or "separation") ceremony marking a "separation" between sacred and secular time, as the Sabbath or festival ends.

d. Medieval Developments in Europe—Structure and Theology

Seder Rav Amram was followed by a second comprehensive prayer book, Siddur Saadiah, a compendium by the renowned 10th-century philosopher, exegete, poet and polemicist: the gaon, Saadiah. Yet a third such book, no longer extant, is attributed to the last gaon of our period, Hai (d. 1038). But Amram, especially, made an impact on all Europeans who patterned their worship after his instructions and text. A broad division of rites into "Sefardic" as opposed to "Ashkenazic" differentiates later developments in the Iberian peninsula (Sefarad) from those in Northern Europe (France and Germany, known together as Ashkenaz). In both places, however, the texts grew in bulk as Spanish, French, German and other Jews composed poetic additions, especially for holy days. In 14th-century Ashkenaz, the expanding siddur (or "order" of prayer) was considered too bulky to be practical, and was split into: 1) a siddur for daily and Sabbath use; 2) a Haggadah for the Passover seder; and 3) a machzor for holy day prayers, often a separate volume for each of the three pilgrim festivals (Pesach = Passover; Shavuot = Pentecost; and Sukkot = "Booths") and for the High Holy Day occasions (Rosh Hashanah = New Year, and Yom Kippur = Day of Atonement). This prayer book taxonomy is common today.

The most important later medieval developments occurred in the mystical tradition that was in part continued, in part revived, and in part newly enriched, both in 12th-century Germany, and in 13th-14th century Spain. Under the influence of medieval piety, particularly that of the mendicant monastic orders of the time, the former movement, known as Chasidei Ashkenaz ("The pietists of northern Europe"), favored a severely penitential, even ascetic, attitude to prayer, and their influence was substantial in northern and eastern Europe for centuries. The Spanish school, the Kabbalah,—really a philosophy rooted in Provençal neo-platonism, and transferred south over the Pyrenees—spread throughout the Mediterranean, especially to the Land of Israel, with the expulsion of Jews from Spain in 1492.

In terms of creativity and daring, only the very founding Pharisees and tannaim even approach these 16th-century kabbalists, who not only composed an entirely novel service to introduce the Sabbath (Kabbalat Shabbat, which precedes Friday evening—or arvit—worship), but also redefined the very goal of worship, introducing ecstatic practices reminiscent of the trance-inducing customs of earlier times. These included rote recitation of divine names, and the use of music for self-hypnotic purposes. Implicit in their worship was a bold theology whereby 1) God and the universe are declared coterminous; 2) the human existential state is thus equivalent to God's; 3) as the dominant metaphor for the fractured state of being on earth (and in God!) we find the sexual image of an androgynous deity, whose male and female elements are divorced from each other and in anxious search for reunification. Worship is nothing less than the most important means to restore God's male and female parts to wholeness. Thus the normative rabbinic theology contained in the manifest content of the benedictions was suppressed in favor of a hidden mystical meaning assumed to underlie the prayers. Worshippers were instructed to pray with only the secret meaning in mind. To facilitate that end, introductory meditations called kavvanot (sing. kavvanah) were composed, sometimes with a prayer's hidden purpose expressly stated, and sometimes with it only alluded to. In the 17th century—and especially in the 18th, under the influence of Polish/Russian Chasidism, a theological outgrowth of Kabbalah—kabbalistic thought spawned new prayer books replete with mystical kavvanot, as well as other more exotic innovations, such as diagrams pointing toward the divorced state of God; or to revived gnostic traditions regarding a dual world of light and darkness; and to a new anthropology as well, featuring human beings as a reflection of a divided God and a divided world, but yearning in prayer for the unity we call shalom—"peace" and "wholeness."

Theology Implicit in the Jewish Mode of Worship

The message of worship comes from more than its words. The way of worship prescribed by the rabbis has theological and ecclesiological presuppositions.

The primary expression of traditional worship is corporate. The Jew may pray privately any time, any place, and with any words, gestures or songs. But the Jew must pray with the community three times daily. The assembly must therefore include a quorum (or minyan) of at least ten men, the minimum necessary to represent the people Israel. (Traditional Judaism does not recognize women here. On modern-day attitudes to women in worship, see below.) The text is almost invariably first-person plural, "We," indicative of the corporate covenant being celebrated. The prayer leader is included with the people, for the leader functions technically only as a sheliach tzibbur, an "agent of the congregation," presenting the public's praise and petition to God. An implicit social contract underlies the relationship: concerned that they may not achieve the proper spiritual dimension, the people give up their right to pray as they wish and entrust this "public agent" with the power to represent them on high. If the agent proves inept or unfit in character, a new one is selected.

Thus the most important single person in traditional Jewish worship became the chazzan, who grew from humble origins as a general caretaker and prayer leader of the ancient synagogue to be the modern cantor, entrusted with the proper recitation of the liturgy. Without a monastic tradition, Jews did not develop unison singing as Christianity did, but it did specialize in the solo song, as the prayer leader chanted blessing after blessing, from the beginning to the end of the service. Ideally, anyway, the chazzan was held accountable for the highest musical, vocal, and textual competence, no small matter, given the growth of worship traditions over the years. Textual enrichment had gone hand-in-hand with increased musical sophistication. The Torah—unmarked as to vowels and musical signs—had to be read without error, according to the proper cantillation mode; and even the prayer texts required specific knowledge of nusach—the name given to the musical systems—that varied with the season of the year and the service of the day.

congregation to sing the service antiphonally, a custom still to be found in Orthodox congregations: first, the congregation reads quickly through a prayer, each worshipper at a somewhat different speed, and often, out loud as well—a custom called davvening; the chazzan faces the same way as the congregation of which he—all cantors are male, in this traditional milieu—is an integral part, but the noise dies down, indicating to him that everyone has finished the blessing in question. The chazzan then repeats it, all or in part, but with the correct nusach, and, especially in recent Ashkenazic tradition, occasionally in extended melismatic form also, something akin to a jazz musician's improvisation around the melodies and harmonies of traditional tunes. This "dialogic" model, however, is ancient, going back to the very origin of rabbinic worship, the implicit theological model being the angelic "dialogue" in Isaiah's vision whereby two groups of angels face each other alternately praising God.

"Praise" thus emerges as the dominant stance of the Jew before God. Jews may be thankful—indeed, they must be—but they stand in covenantal partnership with God. The stance of receiving everything as a gift of pure grace for which one can respond with nothing but intense gratitude alone is somewhat alien to Jewish tradition. True, in his famous prayer avinu malkenu, now recited in the high holy day period, Rabbi Akiba pleaded, "Have mercy on us . . . for we have no works." But a theology of mitzvah could hardly hold that extreme notion; the mitzvot were nothing if not works. So despite human sin God owes Israel something under covenantal terms. And Israel turns to God in a characteristically affirmative stance, praising the One from whom blessings flow, and acknowledging God as their origin and source.

Turning to private prayer, we see again the communal focus so far described, as well as another aspect of the Jewish world view: its appreciation of the cosmos as something valuable in its own right, an object to be enjoyed. Private prayer, it will be recalled, was established primarily around the memorization of set blessing formulas appropriate to acts of enjoyment or as introductions to performing commandments. In the latter category, we find once again the dominant image of the Jew as a member of a covenanted people, intent on performing covenantal acts with intentional awareness that they are precisely that: mitzvot, divine commands that one is fortunate enough to do. In the former case, we cannot miss the positive stance toward the world which persists despite even the heightened penitential consciousness of the Chasidei Ashkenaz, who may have insisted on the sinfulness of humanity but never imputed such negativity to God's cosmos. Thus men and women are to enjoy the world—its fruit and its rainbows, its sages and its scholars—all of which, among others, are to be greeted with pertinent blessings. Not only the sense of sight, but hearing too and even smell, are positively codified in blessing forms that celebrate what they do: for there are blessings on hearing good news (or bad news); and on smelling fragrant flowers or herbs; and so on. The theology of Jewish worship insists that it is a sin to evade the world which God has prepared us to experience.

Modern Developments

a. Europe

By the 19th century, post-Napoleonic Jewry in northern Europe found itself increasingly released from medieval ghettoes. Especially in large commercial and cultural capitals, enlightened Jewish communities faced the fact that their worship seemed still to be reflective of their pre-modern consciousness. Beyond even the outmoded tenets of its troubling content, it was the manner of traditional worship that Jews found disturbing. Services were long, entirely in Hebrew, lacking a sermon in the vernacular, and often conducted by cantors who were less than what the ideal prescribed. The average service featured a noisy congregation of individualistic worshippers rocking back and forth and shouting prayers not at all in unison. This davening hardly accorded with the dominant aesthetic of 19th-century Europe where worship was assumed to call for quietude, reverence and decorum. Beginning in Alsace, but quickly spreading to Berlin, Hamburg, Vienna, and elsewhere, Jews initiated rapid and sometimes thorough worship reform.

Musically, the old modes and sounds were notated according to modern standards, and recast so that "folk" music came out sounding like western classics. The chazzan was removed in favor of a singer and choir, who would render the tunes without the traditional cantorial embellishment. Rabbis learned to preach in German, and to direct truncated worship services out of translated prayer books, stripped down to a basic liturgy. German translations or paraphrases omitted difficult-to-hold doctrines like the belief in bodily resurrection or an ultimate return from "exile," and emphasized the universalist strains of Jewish thought at the expense of particularistic ones. Of the two loci for Jewish worship, the home shrunk in importance as Judaism shifted to the synagogue which modern Jews saw as their "church."

European reform was not as far-reaching as it would become on American shores. Men generally still wore the traditional garb of power—a headcovering and prayer shawl (tallit); and though women were granted theoretical equality and admitted into the main sanctuary, they still sat in a separate section reserved for them. But the Reform Movement had been born.

Three rabbinic conferences in mid-century featured deliberations of this religious "reformation" of Judaism, including such matters as the use of Hebrew in prayer. One rabbi—later claimed as the progenitor of the Conservative Movement (see below)—walked out of the proceedings when his liberal colleagues refused sufficiently to privilege Hebrew as a sacred tongue. In 1819 and again in 1841, a Hamburg congregation published a liberal prayer book, with resulting charges and counter-charges, condemnations and excommunications, between traditionalists and modernists. But 19th-century European politics was increasingly reactionary, so that the fight for change moved to America.

b. United States

American Jewish worship has gone through three stages. The first is the period known as Classical Reform, which reached its zenith in 1894/95, with the publication of a Union Prayer Book for Reform congregations. Reforms begun in Europe were carried through here, generally in a sweeping fashion undreamed of across the ocean. Worship featured short services almost entirely in English. It was dominated by western music sung by a hidden choir and a sermon similar to what one would hear in an Episcopalian or Congregationalist church. Folk traditions like specialized worship garb, and old-world customs like carrying the Torah through the congregation were erased. The mood was one of awe, and the congregation was almost completely passive, expected to rise and sit in unison, sometimes to read some responses together, rarely ever to sing, and by and large, to recognize the presence of God as a transcendent being suggested by the staid architectural and cultural magnificence which enfolded them.

The second stage developed with the migration from 1881 to 1924 of eastern European Jews for whom classical Reform seemed cold and devoid of Jewish substance or feeling. The new immigrants developed their own Conservative Movement, which remained true to worship styles they had known as Europeans, albeit in a modernized format. By the 1930s eastern Europeans were joining Reform Temples as well, bringing with them a yearning for traditional melodies and the warmth of the folk culture that classical Reform had jettisoned. The depression and then World War II delayed rapid evolution for two decades, and the shock of the Holocaust as well as the need to build and then to support the State of Israel readjusted Jewish concern away from local spirituality and toward world politics. But movement to the suburbs brought with it a recognizably different form of Jewish worship, especially for Reform Jews, whose classical style had been dependent on huge sanctuaries and pipe organs that no one in suburbia could afford, or, for that matter, even wanted any more.

By the 1960s, the third stage, a veritable second reformation for Jews had begun. Unhappiness with suburban worship and the need to express theologically the loss of the 6,000,000, and the miracle of a modern Jewish state led to the publication of new liturgies. In 1972, the Reform Movement began ordaining women as rabbis and investing them as cantors, reforms that eventually were replicated by Conservative and Reconstructionist Jews as well. (Reconstructionism, American Judaism's fourth movement, broke away from Conservative Judaism following the philosophy of Mordecai Kaplan, who emphasized Judaism as a civilization, held a high regard for tradition, but denounced many traditional Jewish beliefs including a personal deity and chosen peoplehood.)

Present directions suggest increased affirmation of egalitarianism in worship, and thus, revised liturgies with inclusive language. Musically, the cantor (man or woman) has made a dramatic reappearance as have traditional melodies, and a new "American sound" is being created by a small but growing cadre of synagogue composers. Above all, we find an accent again on spirituality, not only in the synagogue, but in the home too, which is emerging again as a licit locus for the Jew's stance before God.

JOHN THE BAPTIST, FEASTS OF

John the Baptist, great precursor of the Lord, is honored by two feasts in the Roman calendar: the Solemnity of the Birth of John the Baptist (June 24) and the memorial of the beheading of John the Baptist (August 29).

History

There was great devotion to the Baptist in both East and West from earliest times. Five sets of Mass texts are found in the Veronese (Leonine) Sacramentary (ca. 550; it is more of a compilation of texts than a sacramentary so called. Two of the sets are for a celebration of the eucharist at the baptismal font. Evidently it was a day in which more than one liturgy was celebrated: a vigil, at the altar and at the font.

In the East, the great day for the Baptist is January 7, connected with Epiphany, which is the commemoration of the Lord's baptism in the churches of the East. The West follows the gospel story and places John's conception six months before Christmas (Lk 1:36).

The memorial of the beheading was originally an Eastern celebration, probably marking the date of the dedication of a church of John the Baptist in Sebaste (4th century). It was celebrated in the Gallican and Mozarabic churches in the 7th century and only entered the Roman calendar later in the Middle Ages.

The Eastern churches celebrate a feast of the conception of the Baptist on September 24 (or 23: only the Lord is born exactly nine months after conception). This feast was found in several Western churches, but was not included in the Missal of 1570. There is also a feast of the discovery of the head of the Baptist on February 24. Again it found a place in some Western churches but was not included in the Tridentine reform.

Theology of the Celebrations

The celebration of the eucharist focuses on the story of John the Baptist. The readings proclaim him as the prophet known from before time began (Jer 1:4-10 [vigil]; 17-19 [beheading]; Is 49:1-6). His birth was surrounded by portents and he is revealed as one with a mission, growing to maturity in the desert (Lk 1:5-17 [vigil]; 57-66,80). He preached a message of baptism for the remission of sins and pointed to Christ as the one who was to come, greater than he (Acts 13, 22-26). He ultimately gives his life and leaves the scene to the Lamb of God (Mk 6:17-29 [beheading]).

The prayers develop some of these themes, though unfortunately the English translations do not capture the richness of the Latin. He is the precursor (vigil: opening prayer, preface; beheading: opening prayer; not in English), the great prophet who witnesses to the coming of the Savior (preface; beheading: opening prayer; birth: prayer after communion), greater than all those born of woman (preface). He points out to all the world the Lamb of God, who is now our sacrifice whom we receive (preface; prayer after communion for both vigil and birth). We can come to Christ because John has showed him to us and pointed out the way to follow him (vigil: opening prayer).

The celebration of the liturgy of the hours follows the same basic thought pattern. John is the prophet and herald of Christ. He is seen as the fulfillment of the prophecy that Elijah will return to herald the Messiah (birth: morning prayer; Mal 3:23-24). There is a bit more emphasis on John as found in the Prologue to John's gospel: the one sent to give testimony to the truth (birth: evening prayer II, Magnificat antiphon). There is the concern to keep John in proper context as the forerunner: he must increase and I must decrease (beheading: evening prayer, Magnificat antiphon).

John is still our herald, pointing out to us Christ from among those who claim our attention. He gave himself to the point of death for his message and challenges us to follow.

JOSEPH, FEASTS OF

St. Joseph, husband of Mary, protector of the boy Jesus, carpenter of Nazareth, is honored by two feasts in the Roman calendar: the Solemnity of Joseph, husband of Mary (March 19) and the optional memorial of St. Joseph the Worker (May 1).

History

Devotion to St. Joseph is relatively late. The first traces can be found among the Copts in the 8th/9th centuries. In the West the first celebrations are found in the 12th century: the Crusaders had a special devotion to Joseph, building a church in his honor in Nazareth. The devotion was subsequently fostered especially by the Franciscans, in particular Bernardine of Siena. The feast of Joseph became universal in the church in the late 15th century (by Sixtus IV, a Franciscan) and was made a holy day of obligation by Gregory XV in 1621. Pius IX declared Joseph the Patron of the Universal Church in 1870.

A second feast of St. Joseph, the Patrocinium, began among the Carmelites in 1680. It was extended to the whole church by Pius IX in 1847 on the third Sunday after Easter. Pius X in reforming the rubrics wanted to reemphasize the importance of Sunday, and so (among other changes) moved this feast of Joseph to the Wednesday before the third Sunday after Easter. Finally the feast was abolished in 1956 with the advent of the new feast of St. Joseph the Worker on May 1.

This new feast was promulgated by Pius XII in 1955 as a way of showing the church's relevance to the laboring person in a Europe which was threatened by communism and socialism and which celebrated Labor Day on May 1. The day was reduced to an optional memorial in 1969, noting that it might be used on any country's labor day.

Theology of the Celebrations

The celebration of the eucharist presents us with a brief catechesis on the meaning and role of Joseph. The readings for the solemnity situate Joseph within the plan of salvation history: he is the one who forms the connection with the Davidic promise (2 Sam 7:4-5; 12-14; 16). He is seen as one whose life is founded, like Abraham, on faith. Abraham became the father of many nations; Joseph is the father of the one who saved all the nations in faith (Rom 4:13, 16-18, 22). The gospels give the choice of reflecting on Joseph the dreamer, called to play a role in God's plan of incarnation (Mt 1:16, 18-21; 24), or the worried parent seeking his child who is instructing the doctors (Lk 2:41-51). [Note that many of these readings are pastiches: there is not a great deal about Joseph in the gospels.] The readings for Joseph the Worker are about the value of labor (Gen 1:26-2:3; Col 3:14-15, 17, 23-24). The gospel presents the parentage of Jesus: the carpenter's son (Mt 13:54-58).

The prayers offer further reflection on Jesus. The preface offers a wonderful synthesis: Joseph is the faithful servant, entrusted to be husband of Mary and protector of Jesus. As the protector of our Savior (opening prayer, prayer over the gifts) he also is committed to the care of the family of the church (opening prayer). We pray that our service will be as pure as that of Joseph (prayer over the gifts). Joseph is a model of proper stewardship of the gifts of this earth (worker opening prayer) and a model of the way we should spend our lives in love (worker prayer after communion).

The celebration of the liturgy of the hours sees Joseph primarily in his role as the link between the two testaments: he is the faithful servant, the fulfillment of the prophecies, one who embodies wisdom and fear of the Lord. The prayer for Joseph the Worker highlights that this world must be cared for since it is the creation of God and the arena in which the incarnation took place and our salvation unfolded.

Celebrating Joseph today reminds us that the incarnation is a historical reality, unfolding in time and in the lives of individuals demanding faith and terrible choices to remain true to the call of God in our lives.

LAITY, THEOLOGY OF THE

Historical Overview

Jesus preached to the laity of his day and picked his disciples from the laity, but he did not establish specific offices or structures of church or ministry such as we have today. In fact, our present terms laity, office, ministries, hierarchy, priesthood, diaconate, and religious have no immediate counterpart in Jesus' mission.

The Greek translations of the Bible generally used the word laos to mean the chosen people in contrast to the pagans around them. Early Christian writings refer to the community of the church as "the people of God" (laos theou), a term frequently complemented by references such as "the elect" (kletus), or "the holy ones" (hagioi), or "disciples" (mathetai), or "brothers and sisters" (adelphoi). These positive descriptions of the faithful are common in the first two centuries of the church, with only five or six possible exceptions in which the word laos describes the simple, inferior(?) people in contrast to their leadership. The term "laity" (laikos) derives from this rather negative use of laos. Clement of Rome (c. 96) in his letter to the Corinthians (40) is the first to use laikos in a way that suggests the incompetent masses of the people. This use is also found in Origen (In Jerem., hom. XI, 3), and especially in Clement of Alexandria ([d. 215] Strom III, 12, 90, 1; V, 6, 33, 3; Paed. III, 10, 83, 2). This consideration of laity as the

"plebs" of the church is intensified due to three developments in the life of the early church: Neo-platonism's influence on several Church Fathers, the growth of monasticism, and the development of the clerical dimension of the church. All three movements gave laity the image of second-class citizens because of their involvement with the material world which was thought to make them profane. The equation of holiness with monasticism thus introduced a minimalist approach to lay spirituality, and the introduction of a grading or ranking of church membership left the laity subordinated and powerless. By the 4th century, church structures were similar to political ones, and the subordination of laity was already a firm part of church life; "lay" meant profane, and in the liturgy laity were separated from clergy by the construction of solid screens dividing the sanctuary from the people (Antioch as early as 390, and Hagia Sophia, Constantinople, in 570).

Paralleling these structural changes in the life of the church, with the resulting downgrading of laity, were significant developments in liturgy that, at times, evidenced a positive approach to laity, and, at other times, confirmed the move to passivity and exclusion. In early NT times, all the faithful shared in decision making, mission priorities, and ministry. The first negative development for laity occurred with the exclusion of women from leadership roles in the church. Although Jesus had preached respect for the freedom of women, their roles in the new community were soon suppressed and their new found leadership stifled. Lay faithful chose from among their community those who would exercise leadership, and once chosen, the individual led the celebration without any thought of priesthood. Early Christian writings speak of teachers and prophets presiding at the eucharist (Didache, 9-10), or other eminent individuals with the consent of the people (Clement, Letter to the Corinthians, 44, 3), or those who confessed their faith under persecution (Apost. Trad. of Hippolytus, 9). The presumption of the Fathers is that the leader of the community presides at the eucharist. Moreover, with or without the use of terms such as bishop, there is no explicit reference to the priesthood of the presider at the eucharist before the beginning of the 3rd century. While writings rarely refer to the ministerial priesthood, they frequently speak of the priesthood of all believers (Origen, In Lev. hom. IX, 1; VI 2; Tertullian, De orat., CXXVIII; Ambrose, De myst., VI, 30). Even after the sacerdotalization of ministry, Tertullian, himself a layperson, told other laity to celebrate the eucharist in the absence of a priest (De Exhort. Cast., 7, 3; see also De Praesc., 41:5-8). Other Fathers, including St. Augustine, rejected this possibility (Litt. 3, 8). Theodoret informs us that laity celebrated the eucharist during the early 4th century evangelization of Ethiopia (Hist. Eccles. I, 23, 5). Even when lay presiding was no longer allowed, and lay people no longer viewed as extraordinary presiders of the eucharist, they gave communion to each other and to themselves, keeping communion in their homes for such purposes (St. Basil, Letter, 93). Laity, then, presided over the community and at the celebration of the eucharist, and even when the church institutionalized its ministries of overseer and deacon, these clerics were warned not to exalt themselves over the people (Apost. Const. VIII, 1, 20).

Documents of the early church also refer to the involvement of laity in the preparation and celebration of baptism. A layperson contributed both to the educational component of the catechumenate and to the rituals of prayer and imposition of hands (Apost. Trad., 19). Tertullian did not restrict the layperson's role to catechist and sponsor, important though these were, but he also told the laity to baptize in the absence of a priest (De Exhort. Cast. 7, 3).

The history of the sacrament of penance is complicated. Laity always played a major community role in the ceremonies and in the spiritual counselling and direction that accompanied conversion. Clement of Alexandria considered saintly laity on a par with priest and bishop in the forgiveness of sins (Strom. VI, 13). Confession to a layperson was practiced during the Carolingian reform; first lesser sins and later even grave sins were confessed to a layperson. Albert the Great considered such confession a sacrament (IV Sent. dist. xvii, art. 59). Lay confession, at times a widespread practice, survived until the 14th century.

Innocent I (Ep. ad Decentium, [c.416] 8, 11) confirms the expressed views of other early writers that in the first centuries laity kept oils at home and anointed their sick. This practice continued in subsequent centuries when writers like Caesarius of Arles ([d. 543] Sermon 279, 5) and later the Venerable Bede ([d. 735] Commentary on Ep. James) still considered the layperson as the extraordinary minister of the anointing of the sick, even though admittedly there was no fixed ritual until priests became the ordinary ministers.

In addition to involvement in the liturgical rituals, laity preached and evangelized, often as official catechists, as Origen did in Caesarea while still a layperson. Others were traveling missionaries, as Paul had been.

In early centuries, Christian marriage was a family affair, validly established by the consent of the partners. While clerical interventions for pastoral reasons are traceable to the time of Ignatius of Antioch, it was generally considered superfluous. Marriage in the presence of the church's clergy was unknown in the early centuries, except in the cases of marriages of clergy and of catechumens. From the 4th century, clergy became ecclesiastical witnesses, guardians for the marriages of poor orphans, and gave marriage blessings when invited to the celebrations. Since baptism was understood to sanctify the marriage of Christians, liturgical ceremonies that accompanied marriage were not essential but pastorally helpful to show the church's support of the partners' decision. Mutual consent was enough even in the 9th century. Accompanying ceremonies were provided optionally by local churches, with individual ecclesiastics insisting on their necessity. By the 10th century, bishops who were also feudal overlords claimed not only pastoral and moral authority, but jurisdictional power too; never however diminishing the fact that the partners' consent was the only component for validity. Theologians and church leaders of the 11th to 13th centuries debated the sacramental nature of marriage, including it among the seven sacraments accepted in the early 12th century. It was not until the Council of Trent that a ceremony presided over by clergy was declared necessary for validity, and even then, it was primarily to prevent clandestine marriages.

The writings of Church Fathers firmly establish the laity's right to choose their leaders (Clement, Ignatius, Justin, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Cyprian). Moreover, the person who presided over the community presided at the eucharist in the name of the priestly people in the communal sharing of the action of Christ the priest. Even after the sacerdotalization of ministry, laity still elected their leaders, and the prohibition of absolute ordinations, i.e., without a community, forbidden by canon 6 of Chalcedon, was only changed in the 12th century.

The ecclesiasticalization and sacerdotalization of ministry gradually led to the exclusion of laity from functions they had performed, in some cases, for centuries. Sometimes exclusion resulted from a different understanding of a sacrament, as in the case of a juridical emphasis on the sacrament of penance, implying the power of the keys which it was thought only belonged to clerics. Sometimes the progressive restriction of laity was based on prudence not doctrine, as was the case with preaching; the prudence then being justified by theological arguments. Sometimes politics, education, and sociological developments led to the current clerical/non-clerical church. Liturgy is an excellent portrayal of ecclesiology, and of the history of ecclesiology, and it manifests the main lines in the historical development of the roles of laity in the church. Community and democracy characterize the apostolic church more than any hierarchical structure. Its many ministries are not stated to be sacerdotal and the primary celebrant of liturgy is the community. Even after the sacerdotalization of ministry, laity are still the extraordinary ministers of baptism, the eucharist, penance, and the anointing of the sick.

While it is easier to deal with the clear-cut canonical distinctions of today, such artificial distinctions are hardly faithful to the dynamic interrelationships between the community and its chosen hierarchy in the first three centuries. In a political community that esteemed rank, the church soon established ranks for those who served the community, and these extended their control to the laity's loss, eventually producing a two-tiered church, even minor ministries being brought under the power of the priesthood. Thus, we gradually pass from an ecclesiology of communion to an ecclesiology of power (Congar). The passivity of laity increased in feudal times, and medieval councils further consolidated it. Eventually, Trent legitimized the separation between clergy and people, seen so clearly in the people's passivity in the liturgy of the imposed Roman Canon. Laity are excluded from all active participation in the life of their church, clerical control reaching such proportions that in the minds of most people "the church" came to mean the hierarchy.

Vatican II and the Laity

Three developments of Vatican II reversed the downward trend in the life and role of laity that began at the end of the 3rd and beginning of the 4th century. The ecclesiology of Vatican II, reinforced by the extraordinary Synod of 1985, stressed the church as a communion (L.G., 31:1), in which "each individual part of the Church contributes through its special gifts to the good of the other parts of the whole Church" (L.G., 13:3). This ecclesiology of communion, "the central and fundamental idea of the council's documents" (1985 Synod, Final Report, C, 1), finds both its source and culminating expression in the liturgy, and must be manifested in a co-responsible and collaborative approach to the church (Final Report, C, 6). Second, linked to this vision of communion is the council's affirmation of the universal call to holiness: "It is evident to everyone that all the faithful of Christ of whatever rank or status are called to the fullness of the Christian life and to the perfection of charity" (L.G., 40:3). This vision of a common calling must direct the reading of conciliar texts, as the document on the church implies, when it reminds readers that "Everything which has been said so far concerning the People of God applies equally to the laity, religious, and clergy"

(L.G., 30:1). A third development of paramount importance is the council's declaration on the autonomy of earthly realities (G.S., 36), and the insistence that building a better world is part of God's plan (A.A., 7:1).

These three core convictions are united in the council's theological evaluation of lay life (L.G., 31). This paragraph changed through four schemas, from the rather negative and minimalistic view of lay life in the first schema, to a more positive appreciation of both the world and lay life in the second and third schema, to the ecclesial vision of the final draft, which characterizes laity by their active belonging to the church and co-responsible sharing both in internal church life and in ecclesial outreach to the world to build up the Kingdom. This evaluation avoids any split between clergy and laity, acknowledges that laity share in the responsibility for the entire church while not holding office in the organization, and affirms that the earthly ordering of temporal society is the specific way in which a layperson seeks the Kingdom of God. This synthesis is restated by the 1987 Synod on Laity when it claims that the vocation and mission of laity is to be the communion of the church and that their ministry is to serve primarily in secular situations.

This integration of laity into a positive vision of the church as communion is complemented by the teachings of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy. The document insists that liturgy is a celebration of the whole community, as a sacrament of unity (S.C., 26:1), in which each Christian participates according to the distinction of roles (S.C., 26:2; 28). While speaking of liturgy the document offers a vision of church when it states, "whenever rites . . . make provision for communal celebration involving the presence and active participation of the faithful, this way of celebrating them is to be preferred" (S.C., 27:1).

In the years since the council, we have seen several different theologies of laity, often due to a separating of one of the three conciliar developments from the other two. One approach sees laity as totally dependent on clergy for the inner life of the church and as instruments in the hands of the hierarchy, who are presumed in this approach to have exclusively received mission and authority for ministry from Jesus. A second theology sees laity as an ecclesial presence to the world. Inserted into secular circumstances, the laity are called to influence the world with Christ's message and to be present to the world in the name of the church. The church's inner life of word and sacrament nourishes the laity for this task. A third theology of laity interprets their role as one of world transformation and clearly emphasizes their social responsibility, world transformation, and the fight against injustice. A fourth theology stresses collegiality, co-responsibility, and the priesthood of all the faithful. This approach implies a restructuring of the church, and is frequently experienced in basic ecclesial communities, team ministry, and intervocational work. A fifth theology is the open-ended exploratory approach of many laity today, who courageously launch into new approaches to church life, spirituality, and ministry. Each of these theological approaches is extensively promoted, but none of them has obtained exclusive support.

From Vatican II to the 1987 Synod on the Laity

From the close of the Second Vatican Council in 1965 to Pope John Paul's post-synodal Apostolic Exhortation on the Laity in 1988 there have been both struggle and clarification in the understanding of the vocation and mission of laity in the church and in the world.

The council still defines laity primarily in a negative way, sees their proper and special characteristic as secularity, and understands their vocation as engaging in temporal affairs (L.G., 31). As Christians in the heart of the world, their mission includes: the work of evangelization (A.A., 6:1) by the quality of their lives (A.G., 36:3; L.G., 31:3-4; 35:3-5), by promoting the word (A.A., 6:3) and by transforming the environment in which they live (A.A., 13:1); personal responsibility for the charitable service of the needy (G.S., 21:6); the development of Christian dimensions of family life (A.A., 11:1) by making families into schools of holiness (L.G., 35:4; G.S., 48), of social virtues (G.E., 3), of ministry (L.G., 35:3-4), and of the social defense of family values (G.S., 52); and a social mission (A.A., 13:1) that includes working for justice (A.G., 12:3), defending human dignity (G.S., 26:2), educating at all levels of the community (G.S., 60:1), and serving the public in communications and politics (I.M., 14; G.S., 75:7; A.A., 14:1-2). The secular mission of laity is their "proper and indispensable role in the mission of the Church" (A.A., 1:1), their way of sharing the priestly, prophetic, and royal office of Christ (A.A., 2:2). For these tasks laity receive charisms, "so that all according to their proper roles may cooperate in this common mission of the Church with one heart" (L.G., 30:2). Laity have a right to use these gifts (A.A., 3:3), and conciliar documents urge pastors to recognize and use them (L.G., 30:2) as an essential complement to their own mission and ministry (A.A., 10:1).

In addition to a mission in the world, the council states that "every layman [and woman], by virtue of the very gifts bestowed upon him [or her], is at the same time a witness and a living instrument of the mission of the Church herself" (L.G., 33:2). While not developed as fully as their secular mission, the council recognizes laity's responsibility for the internal life of the church (A.A., 3:3; 16:3), seen in collaborative efforts with their pastors (A.A., 10:1), and including liturgical participation (S.C., 11), community building (G.S., 92:1; A.G., 19), and co-responsibility for the life of their church (A.A., 10).

In the years following the council, laity emerged with new roles and opportunities in the local and international church. This period of growth and new awareness was accompanied by years of doubt, frustration and dissatisfaction. In 1980 the U. S. bishops published their pastoral Called and Gifted: Catholic Laity 1980 in which they urged the laity to rekindle their excitement in the vision of the council, calling them to adulthood, holiness, ministry and community. The decade of the 1980s has witnessed the growth of collaboration, with its accompanying need to clarify roles in the church. The new Code of Canon Law, published in 1983, gives an unprecedented list of rights for all the faithful, specifically for laity as members of the church and in their internal service of the church, for laity in their local parishes, and in the exercise of diocesan offices. Unfortunately the new code's ecclesiology, hardly that of the council, reinforces the hierarchical, centralized power of the church, more than any previous document of church history.

First announced in 1985, the Synod on Laity stimulated a worldwide reflection on the roles of laity. In 1985, the Vatican Synod Secretariate distributed its Guidelines ("Lineamenta") on The Vocation and the Mission of the Laity, calling for wide consultation with laity. The document, which suffered from unhealthy dualistic language, expressed concern over what it saw as role confusion between the vocations and as laity's over-accommodation to modern culture. It recommended a reaffirmation of the strong distinctions between clergy, religious, and laity, and a clearer tension between faith and secular culture. It offered no new vision or reinterpretation, but drew its solutions from a restatement of traditional responses. More basically, the Lineamenta failed to take account of the ecclesiological developments in and since the council, or to interpret the Vatican Council's theology of laity in light of its ecclesiology, but simply relied on the council's statements about laity without filtering these through its new understanding of church. Following an analysis of responses from around the world, a new Working Paper was presented in 1987, correcting some of the weaknesses of the Guidelines, and most notably introducing a distinction between the vocation of laity to participate fully in the communion of the church and their mission to be involved primarily in secular situations. This fine document formed the basis of the Synod's reflections, and most of the resulting 54 propositions can be paralleled with the document's developments. The 1987 Synod on Laity ended with a "Message to the People of God," and its recommendations were the basis for Pope John Paul II's Apostolic Exhortation on the Laity (Christifideles Laici), published on December 30, 1988, and distributed in February 1989.

Pope John Paul II's Apostolic Exhortation is a positive and affirming document in which he speaks respectfully throughout of the lay faithful, presenting a positive vision for them, based upon a common dignity in baptism (10) and a basic common call to holiness (11) while exercising functions distinct from clergy and religious. All vocations equally belong to the church and its mystery and share a common call to ministry. Lay faithful have the source of their life and call in baptism that regenerates, unites, and anoints them in the mystery of the church's communion, and grants them a share in the priestly, prophetic, and royal office of Jesus (14). Sharing a common dignity and responsibility for the church's mission, laity exercise their mission in secular circumstances, which is not only a sociological statement, but part of their theological and ecclesiological reality (15). Their call to holiness, which they share with all members of the church, is likewise distinguished and specified by their commitment and call to renew the temporal order (16). Lay faithful participate in the life of the church as communion (18), which is an organic life of diversity and complementarity (20). Lay faithful accept and realize this call to communion through their complementary capacity for participation in the life and mission of the church. The church's mission is achieved by all in solidarity, each carrying out the ministries, offices, and roles proper to the way they vocationally live their baptism (21), sustained by the charisms each have for the benefit of the ecclesial communion and the world that the church serves (24). Pope John Paul II calls lay faithful to foster a sense of the universal church (25), a dedication to the parish as the most visible expressions of ecclesial communion (26), and the development of concrete forms of participation in local church life that are both individual and group (28). Turning to develop the co-responsibility of the lay faithful in the church's mission, the pope urges lay faithful to accept a mission to build up communion (32), to undertake a re-evangelization first of the ecclesial community (34) and then also of the world (35), to serve the dignity of individual persons (37), their rights and freedom, and of society, especially in the family (40), in solidarity with all, in public life, and in socio-economic and cultural life. The pope directs part IV of his letter to the varied vocations in the church (45-56), calling all to be stewards of God's varied graces. His final focus is on the formation of the lay faithful in their life (57), vocation, and mission (58), on building an integrated life through collaboration with the Lord (59), and on reciprocal openness to each other (63).

Components of a Theology of Laity Baptismal Vocation

The Vatican Council presented baptism as the common fundamental experience of Christianity, even interpreting priestly ordination and religious profession as intensifications of baptismal vocation. This common calling is the special dignity given equally to all Christians.

Sacramental Life. The church in this century moved away from any elitist approach to Christian life and holiness, rather presenting the sacramental system of the church as the basis for all growth. The liturgy and the sacraments become the central expression of the whole covenanted people's commitment to the Lord.

Church as Communion. A central idea of the council and major post-conciliar documents, this understanding sees the church as a community of disciples with equal dignity and rights, structured according to functions. This vision of church is visibly portrayed through participatory styles of government and collaboration in ministry. All the baptized share a common vocation to be the communion of the church.

Sharing Christ's Life. A result of baptism is the sharing in the life of Jesus, particularly in the three-fold office of the Lord. Jesus' priestly, prophetic, and royal offices are shared with all members of the church, even though each will live them according to his or her distinct baptismal vocations.

The Holy Spirit's Varied Charisms. Laity are living instruments of the mission of the church, endowed by the Holy Spirit with charisms for the common good of both the inner life of the church and its mission of outreach to the world. A community that mutually appreciates each member's gifts, the church is composed of varied vocations, each one realizing that it is incomplete without the others, since we are an intervocalational community that finds life and enrichment in each other.

Christian Priesthood. The prime priestly reality in Christianity is the priesthood of all the baptized, and the ministerial priesthood, essentially different, and therefore not implying a difference of dignity, is established to support the priesthood of all the baptized. The latter is exercised by active participation in the liturgy and in the secular circumstances of daily life.

Condition is Mission. One experiences the call of the Lord in the concrete circumstances of one's life, partly the result of one's history and partly the result of choice—one's own and God's. The condition of the lay faithful is secularity. While not diminishing their vocation to be living members of the communion of the church and to equally share in the church's mission to spread the redemptive grace of the Lord, laity do this in the secular circumstances of life. This condition modifies their way of responding to the Lord, of developing their own holiness, and of collaborating with the church community.

Growth From the Foundations. The council complemented its teachings on the universal church with a strong emphasis on the local church, whether seen as diocese, parish, basic ecclesial group, or family. If ecclesial life is strong in these basic and primary groups of local church, then it can be strong at other levels. Emphasis on laity as fully contributing to the life, holiness, and mission of the church, appreciates that growth rises from the members as well as filters down from the leaders.

Viewing the laity as integrally church, active contributing members, is both respectful and theologically sound. However, there are a few potential problems that can weaken this vision. 1. Some recent documents, maintaining exaggerated distinctions between clergy and laity, could encourage the maintenance of a clergy-laity split in the church, and thwart authentic collaboration. While the clericalization of laity may be a potential danger in very restricted circumstances, the secularization of laity who are presumed to have no interest in the inner life of the church and the greater clericalization of clergy are far more serious problems. 2. The dangerous desire to control laity, individually or in groups, is as real as ever. The renewal of lay life by the hierarchy is potentially a paternalistic put-down of lay life in which laity become a renewed object of clerical apostolate rather than collaborators in mutual renewal. 3. A third danger for lay life is the lay mimicking of prior clerical autocratic styles of life and government. As we see hierarchies of laity surfacing around the nation and the world, whether in local churches, in spiritual movements, or in national lay organizations, the baptized have reason to worry and to challenge. 4. A fourth is a lack of an integrated renewal of lay life which values both the lay faithful's internal service to the church and their mission to renew the temporal order. Movements that stress either one of these to the exclusion of the other are hardly likely to have long-term effects. 5. A further danger is to leave things as they are, maintaining current distinctions which are not based on baptismal choices and functions, but history, economics, and laws. We have witnessed plenty of adaptations in lay life, but very little doctrinal renewal in the Church that effectively leads to a renewed understanding of the lay faithful's original roles in the community of the Lord.

LANGUAGE AND HUMAN EXPERIENCE

During the 20th century there has been a great surge of interest in language studies among philosophers. Though no single method or approach has emerged to embrace the whole field, one common concern that has come to the fore is the relationship between language and human experience. This article treats this relationship in four sections: (1) language, (2) human experience, (3) linguistic disclosure of human experience, and (4) liturgical implications and questions.

Language

At least three major currents can be identified within contemporary language studies. One includes both logical positivists and linguistic analysts, on the one hand (e.g., Moore, Russell, Ryle, Ayer), and those concerned with the functioning and composition of linguistic units, on the other (e.g., Levi-Strauss, Chomsky). These approach language study as science, with the same methodic rigor that is employed in the physical sciences. Largely empirical in their method, they seek an objectivity similar to that enjoyed by physical scientists. In this systematic and technical approach to language they neglect any reference that lies outside the scientific and methodic examination of language structure. Their contribution is to establish language study as an objective science with results that must be taken seriously.

A second current focuses on linguistic usage, either in the form of "language games" or as linguistic performativity

(e.g., Wittgenstein, Austin, Searle, Evans). Since these are principally concerned with communication, their primary issue is the effect of language on, and the relationship of language to, interlocutors. They consider language as a subjective act which expresses the meaning which human experience has. The limit to their approach is that they offer no explanation as to how the language used is related to the experience which is expressed.

A third group, I'll call them simply "philosophers of language" (e.g., Husserl, Heidegger, Ricoeur), does address this relationship question. Going beyond language usage, these philosophers of language are not content to say simply that language expresses human experience. Rather, they wish to uncover the determinate relationship between language and human experience and its ontological significance. They seek to explain how language discloses being in new ways. For them, language not only expresses human experience, but in fact constitutes a creative redescription of reality.

Each of these currents has, of course, many variations and fine points that distinguish thinkers within their own specific grouping. For our purpose here, however, it is the positive contribution of each group taken as a whole that provides an advance to the question at hand, namely the relationship between language and human experience. Language study (a) is a methodic science, (b) involves a subject and a subjective act, and (c) potentially redescribes reality.

What is common . . . [continue para. 2, p. 3].

What is common to each group is a concern for the question of meaning. The linguistic analysts consider meaning to be uncovered within the structure of the text itself. The performativity theorists see meaning as having much to do with the relationship of language to, and its affect on, the subjects involved in communication. Philosophers of language locate meaning at the level of the experience which is disclosed by language.

Language philosophers assume that the source of meaning is anterior to its expression in language. "Anterior" is used here in a logical sense, that is, experience comes to expression in language, but not necessarily in the chronological sense that one is aware of experience before its expression in language. In actuality, awareness usually first focuses on language which provides an at-hand cipher of experience. Then through reflection there is a cognizance of experience itself. One of the challenges of interpretation is to say just what it is that comes to language, what is the experience being expressed and what is the meaning attached to that human act.

When the interlocutors are present to each other, communication of meaning is a fairly straightforward process because there can be a "checking up" between them to ensure common understanding. For the most part, however, the meanings which shape the world in which people live do not come from situations where the interlocutors are physically present to each other. More usually meaning is determined by various tracers left in society or in various communities by human action. The most common of these traces are written texts (but not limited to them). In these acts of communication the determination of meaning is not so straightforward. It requires tools of interpretation. One heuristic approach which was put forth first by Frege and later adapted and used extensively by Ricoeur is the distinction between sense and reference.

Sense is one level of meaning which can be uncovered in the structure of the discourse itself. The linguistic analysts address their task at this level of meaning. Sense is an ideal meaning which can be uncovered by application of any number of scientific linguistic approaches. If this were all there were to meaning, univocity and clarity would be the standard fare in communication. Usually, however, this is not the case. Language is most often equivocal and strains at these structural limitations.

For Ricoeur, meaning is a dialectic between sense and reference. Reference insures that language relates to what is. When one speaks, one speaks about something. It is at this deeper level of meaning that the philosophers of language make their ontological claims. Reference is that logically prior source of meaning (experience) which is brought to language and is uncovered in the interpretive act as an extralinguistic dimension of discourse.

The reference brought to language is not a predetermined "givenness" that merely must be enunciated. More is at stake than this. The reference of a text is the world of possibilities that lies before the text. Here, one's ownmost possibilities are projected and, through the interaction of the world of the text and one's own world, new possibilities for human living emerge which are none other than the redescription of reality referred to above. The logical sequence is experience-articulation-new experience. Thus the interpretation of a text enlarges the horizon of the hermeneut in such a way that there is a new self-understanding. Interpretation, then, means more than determining the sense of a text. More importantly, interpretation of discourse is a process whereby meaning emerges as new possibilities to be lived, with and through its potential redescription of reality. This process delivers an extralinguistic import that effects an ontological claim on language-use and its relationship to human experience.

Human Experience

Rather than sense data or feelings of

"good" or "bad," human experience is a subject's reflective engagement with reality. Thus, experience is dialectical: it has both a reference to reality as well as a self-reference (subject). In other words, experience is more concerned with a subject's response to reality than with taking it in.

The concept of experience as a "response" to reality supports experience understood as an event which, in turn, evokes the notion of temporality. Human experience occurs in history. In its very broadest extension, history can be thought simply in terms of that which occurs between two points in the human reckoning of time; for example, between birth and death, between now and when the guests arrive, or between one celebration and the next. Or, history can be understood in a more specific and rich meaning: as unlocking the sources, a sequence of human events and meaning that fills human temporality. In this sense, history is not a structure imposed on time but a reflection on and interpretation of human events that reveal the structure of those events. To interpret is to engage in the work of history. What is interpreted? Human action as given in the traces of its structure.

Various linguistic concretizations of the traces of human action—to borrow from Aristotle's Poetics—are a mimesis, an imitation of human action. Here "imitation" does not mean "artificial reproduction" or a "mere duplication" of human action. Rather, mimesis is a structuring of human action by the construction of its traces in concrete works, a creative event which makes human action available within timeness and enables both the possibility of recovering human action and of redescribing reality. It is this redescription which requires interpretation and empowers a new self-understanding. Mimesis brings together the linguistic and temporal dimensions of human activity. Linguistic concretizations which are mimetic of human events are indicative of the way people or societies order human experience. The infinity of human events becomes somewhat manageable in mediation by a finiteness of structure available for examination and interpretation. What takes place in time, between two points in time, is viably structured by human creativity which then renders human activity recoverable at another point in time. There are two events: the first is a point in time which is a fleeting event—here follows the second event—that nevertheless remains accessible when, through reflection, history is created and experience is deciphered.

Besides temporality, the concept of human experience as response suggests sociality. There is a certain "connectedness" about human living which breaks down isolation barriers between persons and between times. This connectedness constitutes tradition, a more or less definite sequence for doing things proportionate to the depth of connectedness of the community. In a well-defined community such as Christianity, tradition begins in what can be called an "originary" experience. More than just a handing down or repeating of experience, communication through tradition is, first of all, an appropriation of experience to oneself in light of the originary event. Additionally, communication pertains to the redescribing of that experience in light of ongoing experiences. Communication, then, is a wholly engaging activity whereby one's own experiences interact with a tradition of redescriptions of the "originary" experience.

Human experience is communicated by means of language, and different experiences require different expressions. Therefore, one task is to identify the different modes of expressions through which the common experience of a community comes to language.

Linguistic Disclosure of Human Experience

Not all modes of linguistic expressions promise to deliver the same richness with respect to the possibility of redescribing reality. Certain linguistic forms are privileged in addressing this special ontological task and, similar to the gains evidenced by the different currents of language studies, different linguistic expressions make certain gains in their capacity to redescribe reality. Basically, three classes of linguistic forms have been at center front of language studies: word (or symbol), propositions (or discourse), and text. The pursuit has been to indicate what experience is uncovered by each of these linguistic forms.

(a) Word

The word (or symbol) has long held an esteemed position in language studies. Its primary access to experience has been through its unique multivalent capacity. There would arise no problems with interpretation and no problems with meaning if natural languages were univocal. This is not the case. Natural languages are inherently equivocal: in any dictionary most words have more than one "definition." By means of one meaning, evident and available in the linguistic code itself, a second (hidden) meaning revelatory of human experience becomes accessible. However, to progress in uncovering the dynamic relationship of language and human experience one must realize that multivalence in itself has no potential to redescribe reality. This, because the word (or symbol) lacks the predicative thrust of other linguistic forms.

(b) Performance

Language has come to be viewed not so much as an ideal code composed of words in a dictionary (in French, langue), multivalent though they may be, but in a much broader, propositional sense. The human sciences have made a significant contribution towards shaping this broad notion of language as speech (French: parole) as having something to do with the human subject predicating something about human experience. In this, the noteworthy contribution of language-use philosophers has been that certain utterances are even more than propositional statements of fact. Indeed, the very speaking implicates the interlocutors in a certain kind of human activity. Every utterance is a performance, that is, in the very speaking one involves oneself or another in a certain human activity. For example, the liturgical formula "I confess" is not so much concerned with a propositional statement as it is with the public declaration of faith of the speaker(s) apart from or in addition to any propositional value. When the import of the utterance redounds to the speaker(s), it is an "illocutionary" speech act; when it redounds to the one(s) spoken to, it is a "perlocutionary" act. An example of the latter speech act would be "I command you to do such-and-such," where the command is given in the very saying and bids the hearer to do such-and-such an action. Distinguishing self-involving utterances is one way to account for the truism that discourse is always language with a subject. Discourse is grounded in the human experience that gives rise to it on the one hand, and, on the other hand, it is the subject's self-involvement which is constitutive of the act of communication itself. The very act of discourse is a response to reality that discloses meaning. But this still does not address the question about language's capacity to redescribe reality. Discourse itself remains limited in its relationship to human experience. A third use of language, the textual moment, brings this relationship to its fullest articulation.

(c) Text

Words can be purposely combined in creative, genre-governed, and stylistic ways to yield a certain use of language called text (not necessarily written, but any concretization of human activity). A special case of text that uniquely illustrates interpretation's capacity to redescribe reality is that of text as metaphor. These linguistic constructions necessitate attention at two levels, namely, from the vantage points of two different semantic fields. A metaphor says one thing that makes no literal sense but means another thing that makes eminent poetic sense. For example, "This [bread] is my body" makes no literal sense; at the literal level the language defies sense data. Bread is not body. Nonetheless, as sacramental theology has always insisted, a metaphor expresses what is real and true. The nature of metaphor is to juxtapose two fields of meaning, the poetic and the conceptual. The poetic field of meaning has a certain literal linguistic sense that is "non-sense," that grates, and that has a semantic "twist." This is precisely what pushes one beyond a literal meaning toward an innovative meaning learned by reflection from within the conceptual field. The dialectic of these two semantic fields generates something new.

Ricoeur speaks of a "split" sense (literal, poetic non-sense and reflective, conceptual, innovative sense) that results in a "split" reference. The split reference is both the literal reference which belies an experience of the "really real" (and in that sense is untrue) and the conceptual reference which opens up a world of possibilities (hence, makes the metaphor "true" and, indeed, an apt disclosure of experience). Within the conceptual field believing Christians can truly and with meaning assert, "This is my Body." And with that statement of metaphor there opens a reference, a world of possibilities, that enlarges the horizon of understanding. Christians have of themselves. In this way metaphor not only has a reference to reality, but also a self-reference. Metaphor discloses reality and it enlarges self-understanding. Metaphor is a way of speaking experience. With metaphor one sees clearly the ontological import of language.

(d) Narrative Text

There is another, longer kind of text which also shows the ontological underpinnings of language and at the same time adds a temporal dimension to the discussion, namely, the narrative. The theory of narrativity has its various identifiable currents and representative thinkers as does the theory of language (e.g., Scholes and Kellogg, Genette, and Auerbach; liturgically, Stevick). Two aspects particularly advance these reflections on language and human experience. First, narrative is a larger unit of poetic discourse having its own rules of composition that employ human action. Second, narrative allows one to speak experience in time (that is, within a particular temporal frame of reference).

Inherent to narrative is a concreteness realized in its "story-telling" characteristic. Necessary for narrative is a storyteller and a certain sequence of actions (Aristotle: plot) that keep the story moving, draw it to a conclusion, and render it plausible. When the audience/readers can easily identify with the characters and events, they can be drawn into the story such that there is an extension of the story beyond the temporal framework of the story itself into the temporal framework of the immediate circumstances of the audience. The experience that the language of the story makes available to the audience is appropriated by the audience as new possibilities for their own living. Thus the story does not remain an element of literature but opens up a world of possibilities to be appropriated by the audience or the readers.

Though stories may be repeated, each "reading" of a story is a new event offering new possibilities. Repetition of a narrative is always a new event. There is, then, both a literary temporality and an existential temporality about narrative. Its literary temporality is the (historical or fictional) frame of temporal reference particular to the story. Its existential temporality is the projection beyond the literary work into the real experience of the audience or readers and here, again, one approaches an ontology of language. While the ontological as such is never directly accessible, it is recoverable in narrative through the relationship of the world given in the literary language and in the redescription of the world of the readers by means of their having entered into the story and having thus appropriated new possibilities to their experience. The more significant meaning of narrative as speaking experience in time is this appropriate act. In a sense, the reading/hearing of a story is none other than a reshaping of human action.

Language studies have taught that there can be no direct recovery of self or experience or knowing; these are always mediated by language and therefore demand an attentiveness to language. Nonetheless, though the link between language and human experience can only be demonstrated as an indirect one, this link does assure that various uses of language carry traces of the fleeting efforts of human activity. And, from the other side, critical examination of language-use, especially poetic texts, is a window into the meaning, never entirely lost, of human activity.

Liturgical Implications and Questions

The relationship between language and human experience is more than just an interesting philosophical concern. It has ramifications cutting across many disciplines, not the least of which is the study of sacraments and liturgy. A number of points are pertinent: liturgical texts as "originary" expressions of Christian experience, liturgical participation as self-involving, liturgy as dynamic event, and the relationship of liturgy and culture.

Originary experiences are communicated through originary expressions. For Christians, this is primarily by means of scripture and liturgical formulae. One approach to this inscription of tradition is to treat scriptural and liturgical texts as objects for scientific investigation. Much information has been gained from historical and comparative approaches to these texts, but this is not enough because there is a residue of meaning which cannot be uncovered by rigorous, structural methods alone. Attentiveness to the surplus of meaning in language-use requires other hermeneutical methods, but those liturgists who have turned their hermeneutical attention to this problem have done so primarily by focusing on liturgical symbols. However, liturgical expressions of sacramental reality are more than assortments of symbols. Liturgical language, in addition to the verbal, also takes into account the poetic, visual, aural, gustatory, tactile, olfactory, gestural: in effect, a whole linguistic gamut which cries out for interpretation especially in its textuality. As such, these liturgical texts require an interpretation that employs language-use and textual methods, areas just beginning to open up among liturgists which promise rich reward for the advancement of the meaning of liturgy particularly with respect to a liturgical text's relationship to experience.

Another concern of contemporary liturgists is that liturgy cannot be isolated from the lives of those who celebrate. Contemporary sacramental theology—a hermeneutics of liturgy—does not begin with the divine and deduce principles therefrom, but begins with human experience and therein discovers the divine. No wonder a clarion call for "participation" by S.C. brought about immediate and recognizable changes. By means of the revision of all the liturgical rites, a certain level of participation was achieved, certainly aided by celebrations in the vernacular. Further, while the revision of the rites struggled with verbal, textual aspects and promoted "active participation" within this context, other approaches seeking to understand language in its broader extension and as relating to human experience suggest a deeper level on which to evaluate the meaning of participation. New concerns emerged from these renewal efforts, concerns to which liturgists have been attentive. One quickly discovered that "involving the people" in liturgy did not necessarily in itself effect the desired fruits of those celebrations. What was initially dealt with, by means of a de facto reductionist approach to participation, is now looked at in a new light. The self-involving implications of performative language suggest a whole new meaning to the notion of "participation." Christian worship is chiefly a celebration of the paschal mystery. In the context of the relationship between language and human experience, this says that the Jesus event cannot be relegated to time past. The meaning of Christian celebration is to interpret that originary event within time now. The self-involving language of liturgy—I confess, profess, pray, praise, ask, promise, proclaim, etc.—says that liturgy's interpretive activity is ultimately a redescription of present Christian experience in light of the tradition of interpretations of the paschal mystery. This is the deepest significance of the meaning of "participation," so much so that participation does not occur until there is an appropriation of the redescription of reality made possible by entering into the celebration. In other words, physically "being there" and singing and standing and kneeling simply is insufficient for the meaning and dynamic of worship to emerge. Participation really means that the very act of worship is a kind of interpretive activity engaged in by all the worshippers.

A third concern opened up by studying liturgy as a textual moment is the event character of liturgy. Liturgy is dynamic because the Jesus events being celebrated become my events in the interpretive redescription of reality. The dynamic of Christian worship unfolds as a past event taking on new shape and meaning when it is appropriated and lived as an event for me. This dynamic event restructures the individual's/community's human experience. Liturgy's re-enactment is really a redescription, such that the event always has new meaning.

Granting the relationship between language and human experience, another implication is that human experience is always cultural experience. It is the experience of a people at a given time and in a particular set of cultural circumstances. As such, liturgy must incorporate the familiar, the everyday, the traditional for a specific people. Its poetic language is universal only in that the ultimate reference is the paschal mystery, the traces of which are captured in the deep structure constitutive of every liturgical celebration. However, this structure can be—must be—expressed in very localized poetic language respective of the cultural variations and genius of the many peoples and nations who now call themselves "Christian."

These remarks certainly do not address all the difficulties encountered today with respect to celebrating meaningful liturgies. They do, however, begin to point both professional liturgist and ordinary worshiper alike in a common direction where certain questions emerge with timely importance.

The question of the relationship between liturgy and life parallels the relationship between language and experience. Far more than disseminating ethical injunctions on how to be a good Christian, liturgy's essential relationship to life lies in its power to redescribe reality.

Rather than fulfilling obligation, whether it be canonical or societal or culturally dictated, choosing to worship is an articulation of one's orientation in life, of the way one desires to live.

Another area of investigation just opening is that of liturgical genre. If the deep structure of liturgy is mimetic of human Christian activity, then explicit identification of the literary genre that produces liturgical texts would be helpful for critically reflecting on what it means to be Christian. It would also be an aid for better cultural expressions of worship in that each cultural community would have the functional tools to produce a meaningful liturgical expression for their particular community.

Another problematic area that follows from the presupposition about, and understanding of, the relationship of language and human experience is that liturgy is the affair and privilege of the whole Christian community, and not just one involving those ordained or elected to preside. Additionally, liturgy must reflect a range of human experience, not just that of a select few. Meaningful worship speaks out of the experience of every member of the Christian community. The differing authoritative structures of the various Christian communities have little as such to do with the intrinsic power of liturgy to redescribe reality. Yet frequently such diverse issues as those of authority and the liturgical redescription of reality tend to be confused.

The importance of the relationship between language and human experience for the worship life of the church can hardly be underscored enough. An appreciation of the character and import of that relationship will help assure that worship is expressive of what Christian living is all about: living the paschal mystery. Liturgy as language of faith is a privileged expression of the paschal mystery. Liturgy as related to the human subject is an expression of the lived faith of the church, a celebration of one's appropriation of the Jesus event. Ultimately, what is at stake in a consideration of the relationship between liturgical language and human experience is speaking, doing and living the paschal mystery of Christ.

LANGUAGE, LITURGICAL

Liturgical language will be considered at two levels, the socio-historical and the theoretical. The first concerns the actual diversity of languages used for public worship in the history of the church. The second concerns contemporary reflection on how language functions in the liturgical event.

Vatican II: Development in the Historical Tradition

The Vatican II Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, Sacrosanctum Concilium (S.C.), 4 December 1963, contains six articles that speak directly to the matter of liturgical language as socio-historical: nos. 36, 39, 54, 63, 101, and 113. The first of these, art. 36, provides basic norms, which are then applied to specific liturgical rites in subsequent articles. Art. 36 itself has four parts. The first states that the Latin language is to be preserved in the Latin rite. The second acknowledges that the use of their mother tongue in public worship may have advantages for the gathered worshippers and so authorizes in principle more extensive use of the mother tongue, especially for liturgical readings, instructions, and some prayers and chants. The third section specifies that "competent territorial ecclesiastical authority," as identified in S.C. 22.2, is to determine the actual extent of the use of the mother tongue, with the confirmation of its judgment by the Roman See. The fourth specifies that all translations of liturgical texts from Latin into the mother tongue must be approved for use by the competent, territorial, ecclesiastical authority.

Art. 54 applies art. 36 to the Mass, specifying that the readings and "the universal prayer," also called the prayer of the faithful, may be in the mother tongue, and also, without further identification of them, "those parts belonging to the people." Then it delineates procedures for extending these limits to the use of the mother tongue, while advising that the Catholic people should nevertheless continue to learn the Latin ordinary or fixed texts of the eucharistic liturgy.

Art. 63 applies art. 36 to the sacraments and sacramentals, setting no limits on the use of vernacular languages in these worship settings and in fact promoting the use of particular local languages for all non-eucharistic liturgical rites. Art. 101 takes up the question of the language of the divine office, first specifying that clerics are to retain the Latin language for their daily prayer and then authorizing bishops to give permission in particular cases for use of approved vernacular translations of this liturgy. Religious superiors of non-clerical institutes of both men and women may authorize the use of approved vernacular translations for either choral or private praying of the hours. Art. 113 specifies that these norms apply also for the translation of sacred Latin song into vernacular languages.

By the very procedure of enunciating a permissive attitude toward the use of vernacular translations in public worship, these five articles effectively confirm the normative and privileged status of Latin as the language of the Roman liturgy. However, art. 39 provides for competent, territorial ecclesiastical authority to make "legitimate variations and adaptations" in the Roman liturgical books, and specifies liturgical language as one likely area for such adaptation. Art. 40 provides for "even more radical adaptation of the liturgy" where this seems pastorally necessary, without specifying the possible nature of such radical adaptations. Each of these articles anticipates the composition of original liturgical texts in vernacular languages to supplement what is found in the editio typica of the Roman liturgical books and their authorized translations.

Several matters raised in S.C. invite further comment, among them the history of Latin as the preferred liturgical language for the West, the translation process, and operative assumptions about the nature and purpose of liturgical language. The first of these matters will be addressed through a brief survey of the history of liturgical language, the second through an account of the development of the post-conciliar English language liturgical books, the third through a consideration of theoretical issues that have arisen as liturgiologists have begun to explore the nature and purpose of liturgical language.

Liturgical Languages

S.C. states that Latin retains its privileged character as the official language of the Roman liturgy. The Latin language acquired that role in the public worship of the city of Rome as late as the 4th century. The original language of all Christian public worship, as of the Christian scriptures, was koine Greek, the spoken language of the people of the Hellenistic world. However, wherever the Christian gospel was preached beyond the administrative centers of the ancient Hellenistic empire, public worship in the mother tongues of local peoples was most often its normal accompaniment. Thus, while Alexandria on the Mediterranean coast of Egypt developed a Greek liturgy, the Egyptian people living along the upper Nile worshipped in Coptic. In the Mesopotamian city of Edessa, on the borders between two empires, the Hellenistic and the Persian, a Syriac-language liturgy developed. Ethiopian and Armenian Christians, too, who lived in regions removed from the centers of imperial culture, developed liturgies in their mother tongues. In the early Christian East, seven local languages in addition to Greek were used for public worship (Korolevsky, 1957).

As long as liturgical prayer remained primarily an oral form, that is, for the first three Christian centuries, an interplay between the public language of the empire and mother tongues was characteristic of the developing rites of public worship. This situation persisted in the East, with the resulting development there of "bilingual" traditions of public prayer. No concept of sacral language was operative in this formative period.

By the 3rd century, written liturgical texts, most commonly the eucharistic anaphoras of local bishops, began to circulate among churches of various regions; most of those which survived did so in Greek versions, a testimony to the prevalence of Greek as the earliest language of public worship because it was the dominant language of public life. However, shifting political circumstances, beginning in the 3rd century, gave new prominence to Latin over Greek as the public language of the western Roman empire. The conservative nature of liturgy in the city of Rome and the sacralizing tendencies of Roman culture delayed the full acceptance of a Latin, that is, vernacular, liturgy in the city of Rome until the next century.

Christian churches that were established in the other urban centers and western provinces of the Christian Roman empire were perhaps more readily disposed to Latin as the language of public worship than the city of Rome, since Latin had long been the official public language of government, commerce and high culture in these provinces. The value of having a uniform and unifying language for government, commerce, and public worship went virtually unchallenged in western Europe until the rise of modern European languages was accompanied by new shifts in political power. With the 16th century Protestant Reformation, new vernacular language liturgies developed in the West, notably in German, French, English, Swedish, and Dutch. In response to the challenge of the Protestant reformers who were calling for vernacular liturgy, the Council of Trent (Session XXII, 1562) judged that it was not advisable to celebrate the Mass in the vernacular. S.C. 36 reflects a re-evaluation of the pastoral situation.

Twenty-five years after S.C. the National Conference of Catholic Bishops of the United States, taking full advantage of the conciliar norms authorizing the use of mother tongues, has prepared liturgical books in English, Spanish, Choctaw, Navaho, Pima-Papago, and Lakota, the latter four the languages of native American peoples. This contemporary provision for balancing the use of English, the language of the dominant U.S. culture, with the mother tongues of peoples marginal to that dominant culture reflects in a new form the ancient ecclesial valuing of local liturgies—e.g., the Coptic and Syriac or Chaldean—as vehicles of resistance to the encroachment of the imperial Greek-speaking culture. Notitiae, the publication of the Roman Congregation for Worship and the Sacraments, provides a record of the post-conciliar decisions of each national episcopal conference on the use of local languages for public worship.

The English Translation Process

S.C. 36.4 directs that the translation of the Latin liturgical books into vernacular languages would be the responsibility of "various kinds of competent territorial bodies of bishops lawfully established" (S.C. 22.2). In 1963, in order to facilitate the work of translation, eleven episcopal conferences with responsibility for producing English language translations of Latin liturgical texts formed the International Committee (subsequently, Commission) on English in the Liturgy (I.C.E.L.) in order to collaborate in the project. Member conferences include Australia, Canada, England and Wales, India, Ireland, New Zealand, Pakistan, the Philippines, Scotland, South Africa, and the United States; thirteen other conferences using English as a public language have associated themselves with I.C.E.L.. An episcopal board made up of eleven bishops, each named by and accountable to his own conference, directs the work of I.C.E.L.; a secretariat in Washington, D.C. administers the policy and programs of the episcopal board. Action to receive the I.C.E.L. translations is the responsibility of the member episcopal conferences who, in turn, request Roman confirmation of their action. The formation of I.C.E.L. in 1963 anticipated the 16 October 1964 letter of Cardinal Lercaro calling for such collaboration among episcopal conferences which shared a common language.

In 1969, when national episcopal conferences were six years into the work of preparing vernacular translations of Latin liturgical texts, the Consilium, the international body charged with the implementation of S.C. issued its instruction, Comme le prévoit, on the translation of liturgical texts. The instruction reflected some of the issues already faced, and it also anticipated emerging questions about translation. Among the principles it enunciated to guide translators were the following: 1) liturgical texts are intended as oral communication and require an oral rhetorical style; 2) every translation involves the interpretation of meaning, not a simple rendering of equivalent words, so that adequate translation may require a change of metaphor to retain meaning; 3) translators must use scientific methods of textual studies to understand the full meaning available in Latin of the texts to be translated; 4) translators must take into account the intended speakers and hearers in choosing a suitable manner of expression. The 1969 instruction also expressed the judgment that the earliest efforts of translators would need to be reviewed after a period of use. Development of a vernacular liturgical vocabulary, appropriate idiom, and effective rhetorical style for public proclamation of Christian faith were expected to require the efforts of more than a single generation of believers. A parallel with the gradual development of liturgical Latin in the ancient church can be drawn here.

Liturgical Language: Emerging Theoretical Considerations

The 1969 mandate that translators employ scientific methods of textual study has pressed liturgical scholars to develop competence in contemporary theories of language. The complexity of developing an adequate theory of liturgical language is grounded in the complexity of the phenomenon itself. The liturgical books to be translated are repositories for essentially oral prayers recorded not to be read but to be spoken in the context of public ritual events. The texts are written, but for the purpose of oral delivery. A multiplicity of distinct oral genres is employed in each liturgical event.

Further, because the meaning to be communicated orally is publicly shared religious meaning, the verbal symbols of the Christian tradition control the contents of both compositions and translations. Many of these symbols are biblical in their origins, and contemporary Bible translations provide translators with a vernacular resource for Christian religious language. But equally as many of the linguistic symbols of the Roman liturgy are expressions of ecclesiastical Latin, the Christian idiom that developed as Christian orators and writers appropriated and reinterpreted the everyday language of their societies for public proclamation and celebration of the mystery of salvation in Christ. Thus, many of the originating metaphors for the Latin liturgical language are tied to the cultural experiences of other epochs and can be broken open to contemporary insight only with great skill on the part of translators. In addition, the context for adequate interpretation of the meaning of liturgical texts is public ritual action, in which multiple non-verbal codes of meaning are interacting simultaneously; so a theory adequate to account for the relationship of verbal to non-verbal meaning in liturgical events needs to be worked out.

Scholars concerned to develop a theory adequate to the task of understanding the complex phenomenon of liturgical language have been dependent upon the relative adequacy of contemporary theories of ordinary language, theories of the nature of religious language, and also upon theories of the distinctive nature of ritual utterance. At an even more fundamental level, scholars have had to determine whether "liturgical language" was properly understood to refer comprehensively or only analogously to both verbal and non-verbal elements in a liturgical rite. All such explorations into language theories have been directed toward developing appropriate theories about the nature, purpose, and correct interpretation of liturgical language. Some small measure of consensus is emerging; many areas need further investigation.

Areas of Consensus

Four areas of agreement can be identified at the level of theory. First, liturgy is an act of communication. Second, liturgy is ritual communication. Third, liturgy is a text, i.e., a humanly crafted work. Fourth, liturgy is a text needing interpretation. Each of these can be explored here only briefly.

1. Liturgy is an act of communication. This viewpoint is already reflected in S.C.; but the conciliar document itself and many of its subsequent interpreters have often assumed a univocal, pre-critical, common sense notion of the nature of this communication. This unexamined viewpoint has fostered the idea that the fundamental issue in the development of liturgical language is the achievement of unambiguous clarity in expressing the content of Christian faith (S.C. 21; 33;34). Such an approach takes as its premise the notion that liturgy's primary purpose is didactic. The approach assumes that effective liturgical language will impart to worshippers knowledge of the Christian message with little or no basis for misperception.

At a critical level, however, liturgical scholars agree that what liturgical language aims to disclose is something more profound than information about doctrines. Its purpose is to reveal the essentially unfathomable mystery of salvation at work in the world of human history. Liturgical speech and non-verbal ritual elements cumulate and coalesce in liturgical action to serve divine mystery. Every adequate understanding of liturgical language will embrace this viewpoint.

Nevertheless, it should be noted that this theoretical affirmation is not a concealed revival of a claim for the necessity of an esoteric sacral language in public worship. Contemporary language theory supports the use of vernacular languages in liturgy because of its judgment that it is within the power of ordinary human language used in particular ways to disclose ultimate mystery. The key to understanding this aspect of language is found in contemporary theories of metaphor.

Metaphoric language typically engages two domains of experience to trigger cognitive and emotional interaction, thereby generating insight into reality. Thus in baptism, Christians are "washed by the Blood of the Lamb" through entry into a bath of flowing water. They are "reborn in the womb of mother church"; they are "buried with Christ for three days and rise glorified with him." They "pass through the waters of death and arrive at the promised land." They "pass from this present age to become a new creation."

The believing church has given historical shape to its baptismal liturgy and even its initiatory space by drawing upon not one but a whole collection of metaphors. Multiple referents to human and religious experience have been available simultaneously within the gathered assembly as it has interacted with rivers, pools, and fonts of water, the cross, oils, even milk and honey and an abundance of allusive language. The verbal components of the baptismal liturgy from early on have alluded to the shared memory of the foundational Exodus-Sinai event of biblical religion, itself reinterpreted to point to the new covenant in Christ. Yet baptismal words and ritual actions have just as often pointed to more immediate domains of the experience of believers: birth, death, bathing, safe passage from danger, identity within a people. Through this profusion of language and ritual action, the church has sought to celebrate its faith in the mystery of salvation in Christ. The mystery is unfathomable and unutterable; yet it has also been revealed and believed.

Because first generation Christian homilists tagged the mystery "paschal," this biblical allusion has served as an anchor for subsequent developments in the historical, liturgical tradition. Yet the mystery of salvation is greater than what the believing community has ever been able to know or say. Accordingly, the liturgical composition, by intentionally mixing and heaping up metaphors, invites worshippers to venture into the realm of mystery through the stuff of ordinary experience, shared memory, and the power of language. The terse formula of scholastic theology was that sacramental liturgy graced its participants by signifying the mystery: significando causant.

The renewal of liturgical language is jeopardized by recurrent impulses for greater clarity than is possible in expressing mystery, impulses to simplify liturgy by reducing a rite to one controlling metaphor and then further reducing that metaphor by providing a univocal statement of what it all means. Such tendencies run counter to the fundamental dynamic of liturgical language. If liturgy is an act of communication, it is the communication of poetry rather than that of the information booth. Liturgy is ritual metaphor disclosing salvation.

2. Liturgy is ritual communication, which involves "an inseparable combination of articulate speech and purposeful action" (Wheelock, 50). Philosophers of language and ritual theorists concur that it is the combination of words and acts that characterizes ritual language and distinguishes it from other, wholly verbal forms of religious language such as the language of theology. A comprehensive theory of liturgical language will have to take account of spoken language used in an action context where gesture, posture, movement or location in space, and transactions and interactions with ritual objects are presumed to have cognitive content. In liturgical events, words interact with multiple parallel symbol systems, and the orchestrated whole effects the disclosure.

Each of the operative symbol systems within a ritual event—verbal and non-verbal—also has its own syntax and grammar, its set of operations and rules for effective communication of meaning, the violation of which yields incoherence or meaninglessness. These are subject to investigation according to the postulates of structuralist theory. Momentary reflection on the arrangement and use of ritual space within a liturgical event illustrates the analogous structure of non-verbal and verbal language. Within the gathered assembly, spaces are assigned according to liturgical roles, and movement in and out of assigned spaces is controlled according to a transcendent sense of cosmic divine order given symbolic expression in the spatial code. The rules for moving within liturgical space during liturgical action constitute a discreet “language,” with distinct cognitive content known to the participants, all of whom routinely take their place without explicit direction. Yet no one presumes that this particular language considered in isolation expresses the full meaning being set out in the liturgical event. Spatial language participates in the religious disclosure of the mystery of salvation. It is the liturgy itself as an instance of complex ritual communication, and not only one of its several languages, for which sound theoretical foundations must be established.

3. In any attempt to establish theoretical foundations, liturgy is best understood as a “text,” in the broad sense in which “text” is understood among contemporary language theorists. What characterizes text in this realm of discourse is not primarily that it is written, but that it involves human composition, the structuring of a whole which bears its meaning in its wholeness.

The act of composition involves human composers in decisions about genres. Selecting from among literary and ritual forms available in a cultural tradition is a generative act in the formation of the full liturgical text. Further, the actual production of the work in the form and genres chosen inevitably will carry with it the distinctive stamp or style of the composers. Thus, there are Eastern and Western liturgies, and Roman terseness and Syriac exuberance are not likely to be confused. There are compositions credited to Pope St. Leo, to St. John Chrysostom, and to St. Ambrose; and these are distinguishable. Original liturgical prayers being composed in local languages within contemporary African cultures will be notably different from Native American liturgical prayers, even when liturgical authors in each community emulate classical Christian liturgical forms.

It should be noted that in oral cultures, where the production of meaning through crafted language is accomplished without recourse to writing, the crafted language of oral liturgical traditions will have the characteristics typical of any “work” or language. Historical evidence documents the oral nature of early Christian liturgical texts. While it is true that most recent liturgical composition, like that involved in the production of the reformed Roman liturgical books of Vatican II, has been a literary process, committing texts to written form was a secondary act in the earliest composition of Christian liturgy.

The genre “liturgical text” is a distinct form of religious composition. When a liturgical composition is given its full written form and presented in a liturgical book, the text oscillates between two constitutive elements: utterances (themselves in many distinctive liturgical sub-genres, e.g., prayers, acclamations) to be enunciated by the ritual participants and directions for the ritual actions to be performed. A full liturgical text is not straightforward, as would be characteristic of narrative or expository discourse. The presentation of words to be uttered is designedly interrupted by contextual considerations. Yet just how the word-related ritual actions are to be performed is more often suggested than explained in detail in a liturgical text.

Thus, a tradition of ritual performance regularly supplements the brief directions for action which are recorded as part of the written text of the liturgical book. Efforts have been made periodically to consign the tradition of performance to writing in the form of a "ceremonial." Nevertheless, full access to the living tradition of performance is actually available only within the liturgical events as they are regularly celebrated. Some things go without saying.

It is this complex liturgical text which demands a foundational theory of language adequate to give liturgical language intelligibility as an act of religious meaning.

4. The meaning of a liturgical text is complex, however simple its intention. Appropriate and adequate methods of interpretation are required to set out its cognitive content. From the perspective of contemporary language theory, the interpretation of a liturgical text can be grasped as a semiotic issue with three possible and related foci.

The interpreter can focus on the relationships between and among the many ritual symbols, verbal and non-verbal, that constitute the whole. This is a study in the syntax of the rite. A second focus for the interpreter is the meanings of the symbols. Here the interpreter will examine the relationship between the ritual symbols and the realities to which they refer, establishing criteria for making judgments about the adequacy and the truth of the ritual symbols. This is a study in the semantics of the liturgical rite. Finally, the interpreter can focus on the relationships between and among the symbols, the users of the symbols, and the environment of the users. This area concerns the pragmatics of the liturgical rite.

Recent work in liturgical syntactics has been approached through methods of structural analysis associated with French anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss and subsequently modified by later structuralists and post-structuralists like J. van Velsen and Victor W. Turner. Such studies as these contribute to an understanding of the normative "grammar of ritual behavior"; and they also serve to identify ritual deviance and the locus of emergent ritual change within a liturgical community.

For example, the normative grammar of Christian liturgy has had traditional gender inflection, expressed in its systems of male and female liturgical roles, masculine and feminine images and symbols, and sex-linked access to ritual space. The liturgical reforms of Vatican II disrupted that normative grammar when it promulgated new norms governed by the principle that "full and active participation by all the people is the aim to be considered before all else" (S.C., 14). Women were subsequently authorized to take on the roles of lector and communion minister. This authorized breakdown of the once-normative gender inflection of Christian ritual grammar has found further spontaneous expression in forms of ritual deviance. These range from the emergence of girl altar servers to the use of feminine images and metaphors to refer to God. Liturgical syntactics helps to uncover the structural intelligibility of such deviance.

Liturgical semantics concerns itself with the meaning available in the liturgical text considered as a whole and in its several parts. The problem is essentially hermeneutical: how to interpret a text? In recent years liturgiologists have begun to explore both performative language or speech-action theory and narrative analysis for methodological models adequate to the task of interpreting the liturgical text. These investigations are still in their early stages. Few fully elaborated models have been devised; fewer have been adequately tested.

Speech-act theory has received a widely favorable reception in the area of liturgical semantics because of its understanding of all speaking as intentional action carrying force and affecting the relationships among the parties to the speech-event. The first formulation of speech-act theory is found in the work of Anglo-American philosopher J.L. Austin. Further theoretical developments by J. Searle and R. Jakobson are being taken into account in most contemporary explorations of speech-act theory as a hermeneutical resource for the interpretation of liturgical texts.

At an early stage of the investigation of the relevance of speech-act theory for understanding liturgical action, efforts to superimpose this theory on classical scholastic sacramental theology proved too narrow. For example, the mid-1970s debate carried on by B. Brinkman and A. Martinich in The Heythrop Journal presumed two parties in the liturgical speech act. One was the "recipient" of the sacrament, but the theologians grappled with the identity of the second. Was it the priest or Christ whose speaking had direct efficacy? The investigation lacked an ecclesiological theology. It also assumed a scholastic theory of instrumental causality for sacramental efficacy. This has given way in more recent discussion to a fuller understanding of symbolic metaphorical disclosure of the graced situation.

Jean Ladriere took a broader approach to the matter, identifying a three-pronged performativity in liturgical language: existential induction, institution, and presentation. The first mode operates to bring about the self-engagement of all parties with the ritual text and its intentions. The second mode constitutes the parties as an existential communion in which they intend together the reality to which their liturgical speaking refers. The third mode of performativity for liturgical speech is its making present to the participants the reality, i.e., the "mystery of salvation," which has gathered them. Subsequently, Wade Wheelock has offered a comparable analysis of the performative efficacy of a liturgical text, pointing to its power to create a religious situation capable of involving its participants. It is the extravagant metaphorical composition of the liturgical text which generates this creative power. Performative language or speech-act theory thus provides a contemporary philosophical foundation for the scholastic significando causant.

The theory that the liturgical text "creates the religious situation" finds further support in the textual hermeneutics of Paul Ricoeur. Ricoeur talks about the "world" of a text, i.e., the way of understanding reality that the text makes available to all those who let themselves be engaged by its language, however distant later readers may be from the original world of its composition. Thus, a tradition of relatively stable liturgical texts operates as a living tradition precisely because each generation engages itself regularly with the world of meaning available in its quasi-fixed liturgical language.

The believing church is always being drawn to explain the cognitive content of the experience of salvation in Christ it apprehends and celebrates. Yet the work of textual analysis of its liturgical language to establish the meaning of faith is also a work of constituting meaning. The relationships among verbal liturgical constants like "covenant," "priest," "sacrifice," "body" and "blood," "Christ crucified and glorified," "the holy Spirit" and the non-verbal constants like water, bread and wine, altar-table, cross, hands extended, presider and people have been arranged and rearranged in liturgical compositions and configured and reconfigured in homilies and catechesis to disclose to the Christian people of different cultures and epochs successively different religious worlds in which to live their life in Christ and anticipate their salvation. Speech-action theory has proved helpful in understanding how liturgical texts mean as well as what they mean.

Narrative analysis provides another potentially fruitful foundational theory for the interpretation of the liturgical text. Employing the semiotic analysis of A.-J. Greimas, some liturgiologists have focused upon the narrative structure of the liturgical text as a linguistic fact and as the key to the interpretation of its deep meaning. Greimas' own theory has evolved during this era and his principal interpreters have continued to refine its implications. As is the case with performative language or speech-action theory, the hermeneutical usefulness of the method for the interpretation of liturgical texts is in the early stages of exploration.

Whatever hermeneutic methods are developed for the work of interpretation, liturgical semantics has both an analytical and a critical moment. Uncovering the world of meaning in the liturgical text is the first moment; judging the adequacy and appropriateness of the text to accomplish its work of disclosure of the mystery of Christ is a second moment. This second moment requires that the interpreter differentiate both the cultural and the religious horizons of the liturgical text and the liturgical participants and correlate them dialectically. In authorizing the reform of the sacred liturgy to insure that "the texts and rites express more clearly the holy things which they signify" (S.C., 21), and in acknowledging that the liturgy had suffered the intrusion of elements out of harmony with or no longer suited to its religious meaning, the Vatican II liturgy constitution underscored the challenge of developing adequate foundational theory for the work of liturgical semantics.

Liturgical pragmatics has only recently been identified as a distinct area for interpretation, and it remains the least developed theoretically and methodologically. As a third focus in the work of textual interpretation, pragmatics studies "the behavioral effect of symbol." It considers not what meaning is available in the world of the text but rather what behaviors express a reader's appropriation of that meaning, i.e., what ways of being and acting show that readers have come to dwell in the world of the text. The issue is not simply one of ease and familiarity with ritual language, roles and rules in the cultic setting. What is of greater importance is whether persons shown "the mystery of salvation" through liturgical performance move with insight from the ritual celebration of the mystery to mysteriously redemptive historical existence.

New-found awareness of the issue of the social dimension of the liturgy and its ethical demands is a by-product of the circumstance of cultural pluralism and cultural secularity. If they ever did, people no longer live and act as though "by second nature" in a world of faith. Critics of the liturgical reform have charged that liturgy remains disconnected with ordinary human existence despite the intuition, the hope, and even the claim that liturgical reform would foster social regeneration. At the present neither pastoral liturgists nor their critics have adequate theoretical foundations to probe the potential or actual ecclesial, social, political and personal behavioral consequences of engagement with the world constituted through liturgical language. Cultural anthropologists, systems theorists, and critical theorists, among them feminist theorists, may provide as-yetinadequately-explored resources for establishing the relation between the meaning of liturgical language and social existence.

LAW, LITURGICAL

Canon Law, in the broad sense, includes not only the laws that appear in the form of canons in the Code of Canon Law, but all manner of church law, including liturgical law. Liturgical law is the Canon Law that orders the liturgy of the Roman Catholic Church. The term "liturgy" is understood as worship "carried out in the name of the church by persons lawfully deputed and through acts approved by the authority of the church" (can. 834, sec. 2). Such deputed persons are all the baptized faithful (L.G., 11; S.C., 14; can. 836) as well as those who exercise the several liturgical ministries, both lay and ordained. The "acts approved by the authority of the church" which make up the liturgy include all the rites published in the official liturgical books approved by competent ecclesiastical authority. Not included in the canonical notion of liturgy are other prayers and devotions even though they may be approved by the local ordinary or other competent ecclesiastical authority (can. 839, sec. 2).

The discussion that follows is limited to the liturgy of the Latin rite; the Eastern ritual churches have their own canonical discipline and liturgical traditions, and they are not affected by the laws in the Latin rite code and liturgical books (can. 1). The topics treated are: the purpose of liturgical law, its sources, regulation of the liturgy, liturgical customs, dispensation of law, and revocation of law. This essay considers some foundational canonical principles and institutes and their application to liturgical law; the reader who desires greater treatment of current pastoral issues, or further discussion on the interpretation of liturgical law, should consult the works in the bibliography.

Purpose

Canon Law is intended to serve a pastoral purpose by providing harmony and unity in the external life of the Christian community as a reflection of its Spirit-guided inner unity. Liturgical law also has this pastoral function. Liturgical law aims to ensure the unity and authenticity of Catholic worship within and among the local churches that make up the universal church. Unity of worship does not mean total uniformity or rubricism, the kind of slavish adherence to ceremonial minutiae that characterized fidelity to liturgical law before Vatican II. It pertains rather to the ordering and maintenance of the essential structures, spirit, and character of the sacraments and other liturgical rites. The deepest purpose of liturgical law is that of the liturgy itself: to build up the body of Christ through Spirit-filled celebrations of the saving mysteries. In order to fulfill this purpose, liturgical law is best observed not by mere rubrical exactitude but by ministers and assemblies who enfold the law through meaningful liturgical celebrations that effectively signify and build up the local church in communion with the church universal. This requires that those responsible for preparing for and ministering at the liturgy receive a sound formation which includes knowledge of liturgical norms and principles of canonical interpretation.

Sources

Universal liturgical law is found chiefly in the official liturgical books published in Latin by the Apostolic See and in the various approved vernacular translations published under the authority of the episcopal conferences. The principal liturgical books include: the Roman Missal (Lectionary and Sacramentary); the Roman Ritual (the rites, published separately, at which a priest, or in some cases a deacon or lay minister, presides); the Roman Pontifical (the rites at which a bishop presides); the Liturgy of the Hours; and the Ceremonial of Bishops. All of these are service books for use at worship except for the Ceremonial which is a compilation of norms intended as a guide for bishops, masters of ceremonies, and others entrusted with the conduct of episcopal ceremonies.

A major part of the liturgical law contained in the liturgical books is that found at the beginning of the books or rites. The Sacramentary and Liturgy of the Hours begin with a general instruction (institutio generalis). Most of the service books or rites begin with introductions (praenotanda), although a few have general introductions (praenotanda gen- eralia) and subsequent praenotanda which introduce the several parts of the rites. Often these precise distinctions are not made by authors who refer to all of them generically as praenotanda. This is not unfitting, since the nature and purpose of these laws are much the same. They provide a theological and pastoral orientation to the rites and establish much of the major canonical discipline for them. They consist of doctrinal, catechetical, historical and other information followed by dispositive norms, many of which are hortatory and broadly stated.

Another category of liturgical law found in the liturgical books are the rubrics. Rubrics take their name from the red color in which they are printed which sets them apart on the page from the actual texts used in worship that are printed in black. Most rubrics are precise directions that guide the ministers in the performance of the rite, or they may be other kinds of law related to that part of the rite where they are located in the liturgical book. All the norms in the liturgical books, whether praenotanda or rubrics, have the force of law and are subject to the same rules for interpretation, dispensation, and revocation as are the canons of the code.

Another major source of laws for the liturgy is the Code of Canon Law which was promulgated by Pope John Paul II on January 25, 1983, and which became effective on November 27 of that year. The code "for the most part does not define the rites which are to be observed in celebrating liturgical actions" (can. 2). This principle implies, on the one hand, that most liturgical laws are found outside the code in the liturgical books and elsewhere and, on the other hand, that some liturgical laws are to be found in the code. Indeed, extensive legislation governing the liturgy and the discipline of the sacraments is contained in Book IV of the code, although it should be noted that many canons in Book IV are only remotely related to liturgy as it is defined above in the introduction.

Book IV of the Code of Canon Law, entitled "The Sanctifying Office (Munus) of the Church," consists of 420 canons and is divided into three parts. Part I, "The Sacraments" (cans. 840-1165), begins with nine introductory canons on general aspects of sacramental theology and discipline followed by the remaining canons organized into seven "titles" for each of the sacraments. Each title typically is divided into chapters on: the celebration of the sacrament, the minister, those receiving or participating in the sacrament, and other matters that may be unique to that sacrament, for example, godparents, record and proof of celebration, the reservation and veneration of the eucharist, Mass offerings, indulgences. Part II of Book IV, "Other Acts of Divine Worship" (can. 1166-1204), consists of five titles treating: sacramentals (blessings, dedications, consecrations, exorcisms); the liturgy of the hours; ecclesiastical funeral rites; the veneration of the saints, sacred images, relics; and vows and oaths. Part III, "Sacred Times and Places" (cans. 1205-1253), establishes regulations for churches, oratories, private chapels, shrines, altars, cemeteries, feast days, and days of penance. There are, additionally, six canons (834-839) introducing Book IV which treat basic liturgical-theological principles and general rules for the regulation of the liturgy. Canon 767 in Book III of the code, on the homily, also can be classified as a liturgical law.

Liturgical laws not found in the code or liturgical books can be enacted by the legislator in the form of general decrees. General decrees are true laws that have the same force as the laws of the code and the liturgical books (can. 29). Authentic interpretations of laws are also a source of law. An authentic interpretation is one given by the legislator or the person or group who has been delegated by the legislator to give authentic interpretations (can. 16, sec. 1). An authentic interpretation of a law has the force of law and can even change the law by extending or restricting its meaning (can. 16, sec. 2). The Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legal Texts has the competence to give authentic interpretations of papal laws, including liturgical laws.

Regulation of the Liturgy

The regulation of the liturgy refers here to its moderation, promotion, and custody. This regulation is chiefly exercised by church authorities who possess legislative or executive power of governance, whether for the universal church, the particular church, or groupings of particular churches. The regulation of the liturgy occurs through various means, such as the promulgation of laws, the issuance of executory documents, the granting of dispensations. In addition to such functions of the power of governance, the liturgy is also regulated by the teaching office (munus) of the church through various means, such as magisterial documents, preaching, catechesis. Although the teaching munus of the church is not a concern here, it must be noted that the moderation, promotion, and custody of the liturgy is significantly and effectively accomplished by the church's teachers and preachers at all levels. Finally, the role of custom is important in regulating the liturgy of local communities.

The Universal Church. The pope and the college of bishops enjoy supreme power in the church, both for the Latin church and the Eastern churches (cans. 331, 336). The pope acting alone, or the bishops of the world acting collegially in union with the pope, each constitute the highest legislative, executive, and judicial authority in the universal church. The major liturgical reforms following Vatican II were promulgated by the authority of the pope. The college of bishops historically has exercised its supreme power only in an ecumenical council, although theoretically it could do so even by some other kind of collegial act (can. 337, sec. 2). The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of the Second Vatican Council established the major principles and directions for the liturgical reforms accomplished primarily during the papacy of Pope Paul VI (1963-1978). The liturgy constitution remains the fundamental source for the proper interpretation and implementation of post-conciliar liturgical law.

Only the supreme ecclesiastical magisterium can authentically determine what constitutes divine law (cf. cans. 750; 1075, sec. 1.). Divine laws are those recognized by the church as having been established by God. The divine positive law has its source in revelation, either in scripture or tradition; the divine natural law is based on the order of creation and can be known by human reason. Purely ecclesiastical laws are human laws established by legislation or by custom. Unlike divine laws, merely ecclesiastical laws can be changed, abolished, or dispensed. Most liturgical laws are purely ecclesiastical laws, but they serve to regulate what are at root more fundamental divine laws, such as: the divine command to celebrate the eucharist in memory of Christ; to preach the gospel; to baptize with water in the names of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit; to keep holy the Lord's day; to do penance.

Also restricted to the supreme authority is the determination of what constitutes the essential requirements necessary for the validity of the sacraments (can. 841). The concepts of validity and liceity are basic to understanding the laws governing the sacraments. If a legal requirement for the validity of a sacrament is not met, the sacrament is juridically inefficacious, null and void. The valid celebration of the seven sacraments variously depends upon the essential matter and form, the capability and intention of the recipient, and the person and intention of the minister. In baptism, for example, the matter is water; the form is the trinitarian formula; the minister who baptizes is anyone with the intention of doing what the church does when it baptizes; the recipient must be someone not yet baptized who, if possessing the use of reason, freely intends to be baptized. If any of these essential requirements is absent or deficient the rite and its effects are juridically null and void.

All laws not affecting validity are for liceity only. Liceity means licitness, or lawfulness. The transgression of a law affecting only liceity would not invalidate the sacrament or other act, and its juridical consequences would be recognized. For example, can. 861, sec. 1, which states that the ordinary minister of baptism is a bishop, presbyter or deacon, is a law affecting only liceity. For validity, anyone can baptize who intends to do what the church does when it baptizes. Unless lay persons are authorized to be ministers of baptism (cf. can. 230, sec. 3), their conferral of baptism outside a case of necessity would be an illicit act, but the baptism would nonetheless be valid.

The moderation of the liturgy in the universal church is the competence of the Apostolic See, or Holy See, a term which includes the pope, the secretary of state, and the Roman curia (can. 838, sec. 1; 361). The Apostolic See publishes the original edition (editio typica) of each of the Roman liturgical books in Latin. It also exercises in various ways a role of vigilance over the liturgy to ensure that liturgical laws and directives are faithfully observed everywhere (can. 838, sec. 2).

The congregation of the Roman curia entrusted with the moderation, promotion, and custody of the liturgy of the Latin rite is the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments. The Congregation for Oriental Churches has competence over the Eastern rites. Liturgical matters of a doctrinal nature are the competence of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. In the decades after Vatican II, several restructurings of the Roman curia affected the congregation or congregations entrusted with the regulation of the liturgy and the discipline of the sacraments. In 1969 the Congregation of Sacred Rites was divided into two congregations, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Congregation for Causes of Saints. At this time there also existed a separate Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments. In 1975 the latter congregation was joined to the Congregation for Divine Worship to become the Congregation for the Sacraments and Divine Worship. In 1984 they were divided into separate congregations, only to be reunited once again in 1989 to form the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments.

The congregations of the Roman curia constitute a principal executive arm of the papacy; they do not have legislative power in their own right. They can issue laws only if they are expressly delegated this power by the pope (can. 135, § 2). Most of the documents issued by curial congregations are therefore not legislative but are administrative, or executory, in nature. The Apostolic See has published various kinds of executory documents on liturgical matters, including declarations, circular letters, directories, letters, norms, notes, guidelines, and instructions (instructiones). Executory documents typically deal with the administration or execution of the law, treating matters which are less important or too detailed to be in the law itself. Similar to laws, executory documents have binding force, but they are always subservient to the law. Executory documents cannot revoke or change laws, and if any provisions in them are contrary to the law, those provisions would lack all force. Also, if the law on which they are based ceases to have force, then they too cease to bind.

The Particular Churches. The code uses the term "particular churches" to refer to dioceses and their canonical equivalents, namely, territorial prelatures, territorial abbeys, apostolic vicariates, apostolic prefectures, and apostolic administrations erected on a stable basis (can. 368). The canonical authority of those who head these other particular churches is generally equivalent in the law to that of the diocesan bishop (can. 381, § 2).

Bishops are "high priests, principal dispensers of the mysteries of God and moderators, promoters, and custodians of the whole liturgical life of the church entrusted to them" (can. 835, § 1). The custody of the liturgy is an important canonical duty of the diocesan bishop. "He is to be watchful lest abuses creep into ecclesiastical discipline, especially concerning the ministry of the word, the celebration of the sacraments and sacramentals, the worship of God and devotion to the saints . . ." (can. 392, § 2). Other officials who have the duty of vigilance over the liturgy include vicar foranes (deans), pastors, and rectors of churches (cans. 555, § 1, 3°; 528, § 2; 562).

The bishop is moderator of the liturgy of the particular church in a way parallel to that of the Apostolic See for the universal church (can. 838, § 1). In many instances the universal law gives the bishop the competence to make liturgical adaptations or adopt optional practices at his discretion. As sole legislator within the diocese, the diocesan bishop can promulgate particular liturgical laws provided they are not contrary to universal law (cans. 838, § 4; 391; 135; § 2). Particular laws are those enacted for a particular territory such as a diocese, province, or region, or they may be personal laws passed for a particular group such as an institute of consecrated life or a society of apostolic life. While universal and personal laws bind everywhere, particular laws that are established for a certain territory bind those resident in the territory, while they are actually in the territory, in accord with the rules of cans. 12 and 13. Diocesan liturgical laws pertaining to the public exercise of divine worship are also binding on members of religious institutes of pontifical right (can. 678, § 1).

The bishop can also issue binding executory documents on liturgical matters. The other local ordinaries in the diocese (the vicar general and episcopal vicar who have executive power) can make administrative decisions and issue executory decrees affecting the liturgy within the limits of their competence (cans. 31, 479, 480). For example, any local ordinary is competent to grant the imprimatur required for the reprinting in whole or in part of liturgical books whether in the original Latin or in the approved vernacular translations (can. 826, § 2).

The diocesan bishop is obliged to have a liturgical commission to assist him in the promotion of the liturgy (S.C., 45). Commissions on sacred music and sacred art should also be part of the diocesan curia insofar as possible (S.C., 46). Such commissions are advisory to the bishop and cannot on their own authority establish diocesan policies or make binding decisions, although the local ordinary is free to delegate executive power to them for specific kinds of functions, for example, issuing administrative guidelines, giving permissions, granting approvals.

Groupings of Particular Churches. The regulation of the liturgy for groupings of particular churches, namely, ecclesiastical provinces and regions, may take place through several canonical structures. Plenary and provincial councils may promulgate liturgical laws (cans. 439-446), but such particular councils occur rarely. The bishops of a province may jointly issue particular legislation or common policies on liturgical matters, but each bishop must promulgate them for his own diocese since the provincial meeting of bishops is not a legislative body.

The most effective structure today for the regulation of the liturgy for groupings of particular churches is the episcopal conference. The conference of bishops of a nation or other territory is a permanent institution that meets on a regular basis (cans. 447-459). In accord with the provisions of can. 455, episcopal conferences can enact general decrees, whether legislative or executory. For a decree to be binding, it must be adopted by a two-thirds majority of the members who have deliberative vote, and it must pertain to a matter on which the conference has the authority to act. This authority to enact binding decrees must be expressly granted to the conference either by the universal law or by special mandate of the Apostolic See. The liturgical books, the Code of Canon Law, and other liturgical documents give legislative competence to the episcopal conference on many liturgical matters, especially those which allow for some options or variations in the universal discipline.

A major responsibility of the episcopal conference is to prepare translations of the liturgical books into the vernacular languages and make the appropriate adaptations of them within the limits defined in the liturgical books themselves (can. 838, § 3). All translations and adaptations of the liturgical books as well as all other decrees of the episcopal conference must be submitted to the Apostolic See for review (recognitio) before they can be promulgated and become binding. The requirement of the recognitio may be seen in part as a way of protecting the rights of individual diocesan bishops who are bound to such decisions. It also may be seen as an act of communion between bishops of a nation or other territory and the Apostolic See.

The episcopal conference may be assisted by a liturgical commission entrusted with regulating pastoral liturgical action throughout the nation or other territory and with promoting studies and necessary experiments leading to the adoption of liturgical adaptations (S.C., 44). Such commissions are only advisory and cannot issue binding norms on their own authority. However, documents issued by a national episcopal liturgical commission may contain binding content derived from other legislative or executive texts. The commission's documents may also possess a significant moral authority because they are authored under the auspices of a nation's bishops who can draw on the advice of noted experts in fields related to the liturgy.

Custom and Dispensation

The liturgy is regulated not only by laws but also by customs. Customs are the living practices of the Christian community. They are introduced not by the legislator but by the community itself. Historically, liturgical practices originated more often by custom than by law, but the role of custom was significantly reduced as the church became more centralized and a uniform Roman liturgy became normative. However, even in the centuries of greatest centralization after Trent, the role of custom in ordering the life of the church, including its liturgy, has continued to be acknowledged in the canonical system.

Any community capable of receiving a law is capable of introducing a custom, including a diocese, a parish, or a religious community, but not a family or a small group of individuals. Customs that are contrary to or apart from the law can obtain the force of law only when they have been legitimately observed for 30 continuous and complete years in accord with cans. 23-26. Such legal customs enjoy a status equal to the law and cannot be abolished except by the legislator himself. Customs that are centenary (at least 100 years old) or immemorial (older than the memory of the oldest living person in the community) are highly esteemed by Canon Law. Even if such well established customs are contrary to the Code of Canon Law they can continue to be practiced if the ordinary judges that they should be tolerated due to local circumstances (can. 5, § 2).

Factual custom, as opposed to legal custom, does not have the force of law. Factual customs are the many actual, non-obligatory practices of the community often expressed colloquially as "the way things are done here." Factual customs can play an important role in the way the liturgy is celebrated in local communities. As can. 27 states, "Custom is the best interpreter of the law." This traditional canonical maxim means that the living practices of the local Christian community best indicate how laws are to be observed. It shows the great respect in the canonical tradition for the role of custom.

On the other hand, some customs can be abuses contrary to sound principles of liturgy and theology that result from ignorance or negligence on the part of ministers or assembly. In such cases liturgical law can serve as a corrective for unsound practices that have become a routine part of the local liturgy. Law and custom ideally should exist in creative and dynamic tension. The role of liturgical law is to establish the general principles and the more important disciplinary norms; the role of custom is to en flesh these basic norms with practices and styles of worship that best express the unique character of the people of God in the local churches. When both law and custom operate in proper balance, the indigenization or inculturation of the liturgy can proceed harmoniously in fidelity to the Roman tradition.

Local control of the liturgy can also be exercised in a lesser, though not insignificant, way through the dispensation of liturgical law. A dispensation is the relaxation of a merely ecclesiastical law in a particular case. It is an administrative act and can be granted by someone who has executive power. The diocesan bishop may validly dispense from universal liturgical laws and from particular laws established for his territory or for his subjects by the supreme authority of the church (can. 87, § 1). The local ordinary (diocesan bishop, vicar general, episcopal vicar) can dispense from diocesan laws and particular laws passed by particular councils or the episcopal conference (can. 88). Presbyters and deacons cannot dispense from laws unless this power is expressly granted to them by law or delegation (can. 89). For example, the code permits the pastor and the superior of a clerical religious institute or clerical society of apostolic life of pontifical right to dispense from Sunday and holy day obligations, from the obligations of fast and abstinence on days of penance, and from private vows (cans. 1245, 1196).

Dispensations can be validly granted only if there is just and reasonable cause for the dispensation and provided the person dispensing takes into consideration the circumstances of the case and the gravity of the law from which the dispensation is given (can. 90). Only disciplinary laws are subject to dispensation, not divine laws, constitutive laws, penal laws, procedural laws, or constitutive laws. Many liturgical laws are constitutive, that is, they define matters that essentially constitute juridical institutes or acts (can. 86). Most of the liturgical laws that affect the validity of sacraments are constitutive. For example, the law requiring water and the trinitarian formula for valid baptism could not be dispensed to permit some other matter or form. On the other hand, the canonical form of marriage is required for validity but it is a disciplinary law that may be dispensed by the local ordinary in mixed marriages (can. 1127, § 2). (The law of the canonical form obliges Catholics, for validity, to celebrate their marriage in the presence of a priest or deacon who has the faculty to assist at the marriage.) Many other constitutive laws, moreover, affect only liceity. Such constitutive laws may pertain to the authentic structure of the sacramental rites even though they are not essential for validity, for example, the requirements for the imposition of hands in confirmation, or the anointing(s) in baptism, or the liturgy of the word in the eucharist.

Universal disciplinary laws can be dispensed by the diocesan bishop provided they are not reserved to the Apostolic See (can. 87, § 1). Most liturgical laws are disciplinary laws that do not regulate matters affecting the basic structure or nature of the rites. They may therefore be dispensed provided that the dispensing authority bears in mind the gravity of the law in question together with the importance of the reason for the dispensation. It is sometimes difficult, however, to determine whether a law is constitutive or disciplinary. For example, the law of the Roman Missal regarding the time for the Easter vigil states that it must not begin before nightfall and it must end before daybreak on Sunday. One could argue that this is a constitutive law, that the vigil is by nature a night service and cannot be celebrated in daylight under any circumstances. On the other hand, one could argue that this law is merely disciplinary because, prior to the Holy Week reform in 1955, the Easter vigil had been celebrated in the morning of Holy Saturday.

Revocation of Law

Abrogation is the total revocation of a law; derogation is a change in the law that revokes part of it. Abrogation or derogation occurs in three ways: when a later law expressly states that it is abrogating an earlier law or derogating from it; when a later law is directly contrary to an earlier law; or when a later law integrally reorders the subject matter of the former law (can. 20). When the 1983 Code of Canon Law went into effect, the following were expressly abrogated by can. 6: (1) the Code of Canon Law promulgated in 1917; (2) other universal or particular laws contrary to the prescriptions of the code, unless particular laws are otherwise expressly provided for; (3) any universal or particular penal laws whatsoever issued by the Apostolic See, unless they are contained in the code; (4) other universal disciplinary laws dealing with a matter which is integrally reordered by the code.

The revised code revoked a number of liturgical laws which were contrary to it or which had been integrally reordered by it. In 1983 the Congregation for Sacraments and Divine Worship issued a lengthy list of changes that had to be made in the liturgical books as a result of the revised code (Notitiae 20:540-555). There is no official list of changes in the many executory documents that were issued by the Apostolic See in the decades following Vatican II. Some of the content in these documents has been revoked or made obsolete by later revisions of the liturgical books and the Code of Canon Law. In some cases even experts find it difficult to determine whether a certain provision in these earlier documents has been revoked or whether it remains in force. According to can. 21, "in a case of doubt the revocation of a pre-existent law is not presumed, but later laws are to be related to earlier ones and, insofar as it is possible, harmonized with them." This principle presumes the stability and continuity of the law, but it can be difficult to apply in practice.

LAY LEADERSHIP IN LITURGY

Where two or three or more gather in prayer, there is need for a leader. Lay animation and leadership often arise out of exigency. There is no ordained leader available. It may also arise out of circumstance. One is asked to lead prayer with a specific group on a particular occasion. The layperson called forth to lead prayer does so because she/he is baptized and demonstrates the charism of leadership, the skill and training to do so, and, when necessary, the authorized delegation to serve in this ministry.

Lay leadership may occur in domestic settings. This might include the blessing of food or children or elders in a household. It may take place in an ecumenical or interreligious setting. For example, one may be involved in prayer to begin or conclude a Jewish-Christian study day. Or one may be asked to lead prayer and offer prayer in a setting accompanying public protest or witness. Often lay leaders serve in official, pastoral situations. Increasingly more often lay leaders preside at the liturgy of the hours because they are pastoral ministers in a parish. Sometimes they lead a liturgy of the word in a reconciliation service during a retreat or they distribute ashes at the beginning of Lent. More and more, lay leaders visit the sick and lead those who are ill (and sometimes the rest of the family) in the reception of communion. Lay animation finds laypersons called upon to conduct a Sunday celebration at a prison where laypersons are part of a ministry team. This service might also include base ecclesial communities, wakes, and the praying over catechumens who have gathered to break open the word on a weekday night.

To lead liturgical prayer requires not only charism, but also training in the skills of public prayer and presidency. This lay leadership is a task and a function. One who animates an assembly needs to develop in a variety of ways.

First, she or he needs knowledge about the structures of public prayer. This includes knowing something of the tradition as well as the ability to make text come off the printed page into an aural/oral experience. The animator will need to be able to collaborate with other ministers who serve the same assembly (e.g., readers, communion ministers, cantors, musicians, etc.). She/he will also want to develop familiarity with symbolic language and life as she/he learns to be at home with ritual activity, i.e., the use of the body as a prayerful conveyor of reverence, joy, lament, consolation and festivity.

Secondly, she/he learns by doing public prayer. This includes practical training, critique and the openness to develop skills into the art of lay leadership.

Thirdly, she/he not only functions in a liturgical role, but also begins to put on Christ whose leadership did not oppress or overpower others. Christ served others. One's style of leading prayer eventually develops into a spirituality based on the paschal mystery, i.e., by dying and rising unto Christ. This means that the lay leader puts on Jesus' way of life. Leadership entails simplicity, transparency and a willingness to be vulnerable.

Since the eucharist is at the heart of public prayer, especially on Sunday, the Lord's Day, lay leadership emerges due to the worldwide shortage of ordained presbyters. Lay leaders, in the absence of presbyters, are called upon to lead a Sunday celebration of the hours (morning or evening) and a liturgy of the word with or without reception of communion. This ministry calls for some kind of delegation and commissioning as well as a connection with the local parish and the pastoral guidance of the diocese and its bishop. The shape of the Sunday celebration in the absence of a priest includes an introductory rite, the liturgy of the word, a thanksgiving prayer (not to be confused with the eucharistic prayer), communion rites and a conclusion. While reception of the reserved eucharist is never a felicitous substitution for the celebration of the full eucharist, it is nonetheless one way of meeting pastoral need. This requires that the lay leader continue to develop skills in presidency, preaching and public prayer. In many instances this will be the principal means a particular assembly has for celebrating Sunday.

LAY MINISTRIES, LITURGICAL

The exercise of liturgical ministries by lay women and men (which here is understood to include religious sisters and brothers) after Vatican Council II is based in part on the principle of active participation: "Mother Church earnestly desires that all the faithful should be led to that full, conscious, and active participation in liturgical celebrations which is demanded by the very nature of the liturgy, and to which the Christian people . . . have a right and obligation by reason of their baptism" (S.C., 14). The Constitution on the Church spells out in more ecclesiological terms the belief that the church as a whole, and lay persons as well as the ordained, participate in the priestly, prophetic and kingly ministry of Jesus Christ.

Another principle is that of "division of labor": "In liturgical celebrations each person, minister, or layman who has an office to perform, should carry out all and only those parts which pertain to his office by the nature of the rite and the norms of the liturgy" (S.C., 28).

Finally, lay roles known at the time of the Council are considered to be real ministries: "Servers, readers, commentators, and members of the choir also exercise a genuine liturgical function. They ought, therefore, to discharge their offices with the sincere piety and decorum demanded by so exalted a ministry . . ." (S.C., 29).

At a general level, the first liturgical ministry to be considered is that of the assembly as a whole, including both lay and ordained members. The primary minister of every liturgy, after Jesus Christ in the Holy Spirit, is the entire local church assembled; at this level, every baptized person participates in the liturgical ministry of this church.

Second, it needs to be remembered that the apostle Paul describes the entire Christian life in liturgical terms, and hence the daily life of every lay Christian is a liturgical ministry in this sense.

In a more specific sense, a large number of individual lay liturgical ministries have been named or have been recognized in recent years with the gradual publication and implementation of a full range of revised liturgical rites.

Certain kinds of liturgical ministries exercised by laity are part of most liturgical celebrations. Often forgotten, but of great importance, are lay persons who participate in the planning of liturgies, as well as those who minister through art and environment. Ministers of hospitality play an important role in receiving parish members and guests at the door, seating guests and seeing that they have participation aids and hymnals, taking up the collection, being alert to any emergency, and greeting people again as they leave.

The importance of the ministry of reader reflects the centrality of the word of God at almost every liturgical celebration. Readers need skills in public speaking, some knowledge of scripture, and a spirituality that allows them to proclaim the word of God, and not just read from the lectionary.

Musicians also play a role at almost every celebration. They may include the cantor, the leader of song, the choir, and various instrumentalists. As almost all liturgies are supposed to be musical in nature, their role is almost essential.

Servers, acolytes and cross bearers constitute another group. The term "server" is sometimes used to refer to children and youth, while "acolyte" is used for adults carrying out virtually the same ministry. In other cases "acolyte" is used for adults who are also special ministers of communion.

The eucharist, especially the Sunday eucharist, requires several additional lay ministers. In some places lay persons meet ahead of time with the presbyter who will preach to plan the homily; they may also evaluate the preaching afterward. Again, in some places (largely in Africa and Latin America) lay persons, following the homily, "witness" to the impact of the word of God in their daily lives. In addition, lay persons may plan and lead special liturgies of the word for the small children of the community.

Local lay persons should prepare the general intercessions of the Sunday eucharist (and may contribute to litanies used in other liturgies as well). These prayers should be based both on the scripture readings of the day and the needs of the world as evidenced, for example, in the daily newspaper; they need to be forceful, concrete, and moving. Other lay persons may give the announcements, which are expressions of the weekday life of the Christian community and its members.

Other lay persons will participate in the procession of the gifts at the preparation of the altar and the gifts, and, as already mentioned, in taking up and carrying forward the collection for the poor and the needs of the church.

Special ministers of communion may participate in the Sunday eucharistic liturgy, especially if there is—as there should be—communion from the cup.

If no presbyter is available on Sunday, lay persons may be asked to preside and preach at a liturgy of the word, a liturgy of the word and communion, or other suitable service for the Lord's day. Circumstances may call for such lay presiders also to minister at the distribution of ashes on Ash Wednesday, at the Easter triduum, and on other occasions.

The rites of Christian initiation call for still other liturgical ministers in addition to those already named. In the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, sponsors play an important role in giving example to the catechumens, but they are succeeded by godparents during the period of purification and enlightenment and afterwards. Catechists and other teachers, those who lead catechumens into the prayer life and the ministerial life of the church, those who preside at the exorcisms and blessings and those who lead the litanies of intercession at many liturgies all have important roles to play.

In the rite of baptism for children parents and godparents respond to the questions of the presbyter as representatives of the church. In proclaiming the renunciations and professing the faith they speak not for the child, and not just for themselves as individuals, but also for the entire church. The parents, especially, continue their ministry in the raising of the children as maturing Christians. The rite names yet another ministry in the person (presumed to be a woman) who cares for the child during the liturgy of the word. This allows the parents to listen clearly to the word without distraction. The child is returned to the mother by the "liturgical babysitter" following the homily.

Lay persons may baptize persons in danger of death, and the liturgical books provide rites for such occasions that are fuller than simply the pouring of water with the recitation of the baptismal formula.

At weddings, the bride and groom are considered to be the official ministers of matrimony, and as well they exercise a significant ministry to the congregation and guests in the way of hospitality and example. The witnesses also have a ministerial role, as may the parents of the couple.

In the liturgical rites for the sick and the dying there are significant liturgical roles for lay women and men. Visiting and praying with sick persons is named as a ministry of the church, whether carried out by laity or ordained persons. Lay persons may take communion from the church to the sick and preside at a brief liturgy of communion; they may pass on the essence of the liturgical homily. Lay persons may, if required, celebrate the sacrament of the dying—viaticum—and lead or say the commendation of the dying and prayers for the dead.

At communal celebrations of the sacrament of penance the lay persons present are called upon to pray for penitents who will be reconciled, as well as for sinners. On other occasions they may preside and preach at penitential celebrations that do not include the sacrament.

Increasingly, lay persons are taking the leadership of wakes or funeral vigil celebrations. They may also preside and preach at funeral services both in the church and at the cemetery when no presbyter is present.

The liturgy of the hours also may be presided over by lay persons, and they may preach if this is appropriate.

A number of blessings may also be celebrated by lay persons.

Finally, lay persons may plan and exercise all the required ministries, including presiding and preaching, at liturgies for small groups and other "unofficial" liturgies that seem called for.

Lay liturgical ministry is based on baptism and the appropriate gifts, but also requires education, training in the necessary skills, an appropriate spirituality, proper attitudes, diligence, acceptance of responsibility, and accountability. At all times the lay minister should strive to do his or her best, seek to improve, and derive strength and inspiration from a serious life of prayer. The lay minister always needs to consider that he or she is serving the greater ministry of the assembly and church as a whole.

In a parish setting the ministry of a particular individual may be for a limited period. Appropriately gifted elderly persons and persons with disabilities should be allowed to participate in liturgical ministries.

It is important to initiate neophytes into liturgical ministries, as seems opportune after their initiation, and to bring up the children of the parish to act as liturgical ministers as well. Even small children can participate in the ministry of hospitality and of bringing up the gifts, and older children can act as servers and musicians. In addition, some children can read quite well.

Lay liturgical ministers need to work together as a team, and usually will be working together with an ordained minister as well. His role, in part, is to coordinate the ministries of the lay persons, and this needs to be respected by the lay ministers.

The Liturgical Press (Collegeville, MN) has an extensive series of booklets describing individual lay liturgical ministries. A similar series is published by Novalis (Ottawa, ON) under the general title, New Parish Ministries, Virginia Sloyan, ed., Touchstones for Liturgical Ministers (Washington: The Liturgical Conference and The Federation of Diocesan Liturgical Commissions, 1978).

LAY MINISTRY

LAY SPIRITUALITY

The concept of lay spirituality is not new in the Christian church, but in the last half century the Roman Catholic tradition has benefited by greatly expanded expressions of spirituality for lay Christians. The phenomenon of lay spirituality and a theology of the lay vocation were topics of the 1987 World Synod of Bishops and of several papal documents in recent years. Understanding the radical nature of this aspect of aggiornamento requires an understanding of the terms "lay" (or "laity") and "spirituality" in the church, and a cursory glance at the history of Christian spirituality.

The term "laity" technically means non-ordained (i.e., everyone who is not a deacon, priest or bishop) but in popular church usage it identifies those baptized Christians who are neither ordained nor under the discipline of religious vows. When speaking of "lay spirituality" then, most people are referring to emerging expressions of life in Christ that are rooted in sources other than the vocations of holy orders or vows of poverty, chastity and obedience.

Religious and secular literature has given many definitions for the phenomenon of spirituality. In Christian terms, it is a relationship between a believer and God, mediated by the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, and brought forth by the power of God's Spirit within the personality of the believer and according to the believer's cooperation.

For the first three hundred years of the church's history the community of believers was always confronted with the possibility—even the probability—that members would have to die in public forums for the sake of the gospel. To profess faith in Jesus Christ was treasonous in the Roman Empire and frequent persecutions reminded those who accepted this faith that they were entering a very dangerous course. This experience had a tremendous impact on the quality of faith life (i.e., spirituality) of the early Christians. Surely there were "lazy" Christians, and some who questioned their faith and the power of Jesus in their lives, but they were, by all reports, the minority.

Legalization of Christianity changed all that and within a short time after Constantine allowed Christians free practice of the faith, there were numerous members of the baptized who were not living the faith as fully as they had been invited by the gospel. This (and a number of other factors) created the ground out of which the phenomenon of monasticism arose in the 5th and 6th centuries. By the 9th century, there was a general sense in the church that if one wanted to be truly "holy," that is close to Christ and filled with God's Spirit, then one left behind the ordinary world of commerce and family with all its temptations and entered a cloister where one prayed, practiced various penances, and studied holy writings (scripture, the letters and sermons of the Fathers of the church, etc.).

This lifestyle, with its vows of poverty, chastity and obedience, became the norm for authentic Christian living from the 6th until the 20th centuries in the Catholic tradition. A caste system by vocation developed within the church whereby "real" Christians were priests, deacons or religious who could devote their lives to prayers and works of charity. Lay Christians were those weaker ones whose salvation depended upon Sunday Mass attendance, reception of annual communion, and providing financial support for the "real" Christians. The architects of the Reformation in the 16th century fought against this increasingly clerical/religious mindset, but with only minor success in terms of developing a strong lay spirituality.

Seven realities of human experience, both secular and religious, have converged in the 20th century to establish the ground for a new call to holiness to the men and women in the world. These factors are not all of equal weight, nor are they all positive in themselves. Nonetheless, they have all been used by the Spirit of God to bring forth a new fire upon the earth, not unlike that experienced by the early Christians. This phenomenon, which for want of a better term is simply called lay spirituality, is slowly reshaping the self-identity of the institutional church.

After exploring these seven factors, I will briefly describe three primary milieux where the Spirit of God appears to have combined the impact of these factors and brought forth something new and rich for the church, and then outline twelve characteristics to identify this new lay spirituality.

Factors Shaping Lay Spirituality

1) Education. For the first time in human history as we know it, the majority of peoples worldwide are literate in some language. Even in Third World countries the corner has been turned in the last decade and the majority of the populations of all seven continents can read and write as the 20th century comes to a close.

This phenomenon enormously affects the Christian churches of the First World. No longer are sacred books and theological studies the province of only the educated clergy, as they were barely a century ago. Lay men and women can read the scriptures, history and church documents of past and present. They can and do read scientific studies, and they are educated to think and to question, to evaluate, to probe and even to distrust. Perhaps no other single factor has created such a crisis and opportunity for the church as an educated laity. Leonard Doohan, in the preface to his book, The Lay Centered Church, states, "In fact, for the first time in history there are in the Church today more theologically trained laity than priests or religious" (p.i).

2) Scripture Research. Great strides were made in scripture scholarship and Bible translations during the century from 1850-1950, but with the establishment of the Jewish state in Israel (and the subsequent opening up of archaeological digs there) and the critically important discovery of hundreds of scrolls and scroll fragments from the Qumran caves, the explosion of scriptural research, scholarship, and discovery has completely revolutionized Christian theological studies.

One simple effect of this scholarship is the growing awareness of the essentially lay leadership of the life in the early Christian churches. This gives impetus to a broadened appreciation of the vocation of all members of the faith community.

In the Catholic popular experience a more important effect of this scripture knowledge explosion has been the re-establishment of the newly understood scriptures as a primary base for authority in the spiritual life. Meeting the real presence of Christ in the word, newly explained and understood, has had the dramatic effect of re-evangelizing millions of "cradle Catholics."

3) Ecumenism. Since the Holy Synod of the Orthodox Church of Constantinople in 1919 issued a worldwide invitation to Christian churches to form a League of Churches, the Ecumenical Movement has been one of the dominant religious forces of this century. It is remarkably important in shaping the growth of lay spirituality because it provides a broad arena for sharing among clergy and laity of all Christian traditions our rich heritage of belief in Christ Jesus.

Many Christian denominations, furthermore, have had a more highly developed sense of lay leadership and participation than the Roman church, because they were founded, at least in part, in opposition to the excessive clericalism of the Roman church of the 16th-19th centuries.

More importantly, however, the Ecumenical Movement has contributed greatly in reshaping the self-image of the whole Christian church, which is foundational to an authentic expression of spirituality. The common baptism that all Christians share is the basis for all spirituality, for it is through baptism that we are first inspired and transformed "into Christ." Recognizing that we share this essential unity with brothers and sisters of all Christian denominations causes lay persons to recognize the dignity of each vocation and of all vocations.

Finally, the Ecumenical Movement has reopened the eyes of Christians of all traditions to the inescapable truth that each one must work to undo the scandal of the divided body of Christ. Ecumenism stresses that this is not the work of bishops, synods and councils alone. It is inherent in the mission of each Christian to effect unity in the body to the best of his or her ability, so that in Christ all may be one.

4) World Crises. Two world wars; more than 100 smaller, but nevertheless deadly, conflicts; the great depression; concerned efforts by nations or leaders to wipe out entire races or groups of people culminating in, but not ending with, the terrible holocaust in Europe of the 1930s and 1940s; the vast hoards of refugees following wars, plagues, and continental droughts; the division of the world into those who live in plenitude and those who exist in absolute want; whole nations, even continents destroyed by environmental pollutants; and the division of the world into camps armed with nuclear weapons capable of destroying the earth 13 or 15 or 20 times over—the litany of world crises that mark the passage of the 20th century is yet another critical factor that has shaped and is shaping a lay spirituality for our day.

How does a baptized Christian respond to the horror of war, the destruction of human dignity through racism or sexism, and the appalling inequities that confront him or her daily on the news? If such a person takes the gospel of Jesus Christ seriously, the crises of the wounded world demand an investment of time, resources and personal ingenuity to bring about peace and healing. The profound sense that the church must respond justly and compassionately to a broken world is perhaps the strongest ground for desiring to cooperate in the ongoing incarnation of Christ in the church.

The knowledge that so-called Christians could perpetrate and support the evils of this century gives all religious persons reason to pause and question what equally powerful forces for good might well be in the Sunday church pew if appropriately encouraged and enabled.

5) The Renewal of Vatican II. The dramatic call for a springtime of faith unleashed by the Spirit through the Second Vatican Council and the implementation of its documents, is the fifth factor to consider.

The theology of church described in Lumen Gentium whereby all the baptized are identified as the people of God; the definition of the church as celebrant of the sacramental mysteries in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy; the restoration of the meal aspect of the eucharist and the location of the eucharist squarely at the heart of the Christian faith life; the search for the energy of founding spiritual charisms in traditional spirituality movements of the church; the compelling call of Divino Afflante Spiritu to more fully mine the treasures of the scriptures; the restoration of the richness of the sacramental signs, especially the restoration of the catechumenate—which presupposes a process of spiritual growth at the heart of conversion; above all, the clarion call to the church to be servant to the world, not to be divided from the world, issued in the Constitution on the Church in the Modern World—all these and many more changes effected a groundswell of commitment among many already educated lay men and women to seek a true holiness in the context of living in the world.

6) The Influence of the Social Science. A sixth factor that has greatly contributed to a renewed Christian spirituality is the marked influence of the social sciences upon Western culture. Most notably the field of psychology exerts a tremendous influence on the average lay person (in this case lay means non-doctor, non-therapist and non-ordained) who has laid claim to the insights of Freud, Jung, Adler, Maslow and hundreds of other healers and researchers of the human psyche through the publications of the scholars themselves and through the works of numerous popularizers. For many people this psychological movement has been a tremendous source of division from traditional religions. Many have turned to psychology to answer questions about the inner life that religion formerly answered. So much has the language and concept of psychology taken over that an American psychiatrist, Karl Menninger, raised the question "Whatever became of sin?" in a book of that title in 1971, revealing that no one spoke of sin anymore, even from the pulpits of the Christian churches.

With the passing of the 1970s however, the traditions of religion and psychology began to seek out each other more frequently. The proliferation of the 12-step support groups provides a traditional Christian formula for spiritual growth apart from the name of and belief in Jesus Christ. Alcoholics Anonymous and its numerous off-shoot groups create spiritual havens of healing and strength for many who find no such support in the pews of traditional Christian churches.

For large numbers of believers, however, reclaiming the 12-step spirituality and/or a long roster of other insights from modern psychology in the context of the broader Christian spiritual traditions has been the source of a profoundly enriched interior life. The marriage of psychology and religion (through spirituality) is increasingly evident in academic programs, hospital and hospice care, clinics and other long term therapeutic approaches.

7) Cultural Malaise. A seventh contributing factor to the emergence of a compelling lay spirituality is the widespread cultural malaise that is often described as a profound sense of meaninglessness or alienation from life itself.

This malaise is identifiable in all the cultural landmarks of the radically secularized first world. Music, art, theater, television, cinema, and literature all celebrate alienation and meaninglessness. The drug culture among young and old effects a virtual paralysis wherever it takes hold. Rising incidents of crime and violence in every community leave citizens riddled with fear. Proof that disrespect for human life and for human relationships is increasing is demonstrated equally in the statistics of abortion clinics, divorce courts, and nuclear weapons factories. In every city hall where the effort to keep the poor from having a home or a decent meal is successful the resulting hopelessness deepens the malaise.

The sources of the cultural blight are many and difficult to specify. Highly developed technology that puts barriers between people and which appears to remove immediate consequences for behaviors has been blamed, as has rapidly developing scientific information that undermines traditional religious myths. The constant threat of nuclear annihilation has been cited as another significant cause. Whatever the cause, one unpredictable effect is the enlarged pursuit of the meaningful. The resurgence of the Catholic and Oriental mystical traditions, the development of new methods of meditation and the return to the wisdom of past generations to observe how humans have dealt with change and life threatening issues, and the development of small intentional communities to provide encouragement, energy and experiences of faith, are all evidences that the malaise is driving men and women to seek relief and to find hope, to work against the gathering darkness by proclaiming and unveiling the light.

While these seven forces differ in scope and implications, all are the ground out of which the Holy Spirit has forged a new spirituality of the laity. Three milieux have fostered this emerging vitality and we turn next to explore these briefly.

A. Parishes

The parish or local church is the first arena where these seven factors have converged in people's lives. In many parishes throughout the world the efforts at implementing the reforms of Vatican II have been sporadic and ineffective. In many more, however, the pastors and communities have worked hard to grasp the full implications of the documents and to put them into practice. It is in such places where the renewal of the liturgy, the implementation of the catechumenate process, the awakening of consciousness toward the oppressed, the need for lay ministry formation, and the ongoing adult formation and education programs spur the development of lay spirituality.

In each of these parishes, urban, suburban or rural, large or small, a Christian community of support and challenge is at the center of its life. Here the cycle of evangelization, conversion, and commitment to discipleship which is the hallmark of the Christian spiritual life weave a binding circle of love around male and female—married, never married, divorced, or widowed, children, adult and aged—far from any seminary, monastery or convent.

B. Universities

One ground of renewal in the church for 800 years or more has been the university, college and secondary school. Academic institutions sponsored by religious communities have been particularly noted for carrying on the renewal work of the church past and present. It is no accident therefore that a second milieu for emerging lay spirituality is this classic arena of formation.

Seminary programs, spirituality studies, degree and certificate tracks that wed science and religion or social science and theology have all formed a new generation of Christians among the young. Mature men and women who long for more than they were given in the past have returned for more education. Laity and clergy exploring the spiritual traditions together have brought new energy to all the vocational groups in the Christian body.

C. Renewal Movements

The third arena of this newly energized lay spirituality is intentional groups or communities of people who band together for prayer, dialog, scripture study, therapy, faith sharing, adult education, support in overcoming addiction, to accomplish a common goal, to fight a common enemy, to change unjust structures, or any combination of these.

A whole catalog of renewal movements, groups and experiences have been established or radically revised in the last 25 years. Some of these have emerged from within the church and are blessed by the church, and some without any initiation or blessing of the church have nonetheless contributed greatly to the spiritual growth of the members.

Whether founded by members of the church or not, such groups are rarely limited by traditional parish boundaries, and most are not limited denominationally or even religiously. Some, notably the 12-step groups and various other therapy or support groups, do not immediately cast themselves as spiritual-growth groups at all (and are careful to separate themselves from any institutional religion), but provide the kind of companionship, challenge, and inner journeying that characterize the development of Christian spirituality.

Renewal movements and basic community groups rarely identify a structural hierarchy with holy orders or religious vows, but count each member as equal simply because of membership, or create a hierarchy based on the quality of service rendered.

Some of these movements actually have historic roots in church tradition specifically as lay movements, but until Vatican II were governed by clergy or vowed religious leadership. Now such groups are generally directed by and for lay members even if clergy or religious continue to participate.

Many groups call forth lay members to provide counsel, spiritual direction, prayer leadership and other forms of ministry to the membership that were often reserved to ordained or religiously vowed chaplains in the past. The phenomenon of highly trained lay spiritual directors, catechists or theologians educating, guiding and forming deacon and priest candidates, novices and seminarians, as well as other lay persons, once virtually unknown in the Catholic tradition, is now, if not exactly universal, at least not uncommon. Much of the experience and training for the laity in this kind of leadership has come through the initiative of renewal movements and small basic communities.

Characteristics

Having thus explored seven factors that have shaped the phenomenon of lay spirituality and the milieu of its rebirth, it is now appropriate to complete this study by briefly identifying certain characteristics which describe lay spirituality as it has flowered in the last three decades in the Roman Catholic tradition.

1) The vocation to life in Christ through God's Spirit, i.e. holiness, is rooted in the priesthood of the baptized. Baptism is the act of initiation into the body of Christ and through baptism one dies to self and rises with Christ through the power of the Holy Spirit.

2) Participation of the body of Christ in his mission of salvation is incumbent upon the baptized and therefore Christian faith is always corporate or communal rather than private or individual.

3) The mission of Christ (and therefore the church) is to reconcile all humanity with God and with each other. Lay spirituality is always characterized by the work of peace-making, division-healing and unifying.

4) The eucharist, celebrated together by all the baptized, identifies and effects the church into the one body of Christ. It is therefore, the "source and the summit" (S.C., 7) of spirituality for laity, clergy and religious. Furthermore, this eucharistic center presents an appropriate christological focus for believers rather than excessive devotion to Mary and the saints as has sometimes characterized lay spiritualities of past eras.

5) The mission of the body of Christ is to and within the broken world. Lay spirituality finds its fruitfulness not from moving the believer out of contact with the world, but rather into contact with the heart of world affairs in order to transform the world by bringing life, hope, peace and justice.

6) Lay spirituality finds nourishment in prayer that is rooted in sound scriptural knowledge and contemplation. The work of reading, studying, pondering scripture is central to the believer's prayer time whether that time be brief or extended.

7) Lay spirituality is rooted in a scriptural value-base that demands emphasis on a lifestyle that is characterized by simplicity and human dignity in a world sharply divided between the powerful rich and the oppressed poor. Lay spirituality calls not for radical impoverishment or non-ownership of property as much as for responsible and respectful stewardship of the world's resources. Real holiness often emerges in the struggle to live and support a family in the world and not be swallowed up or possessed by a worldly value system.

8) Lay spirituality is rooted in a healthy knowledge of self as a loved sinner before God. Today's holiness is identified in respect for one's own dignity and appreciation of one's talents while possessing true knowledge of one's weakness and sinfulness. This provides a solid basis for love and respect for one's neighbors in a way that is non-possessive and non-controlling.

9) Lay spirituality celebrates God's presence and loving mercy in a balance between the sacramental life of the church and the familial rituals of the domestic church.

10) Lay spirituality is both affective and intellectual. A healthy human response to love is with the whole self. All dimensions of the human psyche are shaped by and shape one's relationship to God which in turn shapes the relationship with all persons. Characteristically lay spirituality among married couples is enriched by a healthy appreciation of God's gift of sexual expression as a means for growing in love.

11) Contemporary lay spirituality is not threatened by scientific advances, but is rather enriched by the search for truth on all frontiers.

12) Lay spirituality is not confined or defined by denominational boundaries. Truly spiritual men and women see the call to unity among Christians at the heart of the mission of reconciliation, and see the division and self-righteousness of denominationalism as destructive of the gospel message. Ecumenical and interfaith relationships are as rich and life-giving in faith as those within one's own tradition.

The growth of lay spirituality is one of the great gifts of the Spirit of God at a time in history when being Christian is so much more than wearing a denominational label and attending the church of one's choice on Sunday. The demands of the so-called post-Christian era of the waning years of the 20th century upon all believing Christians are no less than those placed by Christ upon the first apostles. For any Christian to respond with less courage, less spirit of conviction, or less generosity, is to deprive our broken world of the healing message that could be the only force between us and total self-annihilation. For the institutional churches to be anything less than utterly committed to the re-awakening of the fervor of the church described in the Acts of the Apostles, is to be untrue to the command of the gospel.

LENT

Lent is the most common name for what is chronologically the first part of the paschal cycle, a cycle which in its entirety extends from Ash Wednesday to the Sunday of Pentecost. Lent, or the time of preparation for the paschal celebration, runs from "Ash Wednesday until the Mass of the Lord's Supper exclusive" (GNLYC, 28), ending with the beginning of the Easter triduum on Holy Thursday evening. The three days of the Easter triduum include this celebration of the Mass of the Lord's Supper and continue through evening prayer on Easter Sunday. The Easter triduum in turn is followed by the Easter season of fifty days, concluding on Pentecost Sunday. In addition to these official calendar divisions within the paschal cycle, the last part of Lent and the first part of the Easter triduum are also traditionally referred to as Holy Week, which "has as its purpose the remembrance of Christ's passion, beginning with his Messianic entrance into Jerusalem" (GNLYC, 31).

Included in the actual season of Lent are Ash Wednesday, a "universal day of fast" (GNLYC, 29) which begins the season, and six Sundays, known since 1969 only by their numerical designation except for the sixth Sunday of Lent, officially called Passion (Palm) Sunday. In addition, Lent includes the Chrism Mass on Holy Thursday morning and as a primary focus of the season, the final stages of catechumenal preparation for initiation, expressed liturgically in the Rite of Election on the first Sunday of Lent, and the three Rites of the Scrutinies on the third, fourth, and fifth Sundays in Lent. The integrity of Lent as a focused season is maintained in the weekday liturgies which also provide the suggested time for the Rites of Presentations in the R.C.I.A. Two of the ten fixed solemnities in the universal calendar generally fall during the Lenten season: Joseph, husband of Mary, March 19; and the Annunciation, March 25.

Historical Development

The origins of Lent are subsequent to and dependent on the annual celebration of the Pascha. The preparatory fast of Holy Saturday prior to the vigil was joined to the traditional Friday fast of early Christians, creating a foundation which evolves into the eventual fast of forty days. But this development extending chronologically backwards from the Easter vigil and based primarily on baptismal preparation has been joined through recent research to a parallel pattern of a forty-day fast immediately following the celebration of Epiphany and finding its basis in the imitation of Jesus' life (see Talley, 1986). This second pattern exerts an influence on both the focus and duration of Lent and consequently both patterns are integral to the study of the historical development of Lent.

The earliest document which actually describes the process of baptismal preparation is the Apostolic Tradition, commonly ascribed to Hippolytus and dating from c. 215. Although Hippolytus relates the ritual moments of the conversion process in detail, he never identifies the celebration of initiation with Easter itself nor does he clarify the length of the intense preparation prior to the rites of initiation. By at least the 5th century, however, there is evidence in Rome of a backwards extension of the Easter triduum to the preceding Sunday, based on the readings of the passion accounts during that time. This week-long paschal fast, known by the 3rd century in other geographical centers, has no discernible connection to baptismal preparation in Rome. A clearer picture of a nascent Lent in Rome is provided by the 5th century historian Socrates who describes a fast of three consecutive weeks before Easter, apparently an earlier practice no longer observed in his time. These three weeks of preparation mentioned by Socrates are supported by additional information from the Gelasian Sacramentary, an 8th-century collection which still contained Masses for baptismal scrutinies on the third, fourth, and fifth Sundays of Lent. Although the actual scrutinies had been moved to weekday liturgies due to the predominance of infant baptism by the time of the Gelasian Sacramentary, the presence of the Mass titles undoubtedly points to an earlier custom. In addition, the fifth Sunday of Lent was called Domīnica mediana, a designation which makes sense only if indeed the fifth Sunday were the middle Sunday of three. The sequence of Johannine gospel readings beginning on the fourth Sunday and continuing through the passion on Good Friday also points to these three weeks as a unit in continuity with Easter. These three weeks of Lent, directly linked to the catechumenate in Rome, develop into a fast of forty days by the 4th century, an expansion perhaps given impetus by the Council of Nicea in 325 which mentioned an undefined forty-day period in its fifth canon. Athanasius of Alexandria, exiled to Rome in 340, writes back to his own church about a fast of forty days kept in Rome, and evidence of a pattern of forty fast days multiplies quickly within the second half of the 4th century.

Concurrent with this development in Rome, the Christian center of Alexandria gave rise to a different type of fast. In addition to a six-day fast prior to the celebration of Easter, which may have been commemorated as early as the 3rd century, several sources of the 4th century reveal a penitential fast for the purposes of reconciling penitents or for spiritual health. The fast is not associated with paschal baptism like that of Rome, but instead is an ascetical exercise in imitation of Jesus' fast. The chronology of this fast follows the gospel of Mark used in Egypt, which places the forty-day period immediately after the celebration of Epiphany, paralleling Jesus' sojourn in the desert following his own baptism. This forty-day ascetical fast was not continuous with the paschal fast of six days; the forty-day fast ended on the Friday prior to the feast of Palms, a celebration which preceded Easter by several weeks in the earlier Egyptian calendars. Adding to the differences is the apparent absence of Egyptian paschal baptism until 385. In developing a hypothesis for the timing of baptism prior to the adoption of a paschal celebration, Talley speculates that, based on later references to baptism and on the 2nd century expanded text of the gospel of Mark (the so-called secret gospel of Mark), the pre-4th-century baptismal celebration in Egypt took place at the end of this forty-day fast in imitation of the day when Jesus baptized Lazarus. This ingenious theory also allows for an explanation of the baptismal allusions connected with Lazarus on Saturday which appear in later Byzantine and in Mozarabic sources.

The post-Epiphany fast of the Egyptian tradition not only contributes to the historical development of Lent as a representation of an alternative pattern, but directly affects the expansion of Lent in other areas. The exportation of monastic elements from Egypt is reflected in the adoption of this fast in the closely related Celtic monastic tradition and its influence is probably reflected in the foundational monastic rule titled Regula Magistri which has an extended fast of one hundred days between Epiphany and Easter. This ascetical and monastic extension of Lent may originally have been a reconciling of two different traditions—the pre-paschal fast and the post-Epiphany fast—but its establishment in the West prior to the waning of adult baptisms provides a seasonal focus for the rise of penitential aspects of Lent. During the 5th and particularly the 6th centuries, the practice of adult baptism declined for several reasons, most notably because of the rise of infant baptisms for the offspring of Christian parents, itself encouraged by growing adherence to a doctrine of original sin. The result is a diminishing of the ritual process of conversion, specifically the latter part of the catechumenate simultaneous with the season of Lent, which found its logic in the personal commitment and response of adult converts. In the theological space created by the diminishing of the baptismal dimensions of Lent, the penitential aspects, which were also present from the earliest references to Lent, blossom into full growth. Part of this development is manifested in the ritualization of reconciliation, specifically the rise of canonical penance and the order of penitents. Public penance is witnessed to as early as Origen, the Didascalia, and in the practice of the 3rd century North African church, but the growth of the church in the 4th century sees more the institutionalization of the ritual process and an identification of that process with the season of Lent which can properly be called canonical penance. In Rome, the first extant reference to public penance occurs in a letter of Innocent I (416) with an explanation of the reconciliation of penitents on Holy Thursday, but the beginning of the process which ended on Holy Thursday is not clarified until later.

In the East, the structure and duration of Lent varied from area to area but with one consistent difference from the West, namely a sharp differentiation between Lent and Great Week (Holy Week). The Apostolic Constitution (c.375) records a practice of six weeks of Lent, a festal break of Lazarus Saturday and Palm Sunday, and then the six-day paschal fast immediately preceding the celebration of Easter. This same pattern can eventually be seen throughout the Eastern churches, exemplified in the rich tradition of Jerusalem. Although the primary sources on Lent and the catechumenate from Jerusalem in the 4th century offer somewhat conflicting evidence on the length of Lent (Cyril of Jerusalem in his Baptismal Catecheses seems to reflect a six-week Lent; Egeria in her diary of travel speaks of an eight-week Lent), by the 5th century the Armenian lectionary has conformed to the Eastern pattern of six weeks of Lent with an additional six days of Great Week following that. The important writings of Cyril and Egeria reveal in Jerusalem a Lent focused on the preparation of baptismal candidates for paschal initiation, the same focus seen in the catechetical writings of John Chrysostom in Antioch and Theodore of Mopsuestia. All of these sources reflect an elaborate process of ritual and catechesis occurring during the season of Lent, augmented especially in Jerusalem by the system of stational liturgies which used the holy places to enrich and reinforce the readings of Lent and Great Week.

In the Byzantine capital of Constantinople, the early sources on Lent are scanty, but reconstruction from later liturgical books shows a similar pattern to the Eastern practice of a six-week Lent, a two-day festal interlude, and a six-day Great Week prior to Pascha. In the 6th century an additional week of fasting was added to the beginning of Lent by the monophysite churches, perhaps influenced by the Coptic practice of retaining a post-Epiphany fast. As an ecumenical gesture aimed at reuniting the churches, the emperor Heraclius also added an extra week of light fasting to the Chalcedonian churches' Lent in the 7th century, extending the celebration by another week.

This same expansion of the season can be seen in the medieval West by tracing the development of Lent in Rome. The liturgical sources and calendars reveal a double extension in the season of Lent: an interior development reflected in the growth of weekday stations and liturgies, and a lengthening of the season of Lent by the addition of an anticipatory period prior to the First Sunday of Lent. From the homilies of Pope Leo I in the 5th century we learn that Wednesdays and Fridays were the only official assemblies during the week and that the eucharist was not celebrated on those days. The fasting of Lent was observed Monday through Saturday. By the 6th century, however, the days of assembly (stational liturgies) had been extended to Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays during Lent and they included the celebration of eucharist. The 6th century also saw the official extension of Lent to include the Wednesday and Friday before the First Sunday of Lent. By the 7th century, this Wednesday preceding Lent I becomes the beginning of the fast, the caput ieiunii, which will later become known as Ash Wednesday, and which allowed for a precise number of forty fasting days. In the 8th century, the remaining aliturgical day, Thursday, received its liturgical formularies, creating a system of daily Lenten liturgies. The anticipatory season of a mini-Lent is seen by the 6th century addition of the seventh Sunday before Easter, Quinquagesima, followed shortly by the addition of Sexagesima, and finally Septuagesima in the early 7th century. Gregory I suppressed the singing of the Alleluia during this three-week period, extending additional ties with Lent chronologically back into this period. Both of these Roman developments were spread throughout the Western Christian realm by the liturgical renewal of Charlemagne which adopted Roman liturgical customs as universal.

The custom of distributing ashes on Ash Wednesday did not originate with Roman tradition but came from the Mozarabic and Gallican liturgical traditions where it was connected with entrance into the order of penitents. Although not at first related to the season of Lent, the custom gained popularity as many of the penitential practices once reserved for serious public sinners became standard for all the faithful. It was not until 1091, when Pope Urban II ordered the imposition of ashes on the heads of all the faithful, that the reception of ashes became mandatory and the Wednesday preceding the First Sunday of Lent became known as Ash Wednesday. This reception of ashes by all the faithful was in keeping with the primary stress of Lent which had become penance, and conversely, the demise of baptismal theology within the season.

The popularity of Ash Wednesday and of the ritual of ashes for the faithful was paralleled by a change in emphasis on the last Sunday of Lent, Palm Sunday. This Sunday was maintained as Passion Sunday in Rome well into the medieval age, but elsewhere the second focus of celebration on the sixth Sunday of Lent, namely the commemoration of Jesus' entrance into Jerusalem, began to overshadow the passion emphasis. The first reference to an actual procession with palms comes from 4th century Jerusalem. Although Jerusalem may not represent the origins of this particular celebration, the presence of holy places made the procession all the more popular and contributed to the growth in palm processions in Gaul and Spain throughout the medieval period. The participatory nature of the processions led to the full scale urban processions of the 8th century, characterized by the composition of the Palm Sunday hymn known in English as All Glory, Laud, and Honor by Theodulph of Orleans, and eventually to the liturgical dramas of the Middle Ages.

In the Roman tradition, the remaining days of Lent, following Palm Sunday and leading to the culmination of Lent in the Easter triduum, focused on the passion of Christ as recounted in the remaining synoptic gospels of Mark and Luke (Matthew having been read exclusively on Palm Sunday). On Holy Thursday the last two rituals of Lent were celebrated: the consecration of the chrism, and the reconciling of those penitents who had undergone the last stages of public penance during Lent. The consecration of chrism, and originally the blessing of both the oil of the sick and of catechumens, was the prerogative of the bishop. In 400, the Council of Toledo had restated not only that this was the privilege of bishops but that they could consecrate chrism at any time. Shortly after that, however, the consecration of chrism came to be identified with Holy Thursday, undoubtedly because of the necessity of preparing chrism for use at the Easter sacraments. In Rome, the pope consecrated chrism during the one Mass at which he presided on Holy Thursday, namely the Mass of the Lord's Supper. But in the morning of Holy Thursday, the priests attached to the titular churches of Rome blessed the oil of catechumens and of the sick at the liturgies over which they presided. This Roman city pattern was adapted in the Frankish sacramentaries by adding the text for the consecration of chrism to the presbyteral Mass, creating a single liturgy focused on the consecration and blessing of all oils. This Gallican adaptation became the norm for the medieval Western church outside of Rome. The reconciliation of penitents took place in the presence of the bishop prior to the celebration of eucharist on the evening of Holy Thursday, and this first communion to which the reconciled Christians were welcomed was the completion of their term of excommunication. The details of the liturgy of reconciliation are first found in the Gelasian Sacramentary, and the rite endured in liturgical books and memory beyond the actual practice of public penitents. The medieval liturgies of reconciliation represented an unparalleled sense of hospitality and ecclesiology in an age where those elements were often diminished in liturgy.

Contemporary Practice

The double focus of baptism and penance in the season of Lent was restored with the reforms of Vatican II, particularly with the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963) and the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1972). From the primary (and often solitary) focus on penance, the conciliar document reminds the church of the original baptismal character of Lent: "The two elements which are especially characteristic of Lent—the recalling of baptism or the preparation for it, and penance—should be given greater emphasis in the liturgy and in liturgical catechesis. It is by means of them that the Church prepares the faithful for the celebration of Easter . . ." (S.C., 109). The constitution's charge to make more use of the baptismal features of Lent, including those "of an earlier tradition" (S.C., 109a), was brought to fruition with the promulgation of the final draft of the R.C.I.A. in 1988. "The sacraments of initiation are celebrated during the Easter Solemnities, and preparation for these sacraments is part of the distinctive character of Lent. Accordingly, the Rite of Election should normally take place on the first Sunday of Lent and the period of final preparation of the elect should coincide with the Lenten season. The plan arranged for the Lenten season will benefit the elect by reason of both its liturgical structure and the participation of the community" (R.C.I.A., 126).

This twofold emphasis is reflected in the structure, readings, and prayers of the reformed Lenten liturgies. The revised structure of Lent has restored the integrity of the season by eliminating the anticipatory period of septuagesima, sexagesima, and quinquagesima prior to the first Sunday of Lent, and by eliminating the anticipation of Passion Sunday on the fifth Sunday of Lent (itself called Passion Sunday prior to the reforms of 1969) which had created a two week period of Passiontide. Ash Wednesday is retained as the beginning of Lent, and it continues the call to reform and to acts of charity while emphasizing the movement towards Easter. The prayer preceding the blessing of ashes expresses this by saying: "May they keep this Lenten season in preparation for the joy of Easter" (1969 Sacramentary, Ash Wednesday).

While Ash Wednesday recalls the penitential aspects of Lent, the structure and focus of the R.C.I.A. has had a profound effect on recalling the baptismal nature of Lent. The readings for the Sundays of Lent, like those of the entire liturgical year, are on a three year cycle, and the first of the three, Cycle A, restores the catechumenal readings associated with adult initiation in the early church. This cycle can be used every year in parishes which have an R.C.I.A., and the accompanying scrutinies and prayers on the third, fourth, and fifth Sundays of Lent, together with the Rite of Election on the first Sunday of Lent, ritually support the theology that Lent finds its ultimate purpose in the celebration of Easter.

The first Sunday of Lent in all three cycles uses the story of Jesus' temptation in the desert from either Matthew, Mark, or Luke, to focus on the beginning of the journey to the resurrection. The accompanying Preface for Lent I strengthens this movement: "Each year you give us this joyful season when we prepare to celebrate the paschal mystery with mind and heart renewed." The second Sunday also has the same gospel story in all three cycles, the transfiguration of Jesus, which points again to the glory of a life in Christ beyond the cross and death. The second Sunday of Lent also has its own Preface related to the gospel reading.

Beginning with the third Sunday in Cycle A, the ancient baptismal pericopes from John dominate the liturgies for three weeks. On the third Sunday, the story of the meeting of Jesus with the Samaritan woman is centered on the "living water" which Jesus gives for eternal life. The story of the man born blind and healed by Jesus is the focus of the fourth Sunday, Cycle A, a baptismal story dependent on the early church understanding of baptism as enlightenment. The fifth Sunday uses the gospel of the raising of Lazarus, a reading with a rich historical background of its own and one that holds out to all Christians the ultimate goal of life with Christ after death.

All three of these Sundays in Cycle A have their own proper Prefaces, the other two cycles continue to use the Preface of Lent I or II. Both Cycles B and C in these three Sundays present readings selected to speak to those already baptized and continuing to grow in their faith. Cycle B, particularly in the OT readings, retraces the covenant of God and God's people through the new covenant in Christ Jesus. The gospel readings culminate on the fifth Sunday in the dying and rising of all Christians on the journey through life with the use of the gospel of John pericope on the grain of wheat which dies to bear fruit, reflecting both Christ's passage from death to life and that of all Christians. Cycle C has a stronger focus on transforming faith and uses gospel stories in these three weeks which recount cycles of failure and ultimate victory through faith. The gospel reading for the fifth Sunday in Cycle C is the only one in this cycle taken from John; here the story of the adulterous woman who receives the mercy of God and begins again reflects the theme of victorious faith begun on the first Sunday of Lent with the story of Jesus' victory over Satan.

All three cycles move to the passion account on the sixth Sunday of Lent (properly called Passion Sunday) which begins Holy Week. The first part of the liturgy commemorates Jesus' entrance into Jerusalem, a commemoration retained in the liturgical reforms in three options: an actual procession with palms, a solemn entrance, or a simple entrance. The gospel of Jesus' entrance into Jerusalem is read from one of three synoptic accounts prior to the procession or entrance. The focus changes from the entry of Jesus to the passion of Jesus, however, with the prayers and readings of the eucharistic liturgy itself, moving toward the proclamation of the passion from one of the three synoptic accounts (the gospel of John being reserved for Good Friday). This last Sunday of Lent also has its own Preface for use in all three cycles which speaks of the efficacious dying and rising of Christ, tying this Sunday's liturgy to the Easter triumph at the conclusion of Lent.

The weekdays of Lent also continue the theme of movement towards Easter. The importance of the season is seen in the fact that each weekday has its own proper of the Mass. Beginning with the fourth week of Lent, the gospel of John is read in a semi-continuous manner which creates a coherent whole with the Sunday readings of Cycle A.

The one historical aspect of Lent which was not addressed in the reforms of the rites and of the calendar since Vatican II is the identification of Lent with an order of penitents and a formal reconciliation of those in a temporary period of being outside the full communion of the church.

Experience has taught liturgical scholars and pastoral practitioners that the ritualization of re-entry is very important to many people and a process of conversion like that of the final stages of the R.C.I.A. would allow for a time period of sufficient duration in order to facilitate such a ritualization. The future of Lenten reforms may be enriched by the addition of just such a process and group of people, restoring in a more profound way the richness of Lent as a time of preparation for initiation for some, a time of preparation for reconciliation for others, and a time of renewal in both areas for the faithful in the church.

LITURGICAL BOOKS

"Liturgical books" may refer to any collection of texts (readings, prayers, songs) employed in the course of liturgical celebrations, with or without descriptions or directions for ritual celebration. More commonly, it is used for the actual books, official in character, prepared for the ministers, readers, and others who have special roles in the liturgical assembly, and specifically sung and spoken parts.

It is evident that the first such collections were the canonical scriptures themselves, at whatever stage or in whatever form. In this sense an antecedent of later liturgical books is seen in the scroll from which Jesus read in the synagogue (Lk 4:16-30) and in the psalms, canticles, and euchological texts of both OT and NT. The arrangement of the gospels themselves, for example, has even been seen as influenced by their reading in the church assembly—a pattern that has now influenced modern Roman liturgical reform: the semi-continuous reading of biblical passages in the eucharist and the introduction of a three-year Sunday cycle of readings following the synoptic gospels.

More precisely, however, liturgical books are the collections designed and compiled directly for such use, and these have gradually developed from the lists of readings or the booklets (libelli) of prayers in ancient times into the officially sanctioned volumes of the modern period. The most highly developed books are found in the Eastern churches, the Roman and other Western Catholic rites, and in the Protestant and Anglican churches with strong liturgical traditions. This article is concerned with the books of the Roman rite, which in many respects are paralleled by other usages.

The traditional categories of such collections, variously named, represent first of all the several services of Christian worship, especially the eucharist and the other sacraments, lesser rites, and ecclesial prayer. Thus a collection for the sacraments of initiation or for the offices of prayer differs from the book or books for the eucharistic liturgy. More important, especially in the case of the eucharist and the office of prayer, books were originally distinguished according to their use and user: books for the presiding bishop or priest (largely prayer texts), books for deacons and other readers of the scriptures (or other non-biblical writings, particularly in the ecclesial prayer), books for the cantors and other singers, including the whole assembly.

The names attached to these books at different periods vary greatly but are generally indicative of their content and use. A lectionary is a book of lections or readings—with the evident possibility of a further division such as an evangeliary or book of gospels; alternatively, an order or list of pericopes has sufficed, to be used with a full Bible. A sacramentary is a book for the presiding minister of the sacrament (of the eucharist and of other sacraments). An antiphonal or a cantatorium or a gradual is a book of chants: for the intervenient chants of the liturgy of the word or for the processional rites of the eucharist. The daily prayer offices or hours had their corresponding collections with, for example, distinct books or hymns, homilies of readings, and the martyrology from which the solemn listing of saints' names was proclaimed.

Rituals for the sacraments other than the eucharist and for lesser services have had a variety of names: manuals, sacerdotals, pastorals, etc. Here a distinction has been made from medieval times between such general manuals and the "pontifical," the term employed for the liturgical celebrations (the sacraments of orders and, in the West, confirmation, but also major consecrations and blessings) reserved to the presidency of the bishop. An ordo, later called a ceremonial, generally differs from other liturgical books: it consists of descriptions or directives, without liturgical texts. (The generic term ordo has recently come to be used not only for the rite and ritual of a given celebration such as the order of Mass or the order of reconciliation, but for the several parts of the revised liturgical books themselves, for example, the Order for the Christian Initiation of Adults.)

Of all the developments in the liturgical books, none was more significant in the West than the compilation of a unified book for the eucharistic celebration. In the High Middle Ages missals were compiled to combine the sacramentary of the presiding celebrant, the book or books of readings for the deacon and other readers, and the antiphonal, gradual, or similar books for the singers. The convenience of this kind of book for private celebration, in which the priest took the roles of all but a server, is evident. Nevertheless it represented a serious deterioration of the public eucharistic celebration—to the extent that, in the medieval and modern period, the presiding bishop or priest was expected to read quietly all the readings and all the sung parts either before or while these were proclaimed or chanted by others. This distortion, which was not corrected until the 1950s with the reform of the Holy Week services, was canonized by the medieval missal—and, for the offices of prayer, by the breviary which similarly combined the several books needed for the communal celebration into a volume for private reading of those bound to pray the ecclesial office.

The ancient and medieval norm, once the early period of improvised prayer texts and freer choice of readings had passed, was that each church or province or region had its own liturgical books, with much in common—at least in the liturgies dependent upon the Roman rite and within other Western rites—but still with great diversity. The exchange of manuscripts of such collections, especially the great sacramentaries, was a means of diffusing a given rite and a step toward greater unity and even uniformity. The printing of liturgical books in the 15th and 16th centuries facilitated diffusion of texts, but the principle of divergency according to established local or regional tradition remained intact.

It was only in the 16th and 17th centuries, in the aftermath of the Council of Trent, that an almost uniform pattern of Roman liturgical books emerged. In its concluding session (December 4, 1563), the council entrusted the revision of the Roman breviary and missal (along with the catechism and index of prohibited books) to Pius IV. The commission of revision completed the breviary in 1568 and the missal in 1570, and both were promulgated by Pius V; although the volumes were the result of intensive research into older sources, they made rather slight ritual or structural changes. The most striking development was a radical reduction in saints' days, but still more important was the canonical norm: that these Roman books were to be used throughout the West, except in those local churches (and religious orders) which had their own rite or use of some two hundred years' standing. This was the beginning of greater and greater uniformity; it demonstrates the effectiveness of liturgical books not only as the tools of worship but also as instruments of reform and relative rigidity.

In 1588 Sixtus V established the Congregation of Sacred Rites which was to undertake, among other things, the still incomplete work of revising the Roman books. The third major book was the Roman Pontifical, issued in 1596; the fourth was the Roman Ritual of 1614. By exception the latter was not imposed throughout the Latin church, and local rituals continued until, by the 20th century, most of them took the form of mere supplements or appendices to the Roman book—just as the formularies for local feasts were supplementary to the missal and breviary of the Roman rite. During these five decades after Trent, the Roman Martyrology also appeared (1584), and the tradition of the Ordines Romani and later Roman ceremonies was continued in the Ceremonial of Bishops (1600); the latter was a descriptive volume rather than a liturgical book of texts.

From the early 17th through the 19th centuries the four principal books were only slightly revised. The missal was supplemented by the Memoriale Rituum of 1725 for less solemn services in Holy Week and on other occasions. The many additions to the missal and breviary were by way of added saints' days, devotional feasts, votive offices and Masses, etc., partly seen also in a supplementary volume, the Octavarium Romanum, with readings for the ever-increasing octaves celebrated in local churches and religious orders. In the mid-20th century the eight post-Tridentine books just enumerated were officially counted as the Roman "liturgical books" along with a ninth, the collection of decrees (Decreta Authentica) of the Congregation of Rites, which had been issued by authority of Leo XIII in 1898-1901. Like the Ceremonial of Bishops, this was not a liturgical book in the usual sense, since it consisted of a large selection of decrees and responses rather than liturgical texts as such.

The (limited) liturgical reform of the Pius X, largely a simplification of excesses in the breviary and missal, with a radical suppression of saints' days and votive observances that had again come to overshadow the celebration of Sundays and the central mysteries, required a new missal (1914) and breviary (1920). At the same time the critical correction of Gregorian chant permitted the issuance of the Roman Gradual for the missal (1907) and the Roman Antiphonal for the daytime offices of the breviary (1912). Again, in 1925 a revised Roman Ritual appeared, to incorporate in its introductory praenotanda the new sacramental law of the 1917 Code of Canon Law.

For the most part, the initial and piecemeal liturgical reforms of Pius XII, some of them completed only after John XXIII became pope in 1959, could be issued in separate volumes such as the ordines for the Easter vigil (1951), for the restored Holy Week (1955), and for the baptism of adults in several stages of the catechumenate (1962), as well as the second part of the Roman Pontifical for the dedication of churches and for consecrations and blessings of places and objects (1961). The partial simplification of the rubrics in 1962 (the "code of rubrics") required interim revisions of missal and breviary, in an effort to return to the simpler calendar of Pius X and even that of Pius V, but without alteration of the rites themselves.

Vatican II's constitution, Sacrosanctum concilium, provided not only general principles and some specifics for liturgical reform but an explicit mandate that the entirety of the Roman liturgical books be revised "as soon as possible; experts are to be employed in this task and bishops from various parts of the world are to be consulted" (S.C., 25). At the level of the Roman rite as a whole, the books were to be a principal instrument of reform; at the same time the door was opened, particularly by the introduction of the vernacular, to "particular" liturgical books truly proper to various countries or regions. Consistent with the revised Roman books, these would go beyond the latter and offer the possibility of a recovery of the tradition of diverse uses.

The content of the new Roman books, revised by the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Liturgy established by Paul VI (January 1964) and related to the older Congregation of Rites, belongs to an account of the liturgical reforms of Vatican II (q.v.). Their pattern and style can be described briefly.

1. Beginning with the first section of the Roman Pontifical "restored by decree of the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council and promulgated by authority of Pope Paul VI" (1968), the official books in Latin were gradually introduced until by 1973 the principal ones were complete (the ritual for blessings and the Ceremonial of Bishops appeared only in 1984). The pattern of four major "books" was retained: missal, office or liturgy of the hours, ritual, and pontifical. But the ritual of sacraments, still called the Roman Ritual, is now in various sections corresponding to the tituli of the old single-volume book; the same is true of the Roman Pontifical.

The massive work of post-conciliar revision of Roman books can be seen in tabular form: (a) missal: Order of Mass (1969), lectionary (1969), presidential prayers or sacramentary (1970)—along with provision for the corresponding book of Gregorian chants (Ordo cantus Missae, 1971); (b) ritual: marriage (1969), baptism of children (1969), funerals (1969), religious profession (1970), adult initiation (1971), anointing and care of the sick (1972), communion and eucharistic cult (1973), penance (1973), blessings (1984); (c) pontifical: ordinations (1968), consecration to a life of virginity (1970), blessing of abbots and abbesses (1970), blessing of oils (1970), confirmation (1971), institution of readers and acolytes (1972), dedication of a church (1977); (d) liturgy of the hours (1971).

The Roman calendar (1969), related to both missal and liturgy of the hours, and the Ceremonial of Bishops (1984), describing the bishop's presidential role in the liturgical celebrations, should be added to this listing of the chief liturgical books of the contemporary rite. All of the revised books have been translated—and, in varying degrees, rearranged, augmented, and adapted—in the vernacular editions.

2. The number and enlarged scope of the new Roman liturgical books and even the sequence in which they appeared may be attributed to practical considerations: the larger quantity of liturgical texts, the complex processes of achieving the noble simplicity sought by Vatican II in the basic Roman rite, and the like. In one case, however, the pattern of the medieval missal was deliberately broken to express and to enforce the principle of the differentiation of roles in the celebration (S.C., 28). Thus the Ordo lectionum Missae appeared first as the basis for the Roman Lectionary, the presidential prayers for the eucharist appeared in a distinct volume, and both are considered parts of the Latin Missale Romanum—along with the Graduale of chants published later. Some English editions of the volume of presidential prayers have correctly restored the term "sacramentary" to that book, thus clarifying the distinction of prayers, readings, and song—and helping to separate the roles of those who take the several parts in the one celebration.

3. The revised books are marked by extensive introductory material, in the form of praenotanda or general instructions, of a doctrinal, liturgical, and pastoral nature over and above the pragmatic directions or rubrics and descriptions of the services. Among the 15th/16th century Roman liturgical books, only the Roman Ritual had pastoral and canonical notes, and these were very limited. The new pattern was introduced at the insistence of Vatican II. While respecting the right and indeed duty of the national or regional churches to create their own rituals, the council nonetheless insisted that the full Roman prefatory material be included "whether the instructions are pastoral or rubrical or have some special social bearing" (S.C., 63b).

4. One characteristic of the new books may be taken for granted, namely, their inclusion of constant directions for full participation of the whole assembly; Vatican II drew special attention to this need (S.C., 31). Another specific mandate, related to the creation of particular liturgical books by the respective conferences of bishops, was that the Roman books themselves should provide potential areas for "legitimate variations and adaptations to different groups, regions, and peoples . . ." (S.C., 38).

The degree to which national or regional liturgical books go beyond the Roman revision, with which they are to be in harmony, is not completely resolved and is in part a canonical question. The 1983 C.I.C. retains the norm that the Roman See alone gives official approbation to the basic Latin books (cc. 826, 1; 838, 2); the conferences of bishops give the same approbation to the vernacular

(and adapted) versions (c. 838, 3). The term editio typica is used of such original, official editions. In turn, the permission to reprint belongs to the diocesan bishop or other local ordinary of the place of publication (c. 826, 2).

Although the conferences of bishops regularly act jointly in preparing liturgical books in the respective languages through their joint or "mixed" commissions, each conference must act separately and formally in approving texts and books for the churches of its own territory. This approbation requires, in accord with the decree of Vatican II (S.C., 36.3; 63b), review by the Roman See—a review, technically called confirmation or recognition (recognitio), that is intended to support and strengthen the original decision. This can create tension and conflict if the Roman review demands changes that radically alter the decision of the territorial authority.

Liturgical books are only an instrument, only a means to an end. Misused they can create an artificial rigidity and excessive uniformity. Well prepared, and appropriately adapted to regional and local needs, they can support the communion of the churches in the liturgy and enrich its forms and words.

LITURGICAL COMMITTEES

One of the distinctive characteristics of the liturgical revisions following the Second Vatican Council is the need to prepare the liturgy before it is celebrated. This preparation is necessary because of the numerous options that are now provided depending on the pastoral circumstances that surround a particular liturgy and the need for pastoral adaptation. The options may require selecting a particular text among several provided. There may be an option as to where a rite is celebrated, such as the blessing and procession of palms on Passion Sunday. The selection and appropriate integration of music also requires advance preparation for the liturgy.

In many cases only a general rubric is provided in the ritual book which requires forethought and creative planning. For example, in the Rite of Acceptance into the Order of Catechumens, the rubrics state that the celebrant greets the candidates in a friendly manner. "He speaks to them, their sponsors, and all present, pointing out the joy and happiness of the Church" (R.C.I.A., 49). Need for preparation here should be obvious since a specific text is not provided.

At times the rubrics may simply state that the celebrant addresses the assembly "in these or similar words." While there is room for extemporaneous remarks, the need for advance preparation in the rites is always necessary.

One of the positive signs of the growing involvement of the faithful in the liturgy is the expansion of liturgical ministries to include deacons, lectors, cantors, extraordinary ministers of communion, etc. The effective involvement of these ministries in the liturgy requires training and formation and a careful coordination of their roles in the liturgy.

Although there is no explicit mention of them in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, the need for preparing the liturgy has naturally led to the formation of parish liturgy committees. Because the liturgy is the community's prayer, it is presumed that the faithful would assume some responsibility for its preparation. The General Instruction on the Roman Missal states: "All concerned should work together in preparing the ceremonies, pastoral arrangements, and music for each celebration. They should work under the direction of the rector and should consult the people about the parts which belong to them" (G.I.R.M. 73).

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy called for each diocesan bishop to establish a liturgy committee as well as committees for music and art (S.C., 45-46). The parish liturgy committee seems to parallel what is a need on a diocesan level for carefully attending to the care of the liturgy and the pastoral implementation of the rites of the church.

The structure of a parish liturgy committee will vary from place to place but would ordinarily consist of a representative group of parishioners willing to work in collaboration with the pastor in the preparation of the liturgy and the ongoing formation of the assembly in the spirituality engendered by the church's worship. Depending on the size and needs of a parish, the committee may consist of a number of teams working together under the leadership of a central committee. It may be composed of the parish priests and the heads of each liturgical ministry (lectors, extraordinary ministers of communion, musicians, etc.) or it may be composed of individuals specifically chosen for their competence or particular perspective they would bring to liturgical planning. In all cases the members of the committee ought to exhibit a genuine love for the liturgy and regard it as a high priority in parish life. Music in Catholic Worship 12 states: "The planning group should include those with the knowledge and artistic skills needed in celebration: men and women trained in music, poetry, and art, and familiar with the current resources in these areas; men and women sensitive also to the present day thirst of so many for the riches of scripture, theology, and prayer. It is always good to include some members of the congregation who have not taken special roles in the celebrations so that honest evaluations can be made."

An effective liturgy committee will not only commit itself to the work of preparing the liturgy, but to making the prayer of the liturgy the foundation of their own spiritual lives. The committee should allow for ample time together for prayer and reflection that is rooted in the liturgy.

Every liturgy committee needs to outline a plan for its own ongoing formation in the liturgy. Members need to be thoroughly acquainted with the rites of the church and acquire an understanding and appreciation for the church's liturgical tradition, including the current official liturgical documents. They need a respect for liturgical law and need to understand its meaning and purpose.

Liturgy committees can take advantage of the resources of the diocesan liturgy office or liturgical commission and any local or national conferences on the liturgy which may be available. The parish budget should allow for continuing education to take place and funds should be available to build a resource library to include basic liturgy documents and other published materials that can be useful in understanding and preparing the liturgy.

In order for a parish liturgy committee to function effectively it must first of all perceive its service as a ministry to the assembly. It cannot pretend to function in a vacuum, choosing ritual expressions that are suitable only to itself. The liturgy committee must strive to be inclusive of the full assembly, sensitive to the presence of the elderly, the handicapped, small children, single adults, the hearing impaired, cultural diversity, etc.

A parish liturgy committee oversees the liturgical life of the parish. It oversees the training, scheduling and exercise of the various liturgical ministries. It sets long range goals by reviewing the full liturgical year and planning for the proper observance of the major feasts and seasons. The committee works to establish a rhythm for the year into which special events in the parish's life, such as anniversaries, first communion celebrations, etc., can be appropriately integrated. Long range goals such as the ongoing liturgical formation of the assembly, establishing standards for good worship, the ongoing evaluation of liturgical celebrations, and the possible redesign of the worship space would also be part of the liturgy committee's responsibilities.

The Sunday eucharist takes priority among the liturgy committee's responsibilities. Selecting texts from the legitimate options, preparing the worship space, coordinating the ministries, choosing appropriate music, preparing the assembly and preparing whatever special needs may be called for in a particular liturgy are all part of making the Sunday assembly's worship a worthy and dignified celebration. Consistent attention to the details of the Sunday eucharist establishes a quality and regularity to the liturgy that should be expected week after week.

Although the work of the parish liturgy committee needs to place a priority on the Sunday eucharist, it ought to be concerned as well about the celebration of all the sacraments, the rites of Christian initiation, the celebration of the liturgy of the hours, funerals, devotional practices, encouraging prayer at home, etc. There is always a danger of becoming so interested and invested in the small details of the liturgy that the broader concerns are overlooked. For example, the much broader issue of integrating liturgy into the parish's life and mission and leading the community to full and conscious participation needs to be an overarching goal of the liturgy committee.

The liturgy committee needs to engage in a regular process of evaluation. At times this evaluation may require the assistance of an outside professional, perhaps the diocesan liturgy office or liturgical commission. Even on a week-to-week basis the liturgy committee needs to review how its plans and preparations were received and judge its effectiveness. Good records will be helpful when the calendar returns the committee to plan the same events again.

Frequently overlooked in liturgy committees is the need for good communication. Good communication between committee members and pastoral staff is essential. The committee needs to work closely with presiders and homilists to ensure that they are comfortable with what is planned and that their roles are carefully coordinated with the other ministries.

The musicians need to be well integrated into the liturgical organization of the parish and included in the planning process. The religious education ministry of the parish also needs to be integrally connected with the work of the liturgy committee so that the link between liturgy and catechesis is not lost. Through the parish council communication with the assembly can be maintained, as the council serves not only in a consultative role but also in an advisory capacity.

Whether setting long range goals or establishing short range goals such as preparing Sunday's Mass, a penance service, evening prayer, or decorating the church for a particular feast, goal setting will require careful consideration at liturgy committee meetings. Part of a committee's education and organization will include establishing a clear and definite system to facilitate the development of long range and short range goals.

LITURGICAL DIRECTOR

A parish liturgical director is responsible for the overall liturgical life of the community and ordinarily assumes leadership of the parish liturgy committee. The parish liturgy director may be a competent and well-trained volunteer or a salaried professional on the parish staff.

While a degree in liturgy or theology is not a requirement, a thorough understanding of the liturgy is to be expected on the part of the parish liturgy director. The parish liturgy director is not expected to be an expert on all liturgical issues but needs to be aware of where to find help and resources needed in the community.

The parish liturgy director does not exercise his/her leadership independently. The nature and dynamic of the liturgy require the parish liturgy director to work very closely with the priest presiders, the liturgy committee, the parish council, musicians and other liturgical ministers, as well as the parish school and religious education program. The parish liturgy director assumes responsibility for maintaining good communication among all who are involved in the preparation and celebration of the liturgy. The parish liturgy director may also be expected to prepare and manage the worship budget in collaboration with the pastor.

The leadership of the liturgy director is not simply administrative. The parish liturgy director ought to be gifted with a love and understanding of the liturgy that enables him/her to create a workable vision for effective worship in the parish. He/she must be able to effectively communicate the basic principles of worship and the liturgical tradition of the church.

The parish liturgy director needs to be a capable leader, able not only to chair a meeting, but to provide firm direction and to motivate others to work diligently and harmoniously. The parish liturgy director must be prepared to deal with conflict situations and the inevitable complaints that arise especially associated with change.

Whether volunteer or salaried the parish liturgy director ought to have a well-defined job description so that the important responsibilities and expectations associated with this position will not be left to chance or be the subject of confusion or misunderstanding.

In many parishes it is not uncommon to find the director of liturgy position combined with the director of liturgical music. When it is necessary that these two offices be exercised by the same individual, especially in a small parish, a well defined job description will be all the more important.

Diocesan Director of Liturgy

The diocesan director of liturgy is appointed by the diocesan bishop whose responsibility it is to be the promoter and guardian of the liturgical life of the diocese (The Church at Prayer: A Holy Temple of the Lord, N.C.C.B., no. 51, p. 26). "Each director should enjoy due freedom in his (her) own ministry, in as much as he (she) has shown himself (herself) worthy of trust by his (her) competence and virtue" (Promoting Liturgical Renewal, Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, N.C.C.B., 1988, p. 8).

The diocesan director of liturgy may or may not be the chairperson of the diocesan liturgical commission. In some dioceses it may be necessary to combine these two roles and appoint one individual to either a part-time or full-time position.

The diocesan director of liturgy oversees the proper implementation of the rites of the church by organizing the necessary catechesis and training for parochial ministers. In most dioceses the director of liturgy will be responsible for coordinating the preparation of diocesan liturgies, especially for those occasions when the bishop presides. The diocesan director of liturgy works closely with the bishop in establishing liturgical and sacramental guidelines and norms for the diocese.

Even in those dioceses where a full time office of worship is not feasible, the director of liturgy ought to be sufficiently trained to assume responsibility for liturgy in the diocese. A thorough understanding of the liturgical tradition and the laws and norms pertaining to the liturgy is necessary, if the diocesan director of liturgy is to competently assist the bishop and provide guidance and education for parochial ministers. In addition to the liturgical competencies required for this position a pastoral sensitivity and effective management skills are highly desirable.

RONALD J. LEWINSKI

LITURGICAL MOVEMENT, THE (1830-1969)

In its broadest meaning, the liturgical movement was the century-long effort made to enrich the appreciation and experience of worship. The liturgical movement requires a broad definition since it lasted from 1830 to 1969, encompassing several countries and passing through various phases that changed its orientation, purpose, and even its participants' perception of its central element.

This broad effort on behalf of worship qualifies as a "movement" in purely social terms, for a movement is a gathering of people focused around a cause, often oriented toward change in the existing pattern of behavior in an organization, an institution, or society at large. This cause generates leaders with a commitment and, often, with charisma, and its sole criterion for its members is a general willingness to embrace the cause. A movement is distinguished from a formal organization, which is characterized by stated goals, an elaborate system of explicit rules and regulations, and a formal status structure with clearly marked lines of communication and authority. Movements follow a cycle beginning with issues, widening into a cause, coming to a climax or confrontation, and being absorbed into a new or existing organization.

It can easily be argued that the liturgical movement that began with Dom Lambert Beauduin met all of these criteria. The liturgical movement is wider than the liturgical reform, which formed only part of the wider movement. The reform of the liturgical rites was carried on in Rome, first by the existing central authorities, then by the bishops of the Second Vatican Council, followed by the newly established committees to implement the conciliar decisions. The liturgical movement, on the other hand, grew from a beginning in Benedictine monasteries, was conducted in countries throughout the world by pastorally oriented persons, and was supported by a specific group of scholars and legislators.

So the liturgical movement and the liturgical reform were deeply affected by one another, but they are quite separate. The history of the liturgical reform can be chronicled in the specific changes that occurred in the rites, e.g., a new approach to music for the liturgy with Tra le sollecitudini in 1903, the revision of the Holy Week ceremonies in 1956 (Maxima Redemptionis), and the reform of the Mass in 1970. The story of the liturgical movement, on the other hand, is told country by country, in the development of its ideas, its leaders, and its meetings.

History

There were four major phases or segments to the movement: the Benedictine or monastic movement, research and scholarship, the pastoral element, and legislation (i.e., liturgical reform). The Benedictine or monastic liturgical movement began with the re-establishment of St. Peter's Monastery at Solesmes, France, by Dom Prosper Guéranger in 1833. It flourished in the foundations influenced by Guéranger's approach, especially the German community at Beuron. Maredsous, a Belgian foundation (1872) from Beuron, Maria Laach, and Mont César (a foundation from Beuron) all contributed, as did St. John's Monastery in Collegeville, Minnesota.

The research or academic aspect of the movement began quietly, first in the study of chant manuscripts at Solesmes and Regensburg for chant book projects (1870). Simultaneously, biblical research and patristic scholarship were developing interest in early periods of Christianity, and several discoveries of early liturgical manuscripts spurred specific writings on the liturgical year and the history of the ritual books. Research centers grew up in France, Germany, and England; and the "jewel" of the academic liturgical movement was Josef Jungmann's Missarum Sollemnia (1948; translated into English as Mass of the Roman Rite 1950, 51).

The pastoral liturgical movement, which had the highest visibility of the four elements, began in Belgium (1909) with Lambert Beauduin, a monk of Maredsous. He directed his efforts to nearby parishes, suggesting educational programs and new ideas about the role of the laity, popularizing some of the academic discoveries, sharing the spiritual enrichment found in monastic liturgical experiences, and eventually even suggesting legislative changes. The pastoral liturgical movement gathered a number of new ideas about the church under its broad umbrella, and almost every country in the world had a taste, at least, of this pastoral movement by the beginning of the Second Vatican Council—some in the form of a beautiful liturgy celebrated at national conferences, others in the form of suggested changes argued before skeptical friends. “Pastoral” meant “popular,” and this widespread aspect of the liturgical movement was carried primarily through word of mouth, experience by experience, by those committed to the effort made to enrich the appreciation and experience of worship.

The legislative elements connected with the liturgical movement are a study in contrast, sometimes supporting the development of liturgical renewal, often resisting it. In 1903, in Tra le sollecitudini, for instance, Pius X called for the active participation of the people: “from the Church’s most important and indispensable source, active participation in the sacred mysteries and in the public and solemn prayer of the Church.” This statement was quoted by Beauduin in 1909 to launch the pastoral side of the movement. Numerous legislative reforms followed slowly, building to an avalanche at Vatican II and giving a specific focus to the liturgical movement. By 1955, legislators were still insecure about widespread participation in the popular liturgical movement, and they were surprised by the call of Pope John XXIII for an ecumenical council, which in its documents and its legislation eventually endorsed the efforts of the monastic, scholarly, and pastoral arms of the liturgical movement.

Stage One: The Beginnings

The Benedictine or Monastic Liturgical Movement. In a conservative reaction to neo-Gallican developments in religion, music, and art, P. Guéranger, O.S.B., re-established the ancient monastery of St. Peter at Solesmes in 1833 and dedicated himself to reinstating the Benedictine monastic tradition. Central to Guéranger’s project were his views that (1) monastic liturgy should center on the Mass, not reflecting current trends in neo-Gallican liturgies, but following the Roman liturgy as he understood it; (2) monastic life should center on the major feasts of the church year, as reflected in his work, L’année liturgique; (3) monastic life should use chant rather than contemporary music, a decision that led the monks of Solesmes to become a central resource for chant research in the 1870s.

While Guéranger’s ideas are at the root of many elements in the liturgical movement, our present vantage point shows us that his positions were frequently undocumented, highly conservative, and often incorrect. Numerous members of the modern liturgical movement wrestled to correct his positions, which had become firmly entrenched in popular understanding.

It was the suppression of the monasteries during the French Revolution (1792) that provided a fertile field in which the new foundation at Solesmes could flourish and spread. From 1833 to 1900, Benedictine foundations, many founded or influenced by Solesmes, carried a version of Guéranger’s vision. Most notable are Beuron, a German parallel to Solesmes founded by Maurus and Placidus Wolter (1863), famous for its art in a pseudo-Romanesque style. Dom Anselm Schott, following a French idea, published the first German-Latin Missal in 1884, the Messbuch der hl. Kirche. The Vesperbuch quickly followed (1893), and each contained numerous explanations taken from Guéranger’s L’année liturgique.

Maredsous was a Belgian foundation (1872) of Beuron financed by the Desclée family. Dom Gerard van Caloen, rector of the abbey school, published the first French-Latin Missal, Missel des fidèles (1882). At the Eucharistic Congress in 1883, he suggested lay participation in the Mass and communion during Mass (radical ideas for which he was removed as school rector). He founded Messenger des fidèles (later to become the Revue Bénédictine), the first publication founded to promote the liturgical movement. Its main contributor, Dom Germain Morin, took on the conservatism of Guéranger. A later abbot of Maredsous (from 1909), the Irish monk, Dom Columba Marmion, proclaimed through various writings a spirituality that was firmly based on the liturgical texts.

Maria Laach, a German foundation in the Rhineland, was taken over from the Jesuits in 1893 by monks from Beuron, who developed the art style they carried from their home abbey. Dom Odo Casel, a monk of Maria Laach, wrote The Mystery of Christian Worship, which was to influence the thinking of the liturgical movement in the first forty years of the 20th century. In theological circles of the day, the sacraments were seen as ceremonial, chiefly rubrical, and mainly the responsibility of canon lawyers, masters of ceremonies, and ritualists. Casel presented the sacraments (Gk: mysterion) as mysteries, internal actions of Christ. While based incorrectly on the hypothesis that sacraments were rooted in Greek mystery cults, this thinking led to theories about the action of Christ in the sacraments offering praise to the Father and, also to the new language that described the church as the mystical body of Christ that acts in the sacraments. Like Guéranger's publications, Casel's work was hotly contested throughout the liturgical movement, being discredited by those opposed to the popular reforms offered by the advocates of the liturgy, and expanded, corrected, and sometimes adamantly defended with a blind faith by members of the liturgical movement.

Mont César, another foundation in Belgium (1899), but this time by monks of Maredsous, was the monastery of L. Beauduin. Members of this monastery included Abbot Bernard Capelle, the cantor Dom Ildephonse Dirkx, and Dom Bernard Botte, who was to found the Institut Supérieur de Liturgie in Paris in 1945.

The Scholarly Liturgical Movement. The cultural backdrop for Beauduin's call for active participation in 1909 reached far beyond the Benedictine phase of the liturgical revival. A characteristic of the liturgical movement in Europe was its foundation in the research of diverse, international scholars which provided deeper views into the history of texts, rites, attitudes, and practices and which eventually served as a scathing critique of contemporary practice, which was often defended blindly by its guardians.

The roots of this scholarly research are in the middle of the 19th century. Between 1860 and 1903, Europe experienced tremendous intellectual activity. In the political arena the freeing of governments from ecclesiastical dominance had two consequences for church thinkers. First, they became subject to challenge by their contemporaries, such as Darwin in evolution, Hume and Hegel in philosophy, the pietists in religion, Marx and Engels in political social thought, and the application of historical criticism (Wellhausen) and the methods of Religionsgeschichte to the Bible, which led to a new understanding of the Bible and the foundation of the biblical movement. Secondly, they were unsure how far they could go in proclaiming their new insights in the face of ecclesiastical reaction to change. Such uncertainty came from new but untested discoveries and from repression and retaliation from ecclesiastical leadership, which ultimately led to the condemnation of a series of propositions incorrectly classed as a unified "Modernist" position.

In this exciting and challenging climate, major historical work on the liturgical documents was done by Louis Duchesne (1843-1922), especially his critical edition of and commentary on the Liber Pontificalis (1877) and Christian Worship, Its Origin and Evolution, and Pierre Battifol (1861-1929), whose History of the Roman Breviary appeared in 1893 and his Leçons sur la Messe in 1913.

The scholarly publications coming from the Abbey of St. Michael, Farnborough, England (founded in 1895), reflected the work of its Prior/ Abbot Dom Fernand Cabrol (1855-1937). This is especially true of his study of the liturgy of Jerusalem in the 4th century based on the Peregrinatio Silviae (discovered by Gamurrini some ten years before), his Introduction aux études liturgiques, and a little popular work, Le Livre de la Prière Antique. On a more comprehensive level are his Monumenta ecclesiae liturgica and the Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, begun in 1903 with Dom Henri Leclercq (1913-45) and finally completed by H. Marrou in 1953. These works reflected the recent rediscovery and publication of the Greek text of the Didache (full title: The Lord's Instruction to the Gentiles through the Twelve Apostles) by Metropolitan Philotheus Bryennios of Constantinople in 1883, as well as the publication of other important early documents: the canons of Hippolytus, the anaphora of Serapion, Bishop of Thmuis, the Testamentum Domini, the Apostolic Constitutions and the Peregrinatio ad Locas Sanctas. In 1905 Dom Cabrol gave a series of lectures at the Institut Catholique in Paris that outlined his method of historical research.

When scholars approached liturgy with the developing tools of strict historical criticism, some big problems arose. First of all there was the question of making these tools acceptable in ecclesiastical circles. Since rationalists and unbelievers not only had made use of them but had developed them, they were immediately suspect. Critical methods were sure to offend cherished beliefs and overthrow legends of long standing. Above all, they might bring about a dangerously critical attitude in young seminarians and even the entire clergy. And as a matter of fact, this did happen.

The Legislators and the Liturgical Movement. In addition to the work of the Benedictines and the scholars, there was a third element in the cultural backdrop to Beauduin's call for a popular liturgical movement, and that was Roman legislation. Woven through the liturgical movement is an undocumented relationship among reformers, promoters, scholars, and legislators. The reformers, promoters, and scholars were Belgian, French, Austrian, and German, while the legislators were Italian (or at least were headquartered at the Vatican). Only now are studies documenting the exchanges among them before 1943; in fact, the legislative reforms seem remarkably random compared to the ideas developed within the rest of the liturgical movement.

The most significant legislation at the end of the 19th century concerned music for the liturgy, while two "sleepers"—pieces of legislation with much larger later consequences—appeared at the beginning of the 20th century. In 1872 Frederick Pustet of Germany obtained from Pope Pius IX permission to publish a comprehensive book of chants, together with a thirty-year exclusive contract forbidding other publishers from producing "official" chant books. The monks of Solesmes reacted with a series of studies indicating the inadequacies of the chant manuscript used as the basis for the Pustet chant book and promoting the "Solesmes Chant" based on more ancient manuscripts. Controversy raged in Europe for the next thirty years over what was "authentic" chant.

Six months after the thirty-year privilege ended, Giuseppe Sarto (Pius X), formerly a seminary choir director, issued a motu proprio (22 November 1903), Tranquillæ sollicitudini. While it did not resolve the chant question, it contained this statement: "As it is indeed our most fervent wish that the true Christian spirit should flourish again in every field and be upheld by all the faithful, we should above all be mindful of the sanctity and dignity of the Church building; for it is there that the faithful meet to draw that same spirit from its most important and indispensable source, active participation in the sacred mysteries and in the public and solemn prayer of the Church" (28).

The "sleepers" legislation concerned the practice of communion, restricted at that time in several ways, especially by frequency and the age of first communicants. Daily communion by the faithful was permitted in Sacra Tridentina Synodus (22 December 1905), and the age for first communion for children was lowered to the "age of reason" (i.e., about seven) in Quam singulari (10 August 1910).

The Popular Liturgical Movement

The European Popular Movement Begins (1909-1917). At the National Congress of Catholic Action held at Malines, Belgium, in 1909, Dom Lambert Beauduin presented an address, "The Full Prayer of the Church," in which he issued a call for the active participation of the people in the work of the church, especially in the liturgy, using a quote from Pius X's motu proprio of 1903 to encourage a lay involvement rooted in the "Church's most important and indispensable source, active participation in the sacred mysteries and in the public and solemn prayer of the Church." Some saw it as a call for democratization of the church's worship.

The unique characteristics of Beauduin's activity were that (1) it called for the active participation of the people; (2) it was popular, based in parochial ministry; (3) it took theoretical ideas and translated them into popular language; (4) it used mass media elements, publications and conferences to gather people and disseminate ideas.

Beauduin was ordained in 1897, and two years later he joined the Aumôniers du Travail, a priests' society for the care of workers. He served as a parish priest for seven years before he became a Benedictine (1906). Now, in addition to his own interests, he had the resources of his abbey at his disposal. He founded La vie liturgique (1909) with the support of Père Joseph Wyns, who collected two hundred subscriptions at the high school in Charleroi, and he was assisted in production by two Benedictine brothers, Antoine Pierard and Landaold de Waeghe. Beauduin published what came to be considered the "manifesto" of the popular liturgical movement, La piété de l'église, in 1914.

To promote his work, Beauduin relied on Louis Duchesne, Fernand Cabrol, Pierre Batiffol, and Pierre de Puniet in France and on Edmund Bishop and Henry Albert Wilson in England.

Public meetings devoted to liturgy began in Holland, with the First Netherlands Congress on Liturgy at Breda (16-17 August 1911), which drew fewer than fifty people. But the next year, the Propaganda Commission of Breda was given episcopal approval to promote the liturgical life in the diocese. A Liturgical Society was formed in the Diocese of Haarlem (1912) and Utrecht (10 February 1913); they formed the Dutch Federation in 1915.

Beauduin's call for the democratization of the liturgy was heard by Abbé (later Canon, then Cardinal) Joseph Cardijn of Laeken, Belgium, who was developing the Young Christian Worker's movement (the Jeunesse Ouvrière Chrétienne or Jocist movement), as a conscious response to strong Marxist activity and appeal among Christian workers in Europe. Active participation in governing (democratization), Cardijn believed, would flow over to active participation in liturgy. The JOC (YCW in English-speaking countries) developed retreat methods that used the sacraments to interrelate with its social goals of involving the working class in the liturgy which was too often seen as a bourgeois activity, with its pomp, courtly dress, and ceremony. Cardijn's involvement showed that the liturgical movement was a social movement, too.

The legislation during this period appears unrelated to the popular movement, but it was clearly influenced by the scholars' discoveries. For instance, Rome published a new arrangement of breviary psalms in 1911 (Divino afflatu) and then reformed it again (1914).

Later, Rome established a Sectio Historica in the Congregation of Rites, whose first purpose was to deal with the canonization of saints, although it was also to "be consulted in connection with reforms, amendments, and new editions of liturgical texts and books."

The growing movement for popular participation in the liturgy gradually began to have an influence in official circles, however. The apostolic constitution on sacred music, Divini cultus (20 December 1928), stated this: "But in order that the faithful shall take a more active part in worship, Gregorian chant (in so far as it is intended for the people) is to be taken back into use by them. And it is absolutely necessary that the faithful should attend the sacred actions, not as outsiders or silent spectators, but thoroughly imbued with the beauty of the liturgy . . . so that they may join their voices to those of priest and choir in accordance with antiphonal rules" (IX).

The beginning date of the popular movement in Germany is often given as 1918, the publication date for the first number of Ecclesia Orans, the well-known collection directed by Dom Ildefons Herwegen, Abbot of Maria Laach, (who was influenced by the scholarly Flemish journal, Liturgisch Tijdschrift, begun by the Benedictines of Affligem, Brabant, in November 1910).

Whatever one makes of the birth date, German activity after 1909 was a mixture of scholarly research and popular questions, both circulated in bold ways through popular journals. At the center of the popular liturgical movement in the German-speaking world were the canons of Klosterneuberg, Austria, especially Pius Parsch and his popular work on the church year. The work of Romano Guardini, The Spirit of the Liturgy and Liturgical Education, written while he was still a university student (1908-10), contained the influences of the liturgy celebrated at Beuron and during his Tübingen studies.

Scholarship and the popular movement continued to have repercussions in the legislative realm. On 4 August 1922 Rome issued a decree on the value of the dialogue Mass, and on 9 December 1925, one on the form of vestments.

The American Popular Movement Begins: The Era of Virgil Michel (1926-1939). The event that began the popular liturgical movement in the United States is clear: Dom Virgil Michel, a thirty-three-year-old monk of St. John's Abbey in Collegeville, Minnesota, spent nineteen months (February 1924—August 1925) in Europe, visiting the Benedictine monasteries and L. Beauduin, who was then professor of fundamental theology (1921-1925) at the Benedictine College in Rome. From Solesmes he learned about the chant revival; from Maredsous, publishing; from Mont César, the popular movement. And most especially from Beauduin, his fellow Benedictine, he learned method and content. Beauduin had mastered a style of writing, teaching, and publishing that emphasized clarity and mass communication.

This nine-month visit changed Dom Virgil Michel and, quite literally, the face of American Catholicism. On Michel's return to St. John's, Abbot Alcuin Deutsch supported the beginnings of an American liturgical movement by authorizing the foundation of the magazine Orate Fratres (later Worship) and the Liturgical Press, which began publishing

The Popular Liturgical Library, a series of pamphlets and short treatments of elements connected with the liturgy. Its first major work was the English version of Beauduin's only book, La piété de l'église. From 1926 to 1930 the Press was directly under the control of Dom Virgil Michel. Between 1930 and his death in 1938, a number of events occurred that gave a particular shape to the early stages of the liturgical movement in the United States.

First, Michel experienced a breakdown and was sent to recuperate in northern Minnesota, serving the Native Americans there from 1930 to 1933. The stock market crash of 1929 and the subsequent Great Depression left more than ten million workers unemployed in the United States. When Michel returned to reassume the leadership of the liturgical apostolate in 1933, he was deeply committed to wrestling with the results of the Depression. As in Europe with Beauduin, whose movement took root as part of the Catholic reaction to Marx through the Catholic Worker Movement, so in the United States, Michel recognized that the liturgical movement could not be separated from the social issues created by industrialized society, and especially that the concerns of the worker could not be separated from the celebration of liturgy in the modern world.

Michel's work was shared by many collaborators, but perhaps his strongest influence outside the circles of the liturgical movement was in the burgeoning catechetical revival. One of those catechetical collaborators was Sr. Jane Marie Murray, O.P., who first met Michel in a visit to Collegeville in 1929. With other members of her order at that Liturgical Summer School, she wrote five laboratory manuals for grades three through twelve, With Mother Church. Combining her interest in liturgy with the available results of the biblical, theological, and social action movements, she became the sole author or a major collaborator in The Christ Life Series, The Christian Religion Series, and The Christian Life Series, all major ways that the popular liturgical movement was introduced into Catholic schools and other education programs.

The editorials in Orate Fratres and the publications coming from the Liturgical Press in the years between 1933 and 1938 were dominated by Michel's twin focus on liturgy and social reform and by the drive to popularize these twin ideas. Virgil Michel died rather suddenly in 1938, and he was replaced by Dom Godfrey Diekmann as the editor of the magazine, which was soon retitled Worship, and as director of the Liturgical Press.

In 1927, a small group of Roman Catholic laymen, fledgling artists, architects, and draftsmen from the Boston and New York areas gathered for a retreat. From this meeting was born the Liturgical Arts Society (1928-1972) and its publication, Liturgical Arts magazine. The two became indistinguishable under the remarkable leadership of Maurice Lavanoux. He proposed the best of the old—honesty in materials and simplicity in design—as well as a call for the new—that the modern church must find its religious expression in contemporary art forms.

Stage Two: The Movement Widens (1934-1945)

Liturgical Conflicts in Germany (1934-1942). Even though the Great Depression spread from the U.S. to Europe, sometimes with an impact even greater than in the United States, interest in the liturgy remained high. Perhaps because of a heightened intensity of thought in reaction to the rise of the Nazis in Germany and German rearmament, popular journals such as Liturgisches Leben, begun in 1934 under the editorship of J. Pinski, the Berlin students' chaplain, began asking more provocative questions about the role of liturgy and popular participation. Throughout the course of the liturgical movement there were a number of conflicts, battles, and disagreements between supporters of the movement and those representing the contemporary practice of the institutional church. Not every one of these battles can be narrated, but it is important for any student of the liturgical movement to understand that almost every change in the liturgy, no matter how small or insignificant, occurred in the midst of controversy, risk taking, and sometimes loss of position and prestige in the very institution that those persons served.

One of the earliest examples of such conflict occurred in Germany between 1939 and 1943, at the height of Germany's military power in Europe. In reaction to the articles appearing in Liturgisches Leben, M. Kassiepe, O.M.I., published the sensational book Irrwege und Umwege im Frömmigkeitsleben der Gegenwart, strongly attacking the liturgical movement. In reaction, the bishop of Passau established a Liturgical Working Party, whose members included J. Jungmann, R. Guardini, H. V. Meurens, and H. Kahlefeld. The controversy escalated to the entire German hierarchy, and two bishops, Landesdorfer and Stohr of Mainz, were asked to take a referendum of the bishops at their upcoming meeting in Fulda (1942). The two bishops established a Liturgical Commission composed of the Liturgical Working Party members together with representatives from Maria Laach, Beuron, and the oratories of Leipzig and Klosterneuburg. This Liturgical Commission provided a vehicle for communication among the leading members of the German liturgical movement and a common front against attacks on the movement.

Those opposed to the movement continued to react to representatives of the movement, however. J. Doerner's book

Sentire cum Ecclesia led Archbishop C. Gröber of Freiburg im Breisgau to write an open letter to the German hierarchy on the study of theology, the ecumenical movement, biblical interpretation, and the liturgical movement, reproaching the latter for taking matters into its own hands. At the 1942 bishops' meeting in Fulda, guidelines on the liturgical form of parochial worship were approved and published, based on the results of the liturgical referendum among the bishops.

The next year (1943) was quite significant for developments in the liturgical movement. In Germany, Cardinal Bertram, Archbishop of Breslau, sent a report to Rome about the German liturgical movement that asked for several privileges for German Catholics, including the reform of the ritual, the breviary, and other liturgical books (10 April 1943). Cardinal Maglione, Vatican Secretary of State, approved the form of the Gemeinschaftsmesse (community Mass) and announced that the Holy See "sympathetically tolerates" the Deutsches Hochamt (sung Mass) which included the singing of hymns in the vernacular contrary to the rubrics (24 December 1943).

Despite the devastation of war, other events continued to support the developing liturgical movement. In 1943 the Centre de Pastorale Liturgique (CPL) was established in occupied Paris under A.-M. Roguet, O.P., and Pie Duploye, O.P. This center, which became a hive of activity, was an independent foundation, i.e., not subject to the bishops, though entertaining close relations with the hierarchy. Two years later, after the liberation, La Maison-Dieu began publication.

In that same year in Rome, the encyclicals Mystici Corporis (29 June 1943), on the church and liturgy, and Divino Afflante Spiritu (30 September 1943), on the study of Scripture, were issued. During this same time (1939-45), Jungmann was in Vienna, writing what was to be a major instrument of the liturgical movement, the massive Missarum Sollemnia, published in 1948 (and quickly translated into English by Francis X. Brunner as the Mass of the Roman Rite, later to be condensed by Jungmann's student, C. Riepe, from two volumes to one).

Liturgical Weeks in the United States. Following the death of Virgil Michel (1938), a series of annual gatherings was held every year from 1940 to 1969. Known as "Liturgical Weeks," they were sponsored first by the Benedictine Liturgical Conference and after 1943 by The Liturgical Conference. The history of the liturgical movement in the United States is certainly dominated by the activity surrounding these National Liturgical Weeks. They served (1) to gather and support the leadership of the U.S. liturgical movement (which from 1940 to 1957 consisted of about three hundred persons); (2) to provide a forum for exchanging ideas and information with those who had contact with activities in Europe, challenging the leadership to become progressively bolder in its vision of what the liturgical movement could become; (3) to provide a support base for change, especially encouraging those who were meeting strong opposition from ecclesiastical leadership by allowing them an opportunity to gather with others who "thought the way they did"; (4) to educate those in attendance from the local diocese in which the conference was held (between eight hundred and fifteen hundred people from the local area participated in one way or another in each Liturgical Week); (5) to provide concrete experiences and models of how the liturgy could be celebrated within the existing rubrics; and (6) to bring together current thinking about a specific topic or theme.

From its beginning the leaders of the U.S. liturgical movement were characterized by their desire to apply the liturgy to a pastoral setting. Most of them were pastors seeking ways for their parishioners to pray. They thus stood in contrast to the leaders of the European movement, who were more scholarly in their approach and who used their meetings to exchange new directions for research, insight, and comparative study. Few Americans contributed original research in liturgy; but the eventual reform of the liturgy suffered from not including more information that the Americans had learned from their practical experience.

A group of pioneers met in Chicago under the patronage of Archbishop (later Cardinal) Samuel Stritch in the Holy Name Cathedral School for the first Liturgical Week (21-25 October 1940). The topics of the addresses were the parish, parish worship, the Mass, the Divine Office, devotions, and artistic expression. In attendance were 1,260 persons (863 of them from Illinois). News coverage of the event was light: the word "liturgy" was not too familiar in American Catholic circles. The idea of a Liturgical Week in the United States germinated in the previous autumn (1939) at the Catechetical Congress in Cincinnati, when the section on liturgy quite spontaneously and unexpectedly outgrew the space allotted to it. Pioneer planners Revs. Ducey, Diekmann, Laukemper, and Huelsmann, with Msgrs. Morrison, Hellriegel, Busch, and Hillenbrand responded to this interest by forming a conference and planning a special week devoted to liturgy.

After the success of that first week, Liturgical Weeks were held even though the nation was at war (1941-1945). The next two weeks kept to "generic" themes, covering various aspects of liturgy. In St. Paul, Minnesota (6-10 October 1941), 1,345 people attended (918 of them from Minnesota), with similar numbers in attendance at St. Meinrad, Indiana (12-16 October 1942). It was not until the 1943 Week at St. Procopius Abbey in Lisle, Illinois, that a central topic or theme for each week began to emerge. That year the topic reflected the shortages of the wartime economy: the meaning of sacrifice, sacrifice and the individual, sacrifice and society. In New York in 1944 the topic "Liturgy and Catholic Life" attracted 1,212 attendees (997 from New York and New Jersey), while "Catholic Liturgy in Peace and Reconstruction" drew 1,344 people (1,232 "locals") to New Orleans (11-13 December 1945). Although the coming of peace made national conventions easier, subsequent Liturgical Weeks did not draw large national crowds; the majority in attendance were from the city in which the meeting was held.

*Stage Three: Postwar Activity
(1945-1950)*

Postwar Europe (1945-1950). Because of World War II (1939-1945), liturgical congresses in Europe had ceased, with the exception of a small congress in Varnes (January 1944) to study the liturgy. But immediately after the war, the First French National Liturgical Congress was held at Saint Flour with the theme "La Messe paroissiale du Dimanche" ("The Sunday Parish Mass"). Those involved in the liturgical movement were keenly aware that great strides had been made in the scholarly world, and they wanted to get in touch with one another. Due to wartime limitations on communication and the uncertain ecclesiastical climate about liturgical reform, insights and discoveries that were being made were not being communicated in writing, but by more or less "back room" meetings. This atmosphere added tremendously to the intensity of such meetings, their importance, and the trust level built among the leaders.

In August 1946 a Liturgical Congress at Maastricht, Holland, brought Dutch- and French-speaking participants together around the topic, "What is the problem of the popular liturgy?" Among the participants were Pères Duploye, Roguet, and Doncoeur, S.J.

Soon after this, the first permanent national "hub" of liturgical activity was founded in Germany, with the establishment of a chair of liturgy in the theology faculty of the University of Trier, with B. Fischer as its first occupant. Soon afterward (14 May 1947) the Liturgical Institute of Trier was founded with J. Wagner, Secretary of the Liturgical Commission, as Director. The Herwegen Institute for the Promotion of Liturgical Studies at Maria Laach soon followed, and on 31 January 1948 it commenced publication of the Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft. Three years later, the Liturgical Institute in Trier began publishing Liturgisches Jahrbuch.

In the area of liturgical architecture, the Liturgical Committee in Germany issued instructions on the building of churches (January 1949), reflecting the fact that postwar Germany provided many opportunities for creative renovation, not only in the use of modern design, but also in a more fundamental rethinking of the basic arrangement of liturgical space. This rethinking progressed from locating the altar in the center of worship space, to removing the reserved Blessed Sacrament first from the main altar and then from the worship space, to relocating the baptismal font, and finally to a refocusing of the liturgical action from the altar to the assembled worshippers. Many experimental steps in this process were taken early in the restored and rebuilt churches of Germany.

Legislation after the War. Beginning in 1947, Rome began to take charge of the liturgical movement's direction. On 18 September 1947, Pius XII gave an introductory talk on the liturgical movement, the first time that a "movement" was officially recognized by the legislators. Shortly thereafter the encyclical letter Mediator Dei was issued (20 November 1947), called by those in the movement the "Magna Carta" of the liturgical movement. Between 1909 and 1947, the leadership of the liturgical movement had their own sense of the rightness of their cause, but they had no official recognition that the desire to improve liturgical celebration was acceptable. While Pius XII's encyclical had sharp directives about abuses and excesses in liturgical change as well as praise for the positive elements of the liturgical movement as they were perceived by the legislators (a truly political document), it was the first encyclical letter devoted entirely to the liturgy. More importantly, Mediator Dei inaugurated the period of actual changes in the liturgy. No longer was the liturgical movement simply about education; it was now refocusing on change.

The Belgian, and to a lesser extent the French, bishops began petitioning Rome for liturgical changes. Remarkably, the American bishops remained aloof from the liturgical movement's activity in the United States and seemed totally unaware of the presence of a movement now influencing the hierarchies of France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Germany.

Belgium was given permission to have evening Mass on Sundays and holydays for those unable to attend in the morning, originally for one year (28 January 1947). The Diocese of Bayonne (France) was given permission to recite the complete psalm at the introit (29 January 1947), and a translation of the Rituale Romanum was approved for a Latin-French edition of the ritual (28 November 1947). Meanwhile, the Diocese of Liège (Belgium) was authorized to use a bilingual ritual (22 October 1948).

With the news of a new openness in Rome, requests for liturgical changes began to come from other parts of the world. The bishops of Japan were given permission to authorize evening Masses under certain conditions (11 March 1948), and in Poland some priests were given permission to celebrate daily evening

Masses (15 August 1948). The Holy Office authorized the translation of the Missale Romanum into Mandarin Chinese, except for the canon of the Mass, but no practical use could be made of this faculty (12 April 1949). India was given permission for evening Masses and a reduction in the eucharistic fast (17 June 1949), while the church in Holland was granted permission to use the Little Breviary, an abbreviated form of the Divine Office (21 February 1950). The Italian legislators (the Curia) were led by G. Lercaro, who served as secretary of state, A. Bugnini, G. Montini (later, Paul VI), and assisted by the Italian liturgist, C. Vagaggini.

Postwar Liturgical Weeks (1946-1956). For ten years, the themes and structure of the National Liturgical Weeks in the United States fell into a pattern: topics were selected based on the events in Rome or the current needs of the planners. Total attendance ebbed and flowed, largely depending on the local area's support (attendance ranged from a low of 1,244 in Denver in 1946 and 1,247 in London, Ontario, in 1956 to a high of 4,399 at St. Louis in 1949, with 3,688 of those people coming from Missouri). Those committed few who traveled to the Liturgical Week each year from outside the area ranged from 114 to 425. The picture is clear: there was a small core group learning from each other and sharing what they knew and believed with those who came from the local church. Each year, the ideas of the liturgical leadership spread, but almost by one diocese at a time.

A list of the themes of these Liturgical Weeks and the cities in which they were held is a helpful reminder of the topics of liturgical interest and the places such interest was being generated. (Some of those cities remain centers of liturgical development today.) "The Family in Christ" was the focus in Denver, Colorado (14-17 October 1946); while the Week in Portland, Oregon, (18-21 August 1947) concentrated on "Christ's Sacrifice and Ours" (this was the first Week in which an art exhibit was held; it was under the direction of Mrs. R. W. Prentis of Portland). In 1948 (2-6 August) the participants at Boston, Massachusetts, focused on "The New Man in Christ," while the Week in St. Louis (22-26 August 1949) looked at the "Sanctification of Sunday." The 1950 Week (21-24 August) was "For Pastors and People" at Conception Abbey, Missouri; and "The Priesthood of Christ" was the focus in Dubuque, Iowa (20-23 August 1951). (The line art that became identified with the liturgical renewal first appeared in the Proceedings for this week, drawn by Carl William Merschel of Chicago.) Popular education continued under the direction of Gerald Ellard, H. A. Reinhold, Mary Perkins Ryan, Anselm Scholz, and Michael Mathis.

In the summer of 1947, on the campus of the University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Indiana, Michael Mathis began "The Liturgy Program," a summer program for undergraduate students, with three courses: "The History of the Liturgy," "Some Aspects of the Liturgy," and "Gregorian Chant." The "Aspects" course was pastoral and practical, taught by the leaders of the liturgical movement. G. Diekmann presented "The Christian Way of Life: The Sacramental Way"; W. Nutting talked about how "A Layman Looks at the Liturgy"; H. A. Reinhold described "Ecclesiastical Places: Churches and Cemeteries"; R. Hillenbrand discussed "The Place of the Liturgy in Catholic Action;" while B. Laukemper described "Stational Church and Latin Masses." Bede Scholz presented "The Ecclesiastical Year"; Damasus Winzen, "The Scriptural Background of the Ecclesiastical Year"; and Gerald Ellard, "Aims and Objects of the Liturgical Movement."

By 1951 the Notre Dame Program had expanded to include the European liturgical leaders: Donald Attwater, Cornelius Bouman, Louis Bouyer, Patrick Cummins, Jean Daniélou, Balthasar Fischer, Joseph Goldbrunner, Pierre-Marie Gy, Martin Hellriegel, Johannes Hofinger, Josef Jungmann, Boniface Luykx, Christine Mohrmann, Herman Schmidt, and Ermin Vitry. Books derived from this summer school influenced American thought; among them were Louis Bouyer's Liturgical Piety and Rite and Man, Josef Jungmann's The Early Liturgy, and Jean Daniélou's The Bible and the Liturgy.

Bolstered by the activity in Rome, the 1947 Liturgical Week petitioned Rome for an English translation of the Collectio Rituum. While this resolution was brought before the American bishops and discussed briefly at their annual meeting in 1950, it was not until 1951 (after a German-language ritual had been approved by Rome) that the bishops approved the formation of a committee to study the feasibility of such a request on behalf of the American church. A first committee headed by Gerald Ellard was replaced by a committee headed by Michael Mathis, with committee members Joseph Garvin, Chester A. Soleta, Dr. John Julian Ryan, and Mary Perkins Ryan. By June 1953 the committee had completed the translation, except for the marriage exhortation (later done by Louis Bouyer), and the musical notation (later composed by Ermin Vitry but never used). The new ritual was approved for use in the United States on 2 June 1954.

Stage Four: The Liturgical Movement in Action (1950-1959)

At the First German National Liturgical Congress (June 1950) the topic was Die Eucharistiefeier am Sonntag (The Sunday Celebration of the Eucharist). This Congress was organized by the Trier Liturgical Institute, Fischer and Wagner. Particularly important was R. Guardini's talk on the Easter vigil, for it resulted in the Congress's adoption of the resolution:

"That the bishops be asked to petition Rome for the transfer of the Holy Saturday celebration to the evening or night." On 2 November 1950 the bishops of Germany, France, and Austria formally petitioned the Holy Father to move the celebration of Holy Saturday to the evening.

Rome responded with much more than they had asked. The Ordo Sabbati Sancti, issued 9 February 1951, provided a restored Easter vigil (ad experimentum), and the liturgical movement was now fully engaged in liturgical reform.

As a result of their success with the initial Easter vigil revision, European liturgists now saw liturgical study weeks as essential to get the best thinking together internationally. So in 1951 (12-15 July), the First International Liturgical Study Week was held at Maria Laach, this time jointly sponsored by the Liturgical Institute at Trier and the French C.P.L. with the theme "Problems of the Roman Missal." About thirty persons attended from Germany, France, Belgium, Austria, Holland, and Switzerland.

The Second International Study Meeting (20-24 October 1952) was held at Mont Saint Odile with the theme "Modern Man and the Liturgy." The discussions centered around the progress taking place in society's understanding of itself and the changes needed to bring the liturgy in line with those developments. Many ideas discussed here were to reappear in the Vatican Council's Constitution Gaudium et Spes (The Church in the Modern World).

In the midst of these weeks, the legislators were at work responding, at times, to earlier points raised by the scholars. In 1952, for instance, the Roman legislators produced Christus Dominus, an apostolic constitution that extended permission for evening Masses and revised the eucharistic fast for the whole church. And on 30 June 1952 the Holy Office published a directive on sacred art.

In 1953 the Third International Study Week (13-18 September) was held in northern Italy (Lugano), in an attempt to include the Italians as well as the French, German, Dutch, and Austrian scholars. Two months before the meeting, Bishop A. Bernareggi of Bergamo, head of the liturgical movement in Italy, died, to be succeeded by Bishop Rossi of Biella. The Lugano Week was attended by two cardinals and sixteen European bishops, as well as by Père Antonelli, O.F.M., relator generalis of the Historical Section of the Congregation of Rites. Johannes Hofinger, S.J., a missionary from the Philippines, presented a major address on "Mission and Liturgy," and proposals sent to Rome included (1) the extension of the reform of the Holy Saturday liturgy to the whole of Holy Week, (2) permission for the general introduction of the Deutsches Hochamt (with congregational singing in the local vernacular), (3) readings in the vernacular, and (4) further stimulation of active participation.

On 12-14 September 1954 the Fourth International Study Week met at Mont César (Louvain) with the theme: "Pericope System and Concelebration." No resolutions were made, as some of the points appeared to have been insufficiently studied. Speakers on the pericope question included B. Botte, Chavasse, H. Kahlefeld, and J. Hofinger; on the topic of concelebration: Raes, Franquesa, O.S.B. (Montserrat), Jungmann, Martimort, K. Rahner, S.J., and C. Davis.

As a result of the unsatisfactory scholarly work at this meeting and especially because of opening the "hot" topic of concelebration, planners felt that the annual meetings were forcing topics too quickly. A decision was made to hold national congresses on the odd year, and when the members reconvened the power and impact of their meeting was a surprise even to them. The liturgical movement as a reformer was in full swing.

Pius XII's encyclical on sacred music,

Musicae sacrae disciplina was issued on 25 December 1955. While it followed the pattern set by Pius X and XI, it reflected the presence of a little more "give" among the legislators, at least in its relaxation of restrictions on the use of orchestral instruments and the performance of some religious compositions at non-liturgical services and its approval of the use of vernacular hymns during the eucharistic liturgy, where such has been the practice "according to old or immemorial custom" (47).

Meanwhile, the National Liturgical Weeks continued in the United States. While the European Study Weeks were restricted in attendance and provided a scholarly exchange, the liturgical weeks in the United States were open to all interested parties and were popular in their presentations. Still, the American leaders were anxious to keep in touch with the latest developments in Europe, as was shown dramatically in 1952, when the theme of the liturgical week in Cleveland, Ohio, was "The Easter Vigil." The presentations explained the new rites, and this began a new approach to the liturgical weeks. While the American leaders did not directly influence the changes themselves, they were quick to popularize the ideas and put them into practice. This difference between the Americans as practitioners and the French and Germans as theoreticians characterized their different approaches to the liturgy.

Additional American weeks during this period treated "St. Pius X and Social Worship" (Grand Rapids, Michigan, 1953) and "Mary in the Liturgy" (16-19 August 1954, Milwaukee, Wisconsin). The National Liturgical Weeks in 1955 and 1956 focused on the ritual changes being requested by the European scholars and approved by the Roman legislators: "The New Ritual: Liturgy and Social Order," 22-25 August 1955 in Worcester, Massachusetts, and "People's Participation and Holy Week" at London, Ontario, 20-23 August 1956. The hard work of organizing these weeks was shouldered by a team of priests: Revs. Carroll, Wilmes, O'Connell, S. Sheehan, Randolph, W. Leonard, and E. Walsh, to name the central organizers.

By 1956 it was clear to the leaders of the European liturgical movement that a bolder move was needed. At the Fifth International Study Week in September of that year, the topic was "The Breviary," and the list of speakers included J. Pascher, Augustine Bea, and Jungmann. But more important was the decision to go international and popular and move the event closer to Rome, in Assisi. So held in conjunction with this study week was the First International Congress for Pastoral-Liturgical Guidance, to survey the achievements during the pontificate of Pius XII. Speakers included Bea and van Bekkum. Among those present were six cardinals, eighty bishops, and 1,200 participants from all over the world. The President of the Congress was the Prefect of the Congregation of Rites, Gaetano Cardinal Cicognani. The event became known as "the Assisi Congress."

Without question this was a turning point for the liturgical movement. Now politics was in full swing, the issues of reform were crystallized, and those involved in renewal sensed the sweet taste of reform. They wanted deeper changes.

Even before the Germans held their Third National Congress at Strasbourg on the theme "Bible and Liturgy" (July 1957), with massive popular participation, Rome began to react to the pressure by issuing a series of monita (warnings) against any highhanded introduction of new practices in the liturgy (14 February 1957), on delaying baptism (18 February), and against omitting the words mysterium fidei at the consecration of the elements (24 July). At the same time, some concessions were appearing, e.g., permission for the readings and hymns to be in the vernacular during Holy Week in India and a definition of "active participation" in the Instruction from the Congregation of Rites on Sacred Music and the Sacred Liturgy (3 September 1958). But the restrictive attitude was also present. The view that liturgy is celebrated only by the clergy and liturgy is only that which is written in the Roman Books, together with the detailed control of liturgical innovation, indicated that tensions between the legislators and the leaders of the liturgical movement were clear and open, and almost everyone in the church felt the tension. Church people were being forced to take sides, "for" the liturgy or "against" it. Change was afoot; but change had not yet been authorized.

In 1958 the Sixth International Study Week (8-13 September) was held at Montserrat, Catalonia, Spain, with the theme "Baptism and Confirmation." Shortly after this study week events outside the movement began to affect it. Pius XII died on 9 October 1958, and Pope John XXIII, his successor and a long-time friend of L. Beauduin, announced his intent to summon the Second Vatican Council just over three months later (25 January 1959).

The monita ceased, and Japan was given approval for a bilingual ritual (December 1958). Other relaxations of tensions and promulgation of new permissions quickly followed. The Sacred Congregation of Rites settled what had become a controverted question: whether it was, in fact, permissible to sing hymns in German at the Deutsches Hochamt, and it issued a decree that, in certain cases, the "prayers after Mass" might be omitted (9 March 1960). Further, the Congregation agreed that communion in the afternoon outside of Mass was permissible in certain cases, and published a reordering of the rubrics and a revision of the second part of the Pontificale Romanum (13 April 1960). No doubt this flurry of activity by the Congregation of Rites was an attempt to assert control, for simultaneously with these actions the members of the preparatory liturgical commission for the Second Vatican Council were being appointed (5 June 1960).

Interest in the liturgical movement continued to spread and grow. In Holland, for instance, an interdiocesan Liturgical Secretariat was opened in Nijmegen (17 February 1959), while the fiftieth anniversary of the Belgian Liturgical Movement was celebrated (23 July 1959), and a great International Congress was assembled in Nijmegen-Uden with the theme "Mission and Liturgy." Just months after these events, the man who began the popular liturgical movement, Dom Lambert Beauduin, died (11 January 1960). In that same year, the Seventh International Liturgical Study Week added a new focus to liturgical study with a concentration on the Eastern as well as the Western churches. The theme of this week, held in Germany, was "The Eucharistic Celebration in the East and West."

The Impact of the Liturgical Movement on the Second Vatican Council

Like several other movements of the time—the biblical revival, renewal of patristic studies, growth of the "social gospel" movement—the liturgical movement began and grew because (1) there was a need in the church to re-examine the liturgy, (2) there was a climate in the secular community for change, (3) new discoveries from historical studies revealed the inadequacies of existing understanding and practices, and (4) there were leaders willing to take on the project of exploring the new ideas and exposing them to a wider public. Some of the ideas were explosive, not because the leaders chose them to be, but because when the new idea discovered from history was compared with present practice, it became apparent that present practice was "out of sync" with the tradition. There were only two options: ignore the historical data or call for change in the present practice.

The early leaders of the liturgical movement certainly were not interested in change or confrontation. It is clear that their intentions were simply to explore, in a rather scientific, scholarly, or even abstract manner, the liturgy of the Roman Catholic church. There is no way to date precisely when the change-over from scholarly reflection to political action occurred, for it was a gradual awakening, developing differently in different leaders. Some leaders, when they recognized the need for change, either ignored it or left the movement. Others downplayed the need for change and continued on with what they believed was the central activity of the liturgical movement, namely, developing and communicating a deeper understanding and appreciation of the liturgy as it then existed. But to some, it became obvious that change was needed. The same thing was happening in other areas of scholarly research and in other aspects of church life. And that converging awareness among various leaders was not lost on the new pope. So John XXIII called for a new ecumenical council.

Many, but not all, of the contemporary leaders of the liturgical movement were connected in one way or another to the various committees and advisory groups preparing for and assisting the decision makers of the council. But certainly the reform mandated by the Council Fathers in the Constitution on the Liturgy and overseen by the more important implementation committees was deeply influenced by the work and words of the leaders of the liturgical movement. The Catholic church has been changed radically because of the ideas and intellectual effort of about four hundred persons working over about a century, many of them active at the time of the council and the post-conciliar reform.

A partial list of the key players in the liturgical renewal mandated by Vatican II would include Godfrey Diekmann, O.S.B. (St. John's Abbey, Collegeville, Minnesota); Balthasar Fischer (Trier, West Germany); Adalberto Franquesa, O.S.B. (Montserrat, Spain); Joseph Gelineau, S.J. (Paris, France); Anton Hänggi (Fribourg, Switzerland); Bishop Denis Hurley (Durban, Union of South Africa); Josef A. Jungmann, S.J. (Innsbruck, Austria); Thierry Maertens, O.S.B. (St. Andrieu, Belgium); Juan Mateos, S.J. (Rome, Italy); Fredrick McManus (Washington, D.C.); Cipriano Vagaggini, O.S.B. (Bologna, Italy); Cyrille Vogel (Strasbourg, France); Johannes Wagner (Trier, West Germany); and Helmut Hücke (Neu Isenburg, West Germany).

The Final American Liturgical Weeks (1957-1969)

A Growing Phenomenon (1957-1964).

Several of the most important American leaders had attended the Assisi Congress in 1956. They returned to the United States certain that a popular liturgical movement was no longer merely a speculative possibility, but a burgeoning reality tied to the leadership in Europe and even in Rome. This certainty was a morale booster after the low attendance at the National Liturgical Week in London, Ontario, in 1956 (1,247 people). The next year the Liturgical Week returned to St John's Abbey, Collegeville, Minnesota, home of the American liturgical movement. Its theme was "Education and Liturgy," and something dramatic happened in attendance. 2,241 people were present—not the largest Week by any means, but for the first time, more than half of them (1,142) were from out of state (in the previous year, only 425 were from out of state). From this Week on, large numbers from all across the United States began gathering on a regular basis in the last weeks of August for an annual liturgical meeting.

Great news keeps coming from Rome: an Easter vigil restored, a new order for Holy Week, a ritual in English. The Liturgical Conference incorporated as a nonprofit organization, with John B. Mannion as executive director and Frederick McManus as president. A national campaign of writing and speaking sponsored by the Liturgical Conference to explain and enlist interest in the changes in the liturgy began.

The influence of the liturgical movement was felt in other areas of church life. For instance, Gerard Sloyan, one of the key leaders of the Liturgical Conference, revised the Department of Religious Education at The Catholic University of America to train catechists. His own involvement in liturgy as well as his interest in the biblical renewal was shared with students eager to learn theology in English. Frequently, seminarians who were using manuals in Latin reflecting dogmatic statements gravitated to the more dynamic "new" methods. An entire generation of catechists and clergy was trained in the best theology available before the council.

A climate of change began to influence even the most conservative aspect of the liturgical movement—the musicians. From the time of Tra le sollecitudini in 1903 through the 1950s the musical aspect of the movement focused mainly on a recovery of Gregorian chant and polyphony. But under the influence of two key people—Joseph Gelineau, S.J., in France and Rembert Weakland, O.S.B., in the United States—that focus began to shift. It was their influence, primarily, that shifted musicians to a consideration of contemporary culture and music as sources for liturgical music. Rather than a recovery of one period from the past, they maintained, a renewal of church music should be concerned about a recovery of the present, rooted in the whole history of sacred music. Few formally trained composers took up the challenge; a notable exception was C. Alexander Peloquin.

Events began to cluster around the National Liturgical Weeks. At the National Week in 1958 (18-21 August), in the midst of talks about "The Church Year," the new Cathedral of St. Peter in Chains was inaugurated in Cincinnati, Ohio. The next year (23-26 August 1959), on the campus of the University of Notre Dame, Andrew Greeley chose to address the main topic, "Participation in the Mass," without wearing a Roman collar and caused a sensation. In Pittsburgh (22-25 August 1960), on the theme "The Liturgy and Unity in Christ," Bishop Wright gave a stirring talk entitled "Sperabamur, We Used to Hope."

The Liturgical Week had become a national event, a gathering point particularly for the liberal hopes of those interested in church matters. The Conference took the bold step of opening a central office in Washington, where F. McManus, G. Sloyan, and J. Mannion directed a huge service of information, publication, and organization.

Other movements began to have an impact on the liturgical movement, as reflected in the topics of the next few Weeks. 1961 (Oklahoma City) saw a focus on the biblical renewal: "Bible, Life, and Worship," while the 1962 Week in Seattle, Washington, reflected an interest in eschatology, hope, modernity, and the future: "Thy Kingdom Come: Christian Hope in the Modern World." 1963 brought together the catechetical and liturgical revivals in the topic, "The Renewal of Christian Education" (Philadelphia).

The years between 1963 and 1965 saw all focus shift to events in Rome and to the impact of Vatican II on the American church. In 1964 the Liturgical Week was titled "The Challenge of the Council: Person, Parish, World." More than 20,000 persons gathered in St. Louis, Missouri, and heard Clarence Jos. Rivers sing a "catholic" song derived from the African-American gospel tradition: "God is Love." In that year, it can be said, the liturgical renewal was born, but the liturgical movement began to die. In the full tide of renewal after the promulgation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (4 December 1963), the Weeks grew almost unbelievably large and became an expression of many hopes and expectations. One could see assembled scripture scholars, professors of theology, parish priests, dedicated lay people, seminarians, urban planners, teachers, military chaplains, and always the eager and loyal religious sisters and brothers.

The Largest Liturgical Week (1965) and the Time of Confrontation (1966-69). During the period immediately after the Vatican Council, the Liturgical Weeks continued; indeed they had become so large that the leadership decided to split the one Week into three in 1965. Under the topic "Jesus Christ Reforms His Church," three sites were chosen: Baltimore, Maryland (2,717 in attendance), Portland, Oregon (3,054 attending), and the largest of the three in Chicago, Illinois (attendance of 5,637).

But now the board of directors of The Liturgical Conference faced a major dilemma. For the past twenty years, the leadership of the Conference had been "on the cutting edge," confronting the system, struggling against hope that change might come; such is the nature of a "movement." But when the bishops of the Second Vatican Council endorsed about 95 percent of everything the leadership had sought, then the leadership had to choose between two directions—either serve as an educational force to promote the renewal that it had been part of, or continue to search for the "cutting edge" issues of change. A major disagreement occurred among The Liturgical Conference's directors, and half of the board (led by David McManus, William Baroody, Stephen McNierney) resigned. The remaining leadership chose to address the volatile issues of the late 1960s as the liturgical movement's new agenda: the secular city, the Vietnam War, and anti-institutionalism. These were the main topics of the next few Liturgical Weeks: "Worship in the City of Man" in Houston, Texas (22-25 August 1966); "Experiments in Community," 22-24 August 1967, in Kansas City, Missouri; and in 1968, in Washington, DC, "Damn Everything but the Circus."

The plans for the 1968 Week led to a direct confrontation between Cardinal O'Boyle of Washington and the board of directors over some of the speakers and the issue of liturgical experimentation at the Week's eucharist. O'Boyle withdrew his endorsement of the National Week; the board proceeded without it. The next year the National Conference of Catholic Bishops withdrew The Liturgical Conference's episcopal moderator, a symbolic gesture that was to push the Conference to become an ecumenical organization, independent of the Catholic hierarchy. Simultaneously, the Federation of Diocesan Liturgical Commissions (F.D.L.C.), which represented the official liturgical commissions or worship offices of dioceses, assumed the responsibility of providing education and policy leadership, and the staff of the Bishop's Committee on the Liturgy (B.C.L.) was expanded.

Until this time, Frederick McManus had served as president of The Liturgical Conference and executive director of the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, insuring that the best of the liturgical movement's leadership had direct access to the policy-making decisions of the bishops. Creative policy documents, such as Music in Catholic Worship, published in 1972, were the direct result of McManus's connective and integrative influence.

But after the split between the "official" and "unofficial" leadership, there was also a split between the post-conciliar liturgical renewal and the liturgical movement. Liturgical education now became centered, for the most part, on understanding and implementing the renewed rites as they appeared from Rome and, in some instances, were adapted for use in various countries. (Such education took diverse approaches, of course, and there were "liberal," "mainline," and "conservative" approaches to the documents and their implementation.) But the liturgical movement as a "cutting edge" popular movement was "marginalized" in official disrepute. It had largely returned, by the end of the 1970s, to its quiet pursuit of scholarship and popular, if less dramatic, forms of education and often, to a large extent, without a focus on changing liturgical legislation. In a sense, it was back where it had begun a century before.

The Renewal Continues (1969)

The shift from advocacy and promoting interest in liturgical reform to implementation of the liturgical renewal conceived in the documents of Vatican II created different organizations, types of leadership and meetings.

In 1976, The National Association of Pastoral Musicians was formed by Virgil C. Funk, with assistance from Sr. Jane Marie Perrot, D.C., former director of the National Catholic Music Educators Association. In 1978, in Scranton, Pennsylvania, the first of a series of national conferences began to be held by N.P.M., gathering parish musicians and clergy for education and celebration. While similar to National Liturgical Weeks, N.P.M. conferences focused on issues dealing with the implementation of the liturgical renewal.

In 1973, John Gallen, S.J., director of the Notre Dame Center for Pastoral Liturgy and successor to Aidan Kavanagh, O.S.B., gathered a group of teachers and students of liturgy in Scottsdale, Arizona, who formed the North American Academy of Liturgy. The Academy uniquely serves the ecumenical community as an exchange among liturgical leaders.

On an international level, the Societas Liturgica held its first international congress in 1969 in Glenstal Abbey, Ireland, on the topic "Liturgical Language." An ecumenical organization for scholars, it was begun two years earlier by Placid Murray, O.S.B. Congresses have been held every two years: in 1971 in Strasbourg, France, on "Contemporary Worship"; in 1973 at Montserrat, Spain, on "Contemporary Common Prayer"; at Trier, Germany, in 1975 on "Current Eucharistic Prayers"; in 1977, in Canterbury, England, the topic was "Christian Initiation"; the 1979 meeting in Washington, DC, focused on "Ordination"; in 1981 in Paris, France, the members discussed "Liturgical Time"; the 1983 meeting (Vienna, Austria) was about "Liturgy and Spirituality"; and the focus in Boston, Massachusetts, (1985) was "The LIMA Document"; in 1987 at Brixen, Italy, "Penance and Reconciliation"; and in 1989 the meeting was in York, England, on the topic, "Liturgy and Inculturation."

Universa Laus was founded in 1965 by Joseph Gelineau for the study of music and liturgy. Serving as a study group, in 1980 Universa Laus published a consensus document on music called a "Manifesto," containing principles of liturgical music.

Conclusion

In 1909 the interest in liturgy which had existed in academic circles and within Benedictine monasteries broke the surface of placid scholarship with the declaration of Dom Lambert Beauduin at the Malines Congress. In fewer than fifty-five years, the seeds which had been watered and fertilized in parish rectories, in seminaries, and around family kitchen tables blossomed forth in the liturgical renewal proposed by the leaders of the Vatican Council.

On almost every issue there was debate and often open resistance. Persons took sides, for and against the liturgical movement, and often religious houses were deeply divided among the advocates of both positions. The energy and enthusiasm of both leaders and followers in the face of this resistance stirred the "sense of movement." The most dramatic and visible element of the liturgical renewal of Vatican II, the use of the vernacular in the liturgy, was not a central element in the discussions of the liturgical movement. The structure of the Mass, concelebration, the role of the laity, and music were the major concerns.

What was central to the liturgical movement was a desire to make the liturgical prayer of the church more meaningful to the participants. Full, conscious, active participation led to a realization that the rite itself needed to be revised and to a call for a new understanding of education, evangelization, ecclesiology and Christology, which in turn led to a rethinking of theology, religion, ecumenism, and the way Christians relate to the world.

In fifty-five years, through the unswerving efforts of dedicated men and women, the liturgical movement spread throughout Europe and North America. Simultaneously, there was an ecumenical liturgical movement and renewal interacting with the desire to reform the Roman rite. This ecumenical liturgical movement contained its own leaders and eventually brought about a renewal of liturgical books in all major liturgical denominations.

In the future, the agenda of liturgical issues includes (1) the implementation of the liturgical renewal within the parish, especially in music and art; (2) discovering a way of celebrating liturgy in a multi-cultural setting; and (3) the inculturation of the liturgy within the unique culture of each country where the liturgy is celebrated.

While the sense of "a movement" passed with the liturgical reform and renewal embodied in Vatican II, the challenge of enriching the appreciation and experience of worship still remains.

LITURGICAL TEXTS IN ENGLISH

The Constitution on the Liturgy dramatically changed the Roman Catholic church's approach to the language of the liturgy (S.C., 36). While it did not give the vernacular pride of place in the church's liturgical rites, it opened up significant possibilities for the use of the vernacular in the Mass and other sacramental rites.

For the first time in sixteen centuries, apart from some minor exceptions, the place of the vernacular was established in the Roman church's worship. Art. 36 begins by stating, "Particular law remaining in force, the use of the Latin language is to be preserved in the Latin rites." Its focus, however, shifts immediately as it goes on to declare: "But since the use of the mother tongue, whether in the Mass, the administration of the sacraments, or other parts of the liturgy, frequently may be of great advantage to the people, the limits of its use may be extended. This will apply in the first place to the readings and instructions and to some prayers and chants, according to the regulations on this matter to be laid down for each case in subsequent chapters."

Art. 36 then goes on to spell out the competence of bishops' conferences and the role of the Holy See for decisions concerning the use of the vernacular in the liturgy: "Respecting such norms and also, where applicable, consulting the bishops of nearby territories of the same language, the competent, territorial, ecclesiastical authority mentioned in art. 22, 2 (territorial bodies of bishops lawfully established) is empowered to decide whether and to what extent the vernacular is to be used. The enactments of the competent authority are to be approved, that is, confirmed by the Holy See."

The article concludes by speaking specifically of the authority of bishops' conferences over translations from Latin into the vernacular: "Translations from the Latin text into the mother tongue intended for use in the liturgy must be approved by the competent, territorial ecclesiastical authority already mentioned."

Art. 54 of the Constitution opened the possibility of the vernacular in the Mass even wider by stating: "Wherever a more extended use of the mother tongue within the Mass appears desirable, the regulation laid down in art. 40 [concerning more profound or radical adaptations] of this Constitution must be observed."

The third major reference to the vernacular in the Constitution comes in art. 63 which deals with the vernacular in the sacraments and sacramentals: "Because the use of the mother tongue in the administration of the sacraments and sacramentals can often be of considerable help for the people, this use is to be extended according to the following norms:

a. With art. 36 as the norm, the vernacular may be used in administering the sacraments and sacramentals.

b. Particular rituals in harmony with the new edition of the Roman Ritual shall be prepared without delay by the competent, territorial ecclesiastical authority mentioned in art. 22, 2 of the Constitution. These rituals are to be adapted, even in regard to the language employed, to the needs of the different regions. Once they have been reviewed by the Apostolic See, they are to be used in the regions for which they have been prepared."

Two further references to the vernacular are found in articles 101 and 113. Art. 101 sanctions the use of the vernacular for clerics obligated to the recitation of the liturgy of the hours if "the use of Latin constitutes a grave obstacle to their praying the office properly." The same concession is given to nuns and non-clerics who recite the office in choir. Art. 113 specifies that texts for singing in the various rites should be in the vernacular according to the norms laid down in articles 36, 54, 63, and 101.

In summary, the Constitution takes the following approach to the use of the vernacular: recognition of the vernacular in a limited form in the Mass but the possibility of wider use; recognition of the use of the vernacular in the sacraments and sacramentals without restriction; recognition of the authority of the conferences of bishops to decide on the extent of the vernacular for their territories; recognition of the authority of the conferences to prepare and approve the vernacular translations, submitting their decrees of approval to the Holy See for confirmation; encouragement for neighboring bishops' conferences sharing the same language to consult together on translations; allowance for the possibility of adapting texts to make them more suited to a particular country or region.

The bishops of the conciliar commission on the liturgy probably did not foresee the extent to which the vernacular, especially in the Mass, would become the norm in the church's liturgy. At most they expected various countries, and perhaps chiefly in parts of Europe and in North America, to approve the vernacular on a restricted basis.

As a result of petitions from conferences of bishops, the Holy See gradually widened the conciliar permission to employ the vernacular liturgy until the point in 1967 when authorization for an entirely vernacular liturgy had been granted, including the canon of the Mass or eucharistic prayer and the texts for the ordination rites, including the sacramental forms [see Tres abhinc annos, 4 May 1967 (Documents on the Liturgy [D.O.L.] 39, no. 474)]. Authorization was also given in 1971 for the celebration of the liturgy of the hours in the vernacular without the restrictions stated in the Constitution on the Liturgy (See D.O.L., 216, no. 1773). Pope Paul VI on 19 April 1967 emphasized the pastoral reasons that underlay this shift from limited concessions to a fully vernacular liturgy when he said in an address to the members and periti of the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Liturgy: "Latin is an issue certainly deserving serious attention, but the issue cannot be solved in a way that is opposed to the great principle confirmed by the Council, namely, that liturgical prayer, accommodated to the understanding of the people, is to be intelligible. Nor can it be solved in opposition to another principle called for by the collectivity of human culture, namely, that the peoples' deepest and sincerest sentiments can best be expressed through the vernacular as it is in actual usage" (D.O.L. 86, no. 639).

During the first session of the council, several bishops from various English-speaking countries, already anticipating a limited use of the vernacular in the liturgy, had informal discussions about the possibility of English-speaking countries pooling their resources to provide a common English text. These informal discussions led in the following year to the establishment by ten conferences of bishops on 17 October 1963 of what would become known as the International Commission on English in the Liturgy (I.C.E.L.). The bishops of these English-speaking hierarchies thus anticipated the Constitution on the Liturgy by several weeks and by exactly one year the explicit encouragement given by Cardinal Giacomo Lercaro, president of the Consilium, for conferences of bishops sharing the same language to form "mixed commissions" to prepare uniform vernacular texts [See Consilium ad exsequendam, 16 October 1964 (D.O.L., 108)].

The founding conferences of I.C.E.L. gave it a mandate, the principal charge of which was "to work out a plan for the translation of liturgical texts and the provision of original texts where required in language which would be correct, dignified, intelligible, and suitable for public recitation and singing."

Among other specifications in the mandate were the following: "to propose the engagement of experts in various fields as translators, composers, and critics and to provide for the exchange of information with the sponsoring Hierarchies and with other interested Hierarchies . . . ; to give special attention, within the scope of this plan, to the question of a single English version of the Bible for liturgical use or at least of common translations of biblical texts used in the liturgy."

From the first then I.C.E.L.'s task involved not simply translations of liturgical and biblical texts but also the creation of new texts. From the beginning the sponsoring conferences also directed I.C.E.L. to cooperate wherever possible with other Christian churches in the preparation of common liturgical texts.

I.C.E.L.'s work began in earnest in 1964. Its overall direction had been entrusted by the conferences to a board of bishops, each conference designating a bishop as its representative. The Episcopal Committee (later Board) established a group of specialists in liturgy, theology, classics, scripture studies, English studies, and music known as the Advisory Committee to oversee the preparation of the texts. In 1965 the day-to-day work was committed to a permanent Secretariat, established in Washington, D.C.

The first English text prepared by I.C.E.L. for the sponsoring conferences of bishops was the Roman Canon (Eucharistic Prayer I), issued in 1967. The style of the text was the result of a number of discussions and consultations and was in many ways characteristic of the approach that I.C.E.L. would take to vernacular liturgical texts. It was somewhat spare and direct in wording and syntax. Simplicity, dignity, and attentiveness to the needs of proclamation were its primary characteristics. There was a conscious effort to provide language that was at once worthy of Christian worship and at the same time suited to the needs of the late 20th century. The style of this first text was carried forward into all of the work of I.C.E.L. over the next decade. While some critics contended that reverence and sacrality had been sacrificed for contemporaneity and pastoral aims, others praised the texts for boldly attempting to find a language that owed its primary inspiration to the spirit of the Second Vatican Council and to a modern literary culture rather than to earlier centuries of English liturgical and popular prayer.

In January 1969, the Holy See issued an Instruction on the Translation of Liturgical Texts (D.O.L. 123), an important theoretical and practical document, which in its main lines took an approach to liturgical translation similar to the course followed in the first I.C.E.L. translations. Since 1969 the Instruction has been the principal guide followed by I.C.E.L. in its translation work. It is worth noting just a few of the guidelines found in that document.

1. "... it is not sufficient that a liturgical translation merely reproduce the expressions and ideas of the original text. Rather it must faithfully communicate to a given people, and in their own language, that which the Church by means of this given text originally intended to communicate to another people in another time. A faithful translation, therefore, cannot be judged on the basis of individual words: the total context of this specific act of communication must be kept in mind, as well as the literary form proper to the respective language."

2. "The translator must always keep in mind that the 'unit of meaning' is not the individual word but the whole passage. The translator must therefore be careful that the translation is not so analytical that it exaggerates the importance of particular phrases while it obscures or weakens the meaning of the whole."

3. "The prayer of the Church is always the prayer of some actual community, assembled here and now. It is not sufficient that a formula handed down from some other time or region be translated verbatim, even if accurately, for liturgical use. The formula translated must become the genuine prayer of the congregation and in it each of its members should be able to find and express himself or herself."

4. "It is to be noted that if any particular kind of quality is regarded as essential to a literary genre (for example, intelligibility of prayers when said aloud), this may take precedence over another quality less significant for communication (for example, verbal fidelity)."

The Instruction on Translation also gave encouragement to the provision of original texts in its concluding paragraph by stating: "Texts translated from another language are clearly not sufficient for the celebration of a fully renewed liturgy. The creation of new texts will be necessary. But translation of texts transmitted through the tradition of the Church is the best school and discipline for the creation of new texts so "that any new forms adopted should in some way grow organically from forms already in existence" (S.C., 23).

The Roman reform also gave explicit encouragement to new texts in the praenotanda of several of the revised liturgical books. See, for example, Ordo exsequiarum, no. 22,3 (D.O.L. 416, no. 3394).

In The Roman Missal or Sacramentary (1973) I.C.E.L. provided original opening prayers for Sundays and solemnities as alternatives to the translated opening prayers. Additional examples of original prayers as alternatives to the translated prayers or to provide for pastoral situations not covered in the Latin editiones typicae can be found in Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (1982) and in the Order of Christian Funerals (1985).

The authority for the provision of liturgical texts, their preparation and publication, rests with the conferences of bishops. Ten English-speaking conferences—Australia, Canada, England and Wales, India, Ireland, New Zealand, Pakistan, Scotland, South Africa, and the United States of America—established I.C.E.L. to prepare texts for their consideration and possible decision. (The Philippines joined as a member conference in 1967.) Fifteen associate member conferences of bishops that use English as a secondary language also participated in the work. The Episcopal Board of I.C.E.L., made up of a bishop representing each of the eleven member conferences, must approve every final text prepared within I.C.E.L. by a two-thirds majority vote before a text can be submitted to the conferences of bishops. Each conference of bishops must also approve a text by a two-thirds majority and request from the Apostolic See a confirmation of its decision. Once that confirmation is given, the conference formally promulgates the text for use in its territory.

I.C.E.L. follows a process that involves wide consultation of the English-speaking bishops and their consultants. Most texts are first issued in consultation form and, after the results of the consultation have been studied and the text revised accordingly, they are issued in final form. Since 1967 I.C.E.L. has issued some one hundred texts and other supplementary and informational publications. Major texts issued include the Rite of Baptism for Children (1969); the Rite of Marriage (1969); the Rite of Funerals (1970); The Roman Missal (1973); the Rite of Penance (1974); the Rite of Religious Profession (1974); Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass (1974); The Liturgy of the Hours (1974-76); the Rite of Confirmation (1975); Ordination of Deacons, Priests, and Bishops (1975); Eucharistic Prayers for Masses of Reconciliation and Eucharistic Prayers for Masses with Children (1975); the rite of Dedication of a Church and an Altar (1978); The Roman Pontifical (1978); Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (1982); Order of Christian Funerals (1985); Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1986); Book of Blessings (1987); Ceremonial of Bishops (1989). These texts have been accepted with virtual unanimity by the churches of the English-speaking world, the only notable exception being The Divine Office (1974-75), the translation of the Liturgia Horarum sponsored by the hierarchies of Australia, England and Wales, and Ireland.

The sponsoring conferences of bishops directed I.C.E.L. to be attentive insofar as possible to the ecumenical dimensions of its work. I.C.E.L. has carried this on through its role as a founder and participant in the North American Consultation on Common Texts (C.C.T.), established in 1967, and through its role as a founder and participant in the International Consultation on Common Texts (I.C.C.T.), which carried out its work from 1969 to 1975, and its successor, the English Language Liturgical Consultation (E.L.L.C.), established in 1985. Through these organizations some common texts for the Christian churches in the English-speaking world have been achieved, especially for use in the celebration of the eucharist. These associations have also allowed for a sharing of information and occasionally of additional liturgical texts between the churches. In the same period in which I.C.E.L. began the work of preparing English liturgical texts for Roman Catholic use, a number of the other English-speaking Christian churches were preparing new service books incorporating new or revised rituals and a revised, more contemporary language of liturgical prayer. Some examples of these are Presbyterian church, U.S., Worshipbook (1970); the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, Lutheran Book of Worship (1978); Episcopal Church, U.S., The Book of Common Prayer (1979); Church of Scotland, The Book of Common Order (1979); Church of England, The Alternative Service Book (1980); Anglican Church of Canada, The Book of Alternative Services (1985); United Methodist Church, U.S., Book of Services (1985);

Uniting Church in Australia, Uniting in Worship (1988).

In its opening paragraph the Instruction on Translation of Liturgical Texts stated that "after sufficient experiment and passage of time, all translations will need review." The founding conferences of I.C.E.L. understood that a vernacular liturgy would need to undergo periodic review and revision. In 1981 I.C.E.L. began such a process looking towards the systematic and careful revision of the nearly thirty liturgical books issued in final form up till that time. For some years a careful evaluation of the first group of I.C.E.L. texts had been carried on within I.C.E.L. Comments on the style and diction of the I.C.E.L. texts, both laudatory and critical, were thoroughly discussed and analyzed. From the late 1970s a slight shift to a somewhat fuller, richer language began to take place. As the work of revision began in earnest in the early 1980s, I.C.E.L. reaffirmed its adherence to the 1969 Instruction on Translation and to contemporary texts suited to proclamation and singing in the liturgical assembly. At the same time, in light of the experience of the past fifteen to twenty years, I.C.E.L. also recognized that in some instances, for example, in the collects of The Roman Missal, a somewhat more elaborate, poetic style might be appropriate without in any sense violating the sound principles of the Instruction and concern for public proclamation.

The experience of the past two decades has been especially instructive in two respects.

First, far more study of the Latin texts of the post-conciliar reform has gradually been possible. A number of these Latin texts are new compositions; others were created through editing and rearranging existing Latin texts taken from a variety of historical sources. When the texts were issued, very little information was provided (beyond the work of A. Dumas, which appeared in the 1971 issues of Notitiae under the title "Les Sources du Missel Romain") on their provenance and on the methods used when texts were edited. This defect has over time been remedied, especially in the case of the Missale Romanum. In 1982, J. Deshusses and B. Darragon, Concordances et tableaux pour l'étude des grands sacramentaires (3 vols., Fribourg) appeared. And in the following year another valuable research tool, T. Schnitker and W. Slaby, eds., Concordantia verbalia Missalis Romani: Partes euchologicae (Münster) was published. In its revision of The Roman Missal texts, I.C.E.L. has spent considerable effort in studying the sources and background of the Latin texts and their vocabulary. The latter effort has led to the compilation of A Lexicon of Terms in the Missale Romanum, a 415-page resource instrument containing 647 entries dealing with the varied uses in the liturgical texts of such words as communio, munus, mysterium, sacramentum, votum.

Second, the first English texts prepared by I.C.E.L. were done with considerations of public proclamation uppermost, but this was necessarily derived from a somewhat theoretical approach. There had been no tradition of Roman Catholic liturgical prayer in English. Experience gained over time with the first generation of texts exposed certain strengths and weaknesses. Valuable lessons were learned through experience with the first texts in such important areas as cadence, balance, register, phrasing, vocabulary, subordination, suitable lengths for spoken grammatical units—phrases, clauses, and sentences.

The work of revision has also allowed for the addition of a far greater number of original prayers in all the liturgical books, including the preparation of opening prayers related to the scripture readings for the revised Roman Missal. The work of providing a body of original prayers opens the way to a deeply enriched tradition of contemporary English liturgical prayer, composed by gifted English writers for use by English-speaking people. The period of revision has made possible in addition a greater attention to the presentation and format of each book to ensure its pastoral application and effectiveness. Although such matters were dealt with in official statements implementing the reform (see, for example, Liturgicae instaurationes, no. 11 [D.O.L., 52, 529], Ordo unctionis infirmorum eorumque pastoralis curae, no. 38f [D.O.L., 410, no. 3358] and Ordo exsequiarum, no. 21 6 [D.O.L., 416, no. 3393]), it was not possible to put them fully into effect when there was a necessity to have the vernacular texts fairly rapidly. Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (1982) and the Order of Christian Funerals (1985) are examples of the second phase of I.C.E.L.'s preparation of the liturgical books for the English-speaking churches.

LITURGICAL THEOLOGY

Contemporary interest in liturgical theology is due to a number of factors, among which is the statement in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican II that "the study of liturgy is to be ranked among the compulsory and major courses in seminaries and religious houses of studies; in theological faculties it is to rank among the principal subjects. It is to be taught under its theological, historical, pastoral, and juridical aspects" (S.C., 16). This statement endorsed the contemporary shift in liturgical methodology away from a study of rubrics to a study of the historical evolution of rites and their meaning (Anton Baumstark). Thus the liturgy constitution ratified and endorsed the important work of Alexander Schmemmann, Cipriano Vagaggini, Irénée H. Dalmis, Salvatore Marsili and others whose work gives emphasis to the theological aspects of liturgical celebration.

While there was at that time, or even since, no agreed-upon meaning for "liturgical theology," at least two meanings were operative in the writings of these authors. First, liturgical theology was a reflection on the church's act of worship, seeking to draw out and explore for both catechesis and systematic theology, and in particular sacramental theology, the theological meaning of the liturgy as the actualization of the paschal mystery through an act of proclaiming and hearing the word and/or celebrating sacramental rituals. Second, liturgical theology meant using the liturgy as a source for systematic theology in the sense that the theological meaning of terms and concepts operative in liturgy were explored, for example, God, Christ, Spirit, redemption, salvation and sanctification. The uniqueness of liturgy as fundamentally a ritual action is understood here. The texts of the liturgy alone are not regarded as equivalent to other sources of positive theology (e.g., scripture, magisterium). Liturgical texts accompany ritual and symbolic gestures, and it is through this ritual whole that theological and spiritual meanings are disclosed. The fact that the church celebrates liturgy in order to experience the paschal mystery in a ritual event, suggests both the importance of liturgy as a source for theology and also the difficulty in delineating an acceptable method for engaging in liturgical theology.

Historical Overview

The phrase legem credendi lex statuat supplicandi (sometimes shortened in the literature to lex orandi, lex credendi) is generally ascribed to Prosper of Aquitaine. In its original setting the statement refers to the solemn intercessions of the Good Friday liturgy when the church prays for a variety of people who need the grace of God. The liturgical theology derived from this practice was understood to mean that this act of praying is proof against the semi-Pelagians about the absolute necessity of God's grace for salvation. Methodologically the point made is that the church's "law of belief" in the necessity of grace for salvation is evident in its "law of prayer."

That the church's lex orandi influenced patristic explanations of sacraments and theological terms is demonstrated in the pre-baptismal catecheses and the post-baptismal mystagogic catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem, John Chrysostom, and Theodore of Mopsuestia where the meaning of liturgical gestures and texts finds an important role in such instructions. Both the flexibility of the church's rites at this point of its history as well as the variety in their explanation in these instructions, attests to the fact that variety marked both the church's lex orandi and its lex credendi. That the liturgy continued to function in the medieval period as a theological source, especially in how the rites were carried out (e.g., confirmation separated from baptism and anointing of the sick as the last anointing), is clear in the writings of Peter Lombard and Thomas Aquinas. At the same time, however, the actual celebration of liturgy in the sense of exploring the meaning of euchology, gesture and symbolic action grew less important as a source for theology in this period.

This separation was solidified after Trent when the Roman Catholic church sought to defend itself against the Reformers in both manuals of theology and the Tridentine catechism. Debated issues in liturgy and sacramental theology were emphasized in post-Tridentine treatises of sacramental theology, often to the point of eclipsing other, more traditional, aspects of theology. For example, establishing the fact of the real presence in the eucharist and that the eucharist was a real sacrifice took a prominent place in conventional treatises on the eucharist, as opposed to delineating the theology of the eucharist from the rite itself. As a result the anamnestic character of eucharist and the role of the Spirit in the act of eucharist was all but eclipsed. What enabled the Western church to reorient its theology and catechesis on liturgy and the sacraments away from these polemical preoccupations was the historical and comparative study of the church's rites and commentaries upon them, largely from the patristic era. This historical recovery, from the end of the 19th century and continuing through to the present, led to the restoration of lex orandi, lex credendi to a position of prominence in liturgical method. In addition to the work of liturgists and church historians there are papal statements which endorsed the importance of liturgy as a primary source for theology. Among these is the often cited statement of Pius XI that "the liturgy . . . is the most important organ of the ordinary magisterium of the Church. . . . The liturgy is not the didascalía of this or that individual, but the didascalía of the Church" (Quas primas, Dec. 11, 1925, in Acta Apostolicae Sedis 17 [1925] p. 603).

Contemporary Liturgical Theology

That liturgy needs to be understood as the enactment of an event (S. Marsili et al.) of the church (Lambert Beauduin, A. Schmemmann, et al.) is central to a number of contemporary investigations of liturgical theology. In such explorations the component parts of liturgy in terms of symbol, language, gesture, and eucharology, as well as the participation of the assembly in relation to a variety of liturgical ministers, are discussed with all their ambiguity. Since none of these components of liturgy can be reduced to a single meaning, it is not surprising to find variety and pluriformity in the liturgical theologies gleaned from such investigations.

While the study of liturgical theology cannot be reduced to a study of eucharological texts, the important work of establishing critical editions of liturgical books (e.g., sacramentaries, antiphonaries, pontificals, etc.) has enabled contemporary liturgists to establish the antiquity, use and theological meaning of a wealth of liturgical texts. Textual studies of the eucharistic prayer such as that of Louis Bouyer (Eucharist: The Theology and Spirituality of the Eucharistic Prayer, Notre Dame, Univ. Press, 1968) have helped to recontextualize the notions of eucharistic presence and sacrifice so that the meaning of eucharistic memorial can be seen to be a primary element of the liturgical theology of the eucharist. Textual studies of the present sacramentary (e.g., by Pierre Jounel) help to establish the theological and anthropological foundation for what is contained in the present church's lex orandi.

With regard to the present liturgical reform, the theological meaning of liturgical rites is partially disclosed in the General Instructions for each reformed rite. Thus these instructions help shed light on the theological meaning of the contemporary liturgical rituals they accompany. In addition, the fact that the present reform of the liturgy has variety and option built into its very structure (as opposed to the rather fixed Tridentine rite) requires that the method employed in liturgical theology today seek to be comprehensive in terms of what is actually experienced in worship, as opposed to developing a liturgical theology that would be based on the euchology and rubrics of a fixed rite. At present most contemporary proposals for developing an appropriate method for liturgical theology respect the inherent variety of post-conciliar liturgical rituals.

Among the more important ground-breaking proposals from Europe for post-conciliar liturgical theology are those of Gerard Lukken and Albert Houssiau. For both authors, the primary source for liturgical theology is what is actually experienced in liturgy, not merely what the reformed rites say or describe. The particular contribution of North American liturgists to this discussion is the importance given to contemporary hermeneutics as well as the social sciences for developing a liturgical theology from actual liturgical celebrations.

While liturgists will commonly agree on the importance of the lex orandi to ground lex credendi, it should be pointed out that some authors understand a reciprocal relationship between these two terms, at least to some degree (Yngve Brilioth, Geoffrey Wainwright). Theology is seen to serve as a corrective to the church's rule of prayer where the forms of prayer are judged to be deficient and in need of correction. Therefore, some authors cite the important role which theology, based on scripture, played in the Reformers' concern to purify the medieval liturgy from unnecessary accretions that were far removed from a gospel purity. Here the church's theological tradition is seen to contribute to the adjustment of its liturgical tradition.

This insight has led other more recent authors to emphasize the critical function of liturgical theology in the sense that developments in contemporary theology can contribute to a critical assessment of the present liturgical reforms so that the ongoing agenda of liturgical indigenization and continued ritual reform can be based on a solid contemporary theology which would influence the ongoing development of liturgical rites (Angelus Haussling, Mary Collins, David Power).

Meanings of Liturgical Theology

At present one can establish at least three meanings of lex orandi, lex credendi: (1) A Theology of Liturgy, (2) A Theology Drawn from the Liturgy, and (3) Doxological Theology.

(1) A Theology of Liturgy. This describes what the liturgy is and what it does in terms of enacting in the present the reality of Christ's paschal mystery. One way to concretize this is to see the liturgy as a ritual enactment of the transhistorical event of Christ's dying and rising. As an act of memory it includes the manifestation of this unique saving act in word and gesture, myth and symbol, narrative and ritual. Understandings of the liturgy of the word as well as the central liturgical term anamnesis would be operative in this meaning of liturgical theology. In such an approach the historical study of rites can help establish what is constitutive and what is peripheral to the act of liturgy.

(2) Theology Drawn from the Liturgy. This concerns how the words and symbols of liturgy can be utilized as a generative source for developing systematic theology. This would mean that concepts in systematic theology can be fruitfully explored and described by data found in liturgical rites. Clear examples of this include how the rites, including general instructions, image the very being of God, how they describe the work of Christ, how they image the Church and how they reflect our need for grace as experienced through liturgy. One of the desired results of the kind of liturgical study called for in S.C. 16 would be met if the liturgy is thus mined for the way it deals with these central aspects of Christian faith and theology.

For example, if one were to reflect on the way Christ is imaged in the liturgy one would come up with a variety and pluriformity of usages. Such a study would necessarily refer to our need for Christ and for liturgy since most usually the rites both image Christ and, at the same time, describe our need for Christ's salvation (e.g., redemption, sanctification, forgiveness, reconciliation). Here the disciplines of Christian anthropology and Christology would converge in the act of liturgy. In addition, the various images for the church found in liturgical rites would deepen our appreciation of how the church is actualized in the liturgy and how local churches are united with each other through the act of worship. The point here would be to utilize liturgy as a source for more than sacramental theology. All systematic theology is intrinsically connected to the act of worship.

This understanding relates to the distinction between symbolic and technical language in theology. If the languages of liturgy (speech, symbol, gesture, etc.) are essentially symbolic, one needs to be aware that these modes of expression will be found wanting when one attempts to delineate the meaning of rites in the more technical language of dogmatic assertions or contemporary systematics. However this itself may well be an important contribution to the ways in which contemporary liturgical and systematic theologians approach their work.

(3) Doxological Theology. This understanding of liturgical theology has been more hinted at than delineated in full (Harvey Guthrie, L. Bouyer). In such an understanding, systematic theology would have a doxological cast to it, in the sense of thanks, praise and acknowledgment. It would also reflect the belief of the theologian. This is to suggest that the very nature of theology ought to be oriented to praise and the acknowledgment of God in prayer and reflection as opposed to a theology which tries to define, or even describe, sacred realities. What is operative in this approach to theology is the important notion of mystery, that through both theology and liturgy the mystery of God is acknowledged and experienced.

One application of this approach to the theological enterprise in general would be to require theology to be both reflective of the act of faith experienced in the liturgy as well as rigorously scientific, since this experience leads to second order reflection in theological discourse. Related to this is the understanding that in doing theology one expresses what one experiences and believes and in delineating this as theology one hands on what one believes is for the good of others, particularly in developing their own faith. Such an approach involves the whole person in the act of theologizing. It relates to self-appropriation in theology of what is described in theological terms. This kind of theology would emphasize notions of conversion and growth in the faith as well as growth in understanding.

The Law of Prayer and Belief Enacted

The present agenda of some liturgical theologians (A. Houssiau, G. Lukken, M. Collins) has also influenced the way contemporary liturgical theologians want to expand the lex orandi, lex credendi equation to include a third, viz., lex agendi. At this stage of liturgical study (often termed the critical function of liturgiology) we can note at least two meanings of this lex agendi.

Actual Celebrations As a Theological Source. Since liturgical rituals are enacted rites, a contemporary method for studying them needs to be developed that takes seriously what is experienced in actual celebrations rather than merely what is written in liturgical texts and rubrical directions. Here the use of methods from the social sciences is crucial in delineating a successful method of liturgical observation and reflection on the act of worship. In this framework, in addition to asking the question "what is experienced in actual liturgical rites," those involved in preparing, enacting and critiquing the liturgy ask a second question as well: whether what is offered and experienced in liturgy reflects the faith vision which is enunciated in the general instructions as well as in the rites themselves.

For example, by its nature liturgical ritual calls for restraint in the doing of worship. Individual pieties and idiosyncrasies recede in order to allow the communal faith vision and experience of God inherent in the liturgy to come forth. Thus the corollary of using actual celebrations as a theological source is to evaluate the adequacy of the liturgical celebrations in what is said, done, experienced and enacted liturgically.

Liturgy and Spirituality. A second meaning of lex agendi concerns the living out in life of the implications of liturgy. This influence of liturgy on life is an aspect of liturgical participation traditionally understood to be constitutive of the act of worship. This may be called a liturgical spirituality where the act of engaging in liturgical prayer is seen to have implications for the living of the Christian life (i.e., the life of virtue).

This relation of life to liturgy has been given added stimulus in contemporary discussion by liberation theologians who examine the ethical demands of the Christian faith. How shall one live the Christian life as set forth in the teachings of Jesus and as intended to be experienced in liturgy, especially in situations that are either indifferent to such a life or actually inhibitive of it? The challenge to live what is celebrated can mean critiquing and then revitalizing social structures of oppression. It can also mean emphasizing individual commitments to reform oneself as well as structures of society.

This understanding of the lex agendi emphasizes how liturgy influences life lived outside the ritual itself in terms of the commitments in life which liturgical participation necessarily implies. Where formerly the notion of ex opere operato and operantis stressed the correct enactment of the liturgical ritual in order to ensure the effective manifestation and appropriation of the mystery celebrated, here lex agendi would emphasize the operato and operantis of liturgy to insure the appropriation of the mystery of liturgy outside the liturgy as well. Hence, the lex agendi aspect of liturgical theology puts emphasis on the implications of doing liturgy.

A Method for Liturgical Theology

It has been established that to have an adequate liturgical theology one must examine the component parts of the liturgical rites in terms of texts, symbols, actions and gestures in light of the times and places of the communities which engaged in them in the past or engage in them in the present. This is because liturgical rites are adequately understood and interpreted only in relation to their experienced context. Hence one could say that liturgical context is "text," in the sense that context provides the source (or "text") for developing liturgical theology. Here context can mean at least three things.

First, it is the historical evolution of a given liturgical rite studied to determine its origin, component parts, and historical variations. The purpose of this study is to uncover the theological meanings which the rite has traditionally conveyed and to distinguish between essential and peripheral aspects of the rite. Second, it is an examination of the present reformed rites undertaken to determine whether the contemporary celebration of these rites in specific contexts expresses what is actually envisioned in the rites. This means examining liturgical acts as a whole so that words, symbols and gestures are interpreted in relation to each other. It also means trying to determine the extent to which the setting for liturgy, e.g., assembly itself or environment, and the conducting of liturgy, e.g., types of music and forms of participation, facilitates and enhances the assembly's appropriation and understanding of the prayers, symbols and gestures of the liturgy. The third notion of context shifts attention to the critical function of liturgical theology. Here the contemporary cultural and theological context of liturgical celebration is noted in order to determine the adequacy of the present liturgical rites and to explore ways of adapting them to a variety of changing ecclesial and cultural contexts. These three meanings of "context" need to be expounded.

(1) Historical Evolution of Rites

Part of the context of every liturgical rite is provided by a study of the historical evolution of liturgical forms and, at least implicitly, by the evolution of liturgical theologies which have accompanied or accompany their use. The kind of historical investigation envisioned here differentiates those aspects of ritual worship that are essential from those that are peripheral so that this investigation can underscore the importance of the evolution of liturgical forms and the theologies which comprise liturgical tradition. The Church's actual liturgical tradition cannot be determined without such historical study and reflection.

The historical study of liturgical rites and forms requires that the investigator review how liturgical forms and rites changed and developed in relation to the prevailing sociocultural ambience. Apart from this, rites cannot be fully understood. This approach to liturgical method draws on the pioneering work of the editors of critical editions of liturgical sources who have compiled and edited a wealth of liturgical texts. It also draws upon the work of liturgical theologians such as L. Bouyer (op. cit.) who compiled a wealth of eucharistic texts and commented on their theological meaning. However, it takes these approaches a step further to interpret this data in light of their lived religious and cultural contexts. In this connection the work of Herman Wegman (Christian Worship in East and West, New York: Pueblo, 1985) is a move in this direction. Wegman introduces most chapters by describing the liturgical evolution of a period in light of its contemporary "historical" and "cultural data."

This approach demands that a number of issues be raised about the data derived from historical research. First, what texts, symbols and gestures were used in the liturgy and who spoke or participated in them? To what extent did the assembly participate in liturgy through movement, symbolic action, singing and speaking? Second, what kinds of sources were used to compose the liturgy? Was the biblical foundation the essential source for the imagery and metaphors used in ritual language or were the evolving rites influenced or even controlled by contemporary theological controversies or prevailing currents in contemporary spirituality? Third, how do the various components of liturgical rites relate to one another and how is each component interpreted in relation to the others? This question acknowledges the various genres of communication which comprise the act of worship: proclamation of texts, gestural use of symbols, participation in song, etc. Fourth, one must ask how accurately the descriptions of liturgical rites, e.g., in patristic sources or ordos, reflect what was actually celebrated, lest more weight be given to how a rite was supposed to be celebrated as opposed to how it was actually carried out and experienced.

In addition to studying liturgical history and liturgical tradition in light of the contemporary cultural and sociopolitical situation, such an investigation needs to study the relationship between liturgy and contemporary theology on the one hand, and between liturgy and contemporary spirituality on the other. This shift from an exclusive concern with ritual evolution enhances liturgical study because it is a move in the direction of recontextualization, and therefore toward being faithful to the way actual liturgical sources functioned. This approach is also necessary in order to make appropriate judgments about liturgical theology since judgments need grounding in the empirical data of the liturgical event.

Related to this consideration is the notion of the normativity of liturgical tradition. Contemporary liturgical rites have histories that need to be considered when interpreting or critiquing them. Liturgical tradition ought to ground contemporary reform and guide future adaptation in order that what is presently experienced be truly part of an organic development. It should be made clear, however, that "normative" does not mean determinative so that liturgical tradition alone, including historical study, assesses the adequacy of the present rites or the ongoing evolution of rites. Normativity means that a core of elements such as texts, gestures and symbols, especially in sacraments, have perdured in the church's liturgical tradition and that this composite of elements may be said to constitute the church's normative celebration of a given sacrament or liturgy. However, in the present or future evolution of a given rite the exact texts or gestures discovered from history need not be imitated word for word or rubric for rubric. Liturgical tradition supplies a "genetic vision of the present" (R. Taft), and it is this genetic vision of the liturgy which is normative. Tradition does not determine a priori what should comprise contemporary ritual.

For example, we can note the perdurance in liturgical tradition of certain symbolic actions such as washing in water for baptism and the importance attached to the blessing prayer over the baptismal water. This evidence can be used to correct those rites in which the ample use of symbol or blessing text has been neglected. Thus liturgical tradition may be said to have provided the means whereby the preconciliar liturgy, which had minimalized sacramental liturgy to "matter" and "form," was changed in the light of liturgical tradition to maximize symbols and to expand on the use of blessing prayers. In baptism this means the preference of immersion over infusion, and blessing the water at every baptism with an extensive blessing prayer instead of using water blessed once yearly at the Easter vigil. This normative tradition alone, however, cannot provide an adequate contemporary ritual. Other factors must contribute to the development as well.

An essential component of the present liturgical context is determined by liturgical tradition, part of which is discoverable by reviewing liturgical history. At the same time, however, it is important to emphasize that tradition is not merely something from the past. Tradition is the present shaped by past experience. The present is integral to tradition. Thus the conserving function of ritual in terms of Christian identity is preserved: liturgy and liturgical theology are not created ab ovo in each age. They are products of historical evolution. At the same time, the creative function of ritual is preserved as well. Evolution involves ongoing theological and pastoral reform and renewal.

(2) Postconciliar Liturgical Reforms

One of the chief aims of the present liturgical reform enunciated in the liturgy constitution is to provide easily comprehended rites that facilitate full and active participation (S.C., 14, 21). A key issue is to determine to what extent the present rites as implemented and practiced facilitate popular participation and comprehension. A second key issue is to determine to what extent contemporary celebrations of liturgy conform to the revised rites themselves. The method proposed here that context is "text" can help this investigation because appropriate participation cannot be measured merely by determining that a correct rite has been published. It requires investigation into actual celebrations of liturgy.

While the word "performance" has the negative connotation of leaving liturgical communities passive during a rite, nevertheless it does point out that how a rite is conducted has an important bearing on how the liturgy engages the assembly's participation. It is certainly an anomaly that for centuries the text proposed as the church's norm for eucharistic worship and understanding, the Roman Canon, was not audible to the assembly and was not proclaimed in the vernacular. Performance clearly mitigated the kind of comprehension and full, active participation which the liturgy demands. Thus the distinction between reformed rite and context is important since contemporary liturgical contexts may well mitigate comprehension and participation, the very things which the Vatican II reform sought to achieve. Factors in the liturgical context which influence performance, and thus participation in and comprehension of the liturgy, include the physical setting in which the liturgy takes place, the arrangement of the assembly and the worship environment, the use of music, participation in ministries and symbolic actions.

Some examples. (a) With regard to environment, while the Roman Canon and new eucharistic prayers use the pronoun "we" to articulate the prayer of the whole assembly, the arrangement of the assembly can speak more about individuals separated from each other in private prayer than about communal worship. (b) If the texts for the music sung at the communion rite refer to individual reception or to adoration, then the music in which the people participate will reflect messages at variance with those proper to the eucharistic rite at this point which emphasizes the communal sharing in the eucharist to build up the church as the body of Christ. (c) The performance of the ritual by a single priest celebrant instead of by different people assuming the varied liturgical roles envisioned and demanded by the present rites speaks a message at variance with the notion of the church at prayer clearly articulated in the texts and the general instructions of the revised rites. (d) Hearing this text proclaimed from the sanctuary of a mammoth cathedral provides an experience far different from that of hearing the same text in a parish church, in a small chapel or at a domestic liturgy. Related to this is whether the assembly assumes a kneeling or standing posture while the anaphora is proclaimed. While the recitation of the canon in Latin was an obvious barrier to comprehending the meaning of the gathering of the church around the altar, one could argue that today some contemporary liturgical contexts make full comprehension of these same texts impossible precisely because of the way in which contexts, e.g., physical arrangements, so influence how texts are heard.

Another aspect of how context functions to help interpret liturgical texts is found in the postconciliar use of the scriptures in the liturgy. Liturgists have rightly pointed out the theological and liturgical value of the word as that which reveals the mystery of salvation and makes it operative for contemporary communities to hear it. For the word to be interpreted properly the context of the liturgical action must be part of the hermeneutic that is applied to the texts proclaimed. This builds on the premise that to choose texts for a lectionary means displacing them by taking them out of their native context in a particular book of the Bible, which has its own context among other biblical books, and assigning them as appropriate readings for a given liturgical gathering. Scripture readings proclaimed at liturgy have a life independent of the canon of scripture.

This is not to suggest that the original setting of a scripture reading is not important or that historical, redactional, source, and literary criticism are unimportant for interpretation. But the additional factor needed for proper interpretation is the liturgical context in which a given text is heard. Thus a key issue here is the hearing and appropriation of a scriptural text as experienced at liturgy.

Context is an essential factor in understanding texts but it also follows that the present liturgical rites, including the introductory instructions, lectionary readings, prayer texts, gestures and symbols function as norms and critique the inadequate contexts of contemporary liturgical celebration. An example of the normative value of the reformed rites concerns the primacy of the assembly as the primary symbol for all liturgy and locus for all liturgical celebrations. The very fact that the assembly is continually referred to in the General Instruction and throughout the present eucharistic rite signals a shift from the Tridentine missal which was rubrically self-conscious and oriented toward the actions of sanctuary ministers only, especially the priest. Therefore the emphasis on actualizing the assembly's role in the contemporary liturgy and understanding liturgical ministers as functioning in communion with and on behalf of the assembly, signals a shift in how the liturgy is to be experienced and understood. This same evidence also signals a shift in the liturgical theology of the eucharist away from objective presence in the elements to communal transformation through the eucharistic action.

As another example, the fact that every revised ritual states where and how the roles of reader and deacon are to function liturgically is itself a theological statement about how the church is to be imaged in liturgy—through a variety of roles serving the assembled community. Liturgical theologians rightly capitalize on such directives as indications of a paradigm shift in ministry away from the medieval absorption of liturgical roles into that of the priest. When these ministers do not function in the liturgy and their roles are again assumed by one, or even by a few, the texts of the reformed liturgy function as appropriate critiques of these contexts. The reformed liturgy is normative inasmuch as it shows that inadequate contexts need to be corrected in the light of what the rituals disclose about the ecclesiology of liturgy. One reason why some texts are simply not "heard" is that some liturgical contexts (environment, music, ministries, performance) are simply not congruent with the reformed rites.

The normative value of the reformed rites also indicates that one's interpretation of texts used liturgically is not relative. Interpretation and meaning are grounded in revised rites which are bearers of a rich liturgical and theological tradition. Hence liturgical rites must be interpreted in a way that respects their nature as bearers of theological meanings disclosed in liturgical celebration. In addition, the employment of a research method which attempts to determine what actually occurs at liturgy and how what occurs is appropriated by the gathered community, can help assess the extent to which the revised rites are truly normative in the sense outlined above. It can tell us whether or not the envisioned liturgical reform has taken place.

Poignant examples of facets of liturgical tradition that have been restored in the present sacramental rites and which need evaluation are the proclamation of the word and the act of preaching. If one of the purposes of the lectionary reform is to provide a greater variety in the texts heard and preached, one could ask how much variety is experienced in the texts proclaimed, for example at sacramental celebrations of baptism. Further, one needs to ask at sacramental liturgies how well homilies relate the scripture readings to the enactment to follow in sacrament. One could also ask to what extent preaching is biblically based now as opposed to before the reform and whether its content is primarily didactic or moralistic.

Inquiry about the implementation of the post-conciliar liturgy in general should include determination of the extent to which variety and option mark actual celebrations. In the eucharist this means inquiry about the introduction to the liturgy, the formula for the penitential rite, texts for preface and eucharistic prayers, and texts for the dismissal rite including solemn blessings and prayers over the people. Are some options never used? Is there sufficient variety in comments, introductions and intercessions? Are these freely composed texts liturgically appropriate and theologically accurate? With regard to the liturgical reform in general one could ask about the people's positive and negative reaction to the rites they experience, whether there is resistance to further change, and if so, why, and how people view the relationship between liturgy and devotion.

The investigation into context is advanced here in two ways. First, it requires that liturgical units be interpreted in relation to each other and that the whole liturgical event be regarded as an essential component in interpreting liturgical texts, symbols and gestures. Crucial in this first stage is the actual liturgical performance. Second, the postconciliar rites set a standard and measure against which to evaluate present liturgical practice. This suggests that the rites as revised present a minimum standard for the celebration of liturgy which is marked by option, flexibility and direct relationship to the given liturgical assembly. In addition, the current reform presents a contemporary theological vision that is to be understood and imaged both in liturgical celebration and in liturgical theology.

(3) Critical Liturgical Theology and Indigenization

As noted above, the orientation of the contemporary liturgical reform toward adaptation and indigenization (S.C., 37-40) must be kept in mind when considering the normative value of the revised rites because they present a basis from which to work toward indigenization of the liturgy. They represent a necessary first step in an ongoing task. It is important that liturgical theology be developed in light of a liturgical reform that is to be regarded as ongoing. This is also important because ritual changes usually reflect shifts in theology and spirituality.

There is a reciprocity between liturgy and theology in ritual evolution inasmuch as changed liturgical rites most often reflect developments in theology. This means that it may be a liturgical anachronism to reintroduce an ancient liturgical practice or rite simply because it is well attested in the tradition. Critical liturgical theology must assess the adequacy of the present reformed rites in relation to tradition, contemporary theology, church teaching and present pastoral needs. This assessment implicitly acknowledges that the provisional nature of liturgical forms, despite their importance, invites a critical consideration of them.

Recent advances in ecclesiology, Christology, Trinity, eschatology and anthropology need to be incorporated into this study and revision. For example, implicit in the theological and liturgical agenda of indigenization is the importance given to the local church in post-conciliar ecclesiology. Some of the growing pains of liturgical indigenization correspond to the tensions also being experienced in ecclesiology in general. Another example is the crucial issue of theological language and names for God which needs to be dealt with squarely in the ongoing revision, especially because of the formative nature of liturgical prayer.

A clear example of how knowledge of liturgical tradition, linked with contemporary theology, helps cast a critical eye on the liturgical reforms, concerns the way the Holy Spirit is imaged in the reformed liturgy. One can legitimately criticize the present liturgical rites of the West for an absence of an adequate pneumatology in its euchology and theology of liturgy. Advances in scripture study and in the theology of the person and work of the Holy Spirit could help revise Western euchology which is primarily christocentric. Thus theology would influence the liturgy and help liturgical theology to progress.

An example of how liturgists use liturgical tradition to critique the present liturgy is their criticism that all the new eucharistic prayers of the Roman rite use the same structure, lack an adequate theology of creation, and make limited use of acclamations during the anaphoras, especially in comparison to many Eastern formulas. Recent research, some of which was undertaken in an ecumenical framework, indicates that variety in anaphoral structures is possible. Furthermore, present biblical and liturgical research reveals the need to re-evaluate and to make more precise the commonly held assumption that there is a direct relationship between Jewish blessing prayers and Christian anaphoras.

Liturgical pluriformity and variety from country to country and continent to continent would help meet the needs of worshippers who differ in terms of self-expression, patterns of bodily involvement and habits of singing because of their differing cultural backgrounds. The advantage of the eucharistic rite developed in Zaire, for example, is that it is not concerned simply with texts. Rather it takes into consideration the readiness of the participants to participate in many verbal and nonverbal ways, particularly through bodily movement.

This aspect of critical liturgiology and ongoing indigenization is necessarily open-ended because of the nature of the criteria for liturgical indigenization which includes contemporary theology, liturgical tradition and pastoral practice. Because research in all three fields is ongoing, liturgical indigenization must be regarded as an ongoing task. In addition, indigenization to meet specific liturgical needs can be achieved only in specific ecclesial groups. This makes the determination of specific cultural contexts crucial in the process of establishing new liturgical rites. The agenda of indigenization also requires that liturgical theology be attentive to acculturation in theology and liturgy, because the variety found there is largely dependent on variations in the cultural or societal context.

To state that liturgical context is "text" involves shifting attention from the components of liturgical rites alone, i.e., euchology, rubrics, selection of readings, etc., to a consideration of how they are experienced and understood in the actual context of liturgical celebration. The method outlined here is intended to recontextualize liturgical sources and thus provide a more adequate approach to liturgical theology.

LITURGICAL TIME, THEOLOGY OF

Introduction: Time in Religion and Science

Speculations about time have occupied thinkers for centuries. Scientists and mathematicians, social scientists, philosophers and theologians have reasoned about time, considering categories such as measure of change, motion, duration, infinity, space-time continuum, direction of time, consciousness of time, absolute and relational time, creation, free will, and eschatology. Yet time remains essentially a mystery: "What is time then? If nobody asks me, I know; but if I were desirous to explain it to one that should ask me, plainly I know not" (Augustine, Confessions XI, 14).

Scientific and religious approaches to time differ both in scope and in the attempt to join the eternal with the ever-changing expression of being.

Religion, like philosophy, seeks to comprehend all of reality, but is not content with expressing ideas about reality. Religious life aims not at thinking about reality, but at apprehending it through worship, prayer, revelation, etc., activities that transcend the subject-object dualism.

Religious experience shifts people from isolated onlookers to united participants. Worship is more a "looking with understanding"—a contemplative union—rather than a knowledge through observation. Thus, the experience of liturgical time is a certain disengagement from measured time, a focus on eternity present in time.

Scientific theories of time—absolute or relative—are intrinsically linked to space. Even Newtonian physics which posits an absolute time, measured independently of space, links time with distance. Science, as well as philosophies rooted therein, treat time as extrinsic.

While the liturgy takes place in a measured and extended time-space manifold, it is not bounded by either extrinsic time or space.

Abraham Heschel in his essay, "The Sabbath," sharply separates time from space. Space, he asserts, can be divided and dominated; territory can be acquired. Space belongs to the earthly kingdom. Time, however, remains indivisible and undominated; it cannot be amassed.

Human physicality makes us rivals vis a vis space: we cannot occupy the same exact space. Time, however, can be shared; living in the same time makes us contemporaries, not rivals. While our bodies occupy space, our spirits live in time. Time concerns God's kingdom; the reign of God is a matter of time—an inscape of eternity in time.

Vatican II's ecclesiology raised the image of God's pilgrim people to consciousness—an image related more to time than space. Spatial notions, e.g., parish and diocese as geographic divisions, were subordinated and contextualized by this dominating image. Even the Pauline notion of the body of Christ bespeaks more a temporal notion than a spatial one. This spiritual reality implies growth and change; becoming is an intrinsic movement. Recent church architectural studies demonstrate a shift from a holy place as a tabernacle for God's localized presence to a place for congregational worship, an experience of God in temporal action.

Time and History in Society

The apprehension and measurement of time in ancient cultures depended on events occurring in time. What happened in time qualified humanity's inescapable involvement with and consciousness of time; time considered abstractly mattered less than meaning articulated in time. Children experience time in this way and this approach holds for adults in certain circumstances.

If moderns image time as an imaginary line, it is the self which locates the past behind and the future ahead. In contrast, ancient Jews viewed sacred events, e.g., creation, exodus, giving of the covenant, etc., as fixed points with history as a pilgrimage movement of a people. The event, not the self, determines time. Ancestors, having passed these markers, were ahead on the journey. People of the future would be coming up behind on the pilgrimage.

Since modern societies hold that history is irreversible, people have freedom and responsibility to shape both time and history. For the Christian believer, time and history belong to God whose love is revealed in the unfolding plan of salvation and whose promise is assured in Christ. God completes time and history in a movement of love.

In contrast to the Christian belief system, viewing eternity as the ripening fruit of time, secular approaches conceive of time as a relentless succession of moments. Aware of freedom, but lacking a faith that sees time as meaningful and redemptive, the secularized modern must achieve salvation alone. Not bonded in a society of shared beliefs, empty time can be filled by stoic resignation, flight through instant gratification, authoritarianism, etc.

In a society dominated by rational, enlightened ideas where autonomous action in history is the rule, worship will be pushed off into a private sphere, becoming a monument to a past age. Worship may be rejuvenated through rational principles, bathed in ethical sensitivity or political action. Worship becomes an event of control, rather than a response to God's revelation in time.

Sacred and Symbolic Time

A. Sacred Time

Beginning and ending with the eternal, religion tries to grasp the momentary, every-changing mode of existence in eternity's light. Attitudes towards time reflect attitudes about the meaning of life. If, for example, time is viewed as timeless instants expressing the eternal, then history itself is meaningless.

The Judeo-Christian tradition views time linearly as a sequence of moments related to God's plan, while other traditional religions view time as cyclical. If time's course is cyclic, then re-presentation of the original cosmogony periodically regenerates time: the past is wiped out and a new beginning ensues. In all religions, however, temporal moments (time as timely) are related in varied and complex ways to the timeless (time as eternity).

The Jewish scriptures speak powerfully of temporal time, i.e., history is progressive, guided by God from the moment of creation to its culmination. At the end of finite time, God's purpose will be fulfilled. Jewish faith, characterized by expectant messianism, also holds that within each moment of time, even in mundane history, there is the presence of eternity. Hence fulfillment resides in kernel within moments of time.

Christianity also relates time to eternity; timely time is rooted in eternity. Christian tradition structures history around the manifestations of the eternal in the temporal, primordially the Christ-event. In the gospel of John absolute eternal reality is present in the temporal for those who believe. Timely significance is transcended.

History for Jews and Christians alike is the locus of God's action. Time is bracketed by its beginning at creation and its end, the parousia; in between stretches the line of God's redemptive activity. In the Christian tradition the focal center is the life and work of Jesus Christ, historical and eternal, giving Christianity the tension between the already and the not-yet. With Christ the new age to come has begun (Eph 1:21; 2:7).

B. Symbolic Time

Time serves an organizing function for the symbols in a religious system. Time is intimately tied to the development of some religious symbols and ritual performance, e.g., spring festivals. Time relates dynamically to the religious social bond, e.g., in celebration social relations are articulated. Time relates also to the intentional life of the individual, e.g., subjective symbols announce public meaning.

While time does organize chronology (calendar), symbolic time is perceived differently from the succession of mere chronological units of regular periodicity. The uneven distribution of religious festivals throughout a calendar year, e.g., shows that something different from "clock time" is at work.

In their complex temporal features, religious symbols organize and articulate relationships within history. The public symbol of time—time as a mode of human becoming—defines transformation systems. A new intentional social reality is generated within time and what is created is a processional social reality that has transformative power.

Liturgical Time

A. Biblical Time

Words for time, biblically understood, make time distinctive for the believer. Two basic views of time appear in the scriptures. Quantifying measurement of time (related to scientific speculation) stands in contrast to qualifying time (related to history of religions).

Quantifying time. Quantifying measurement correlates one time with others on the basis of passage of moving objects (sun, moon, etc.) or a recurring routine.

Temporal experience is handled analogically. One understands a unique moment in terms of something universal.

For example, cult was interested in time as quantum—cyclic repetition of special days. Legislation for an historicized Passover festival (Exod 13:3-10) calibrated to natural phenomena commands remembrance of historical significance, but moves to the continuance through time of this event "year after year." The unique event is managed and regularized. Quantification moves from time as history to the discovery of meaning above or beyond history.

Quantification can take place by comparing human experience with an exemplary standard; time is objectified. If this is a "day of wrath," certain consequences follow for this quantified time. Behavior, appropriate to the time period, is aided by a set of rules.

Qualified time. Qualified time views each day and moment as unique. Purposiveness and distinctiveness are hallmarks of this experience. If quantified time relates one day to another through cultic cycles or regulated appropriate behavior, qualified time sees each moment as a possible decisive confrontation with God.

Past and future are related analogically, being measured by the now; the instant becomes the viewpoint. Biblical prophecy, the appropriate response of an imminent future, awakens God's people in a moment of crisis. Sacred history, a living memory of God's saving plan, stirs up trust and hope. In either movement, the present is unique, relating to a past and future.

B. The Liturgy's Use of Time

Liturgy's time-specific texts show a preference for the present. While liturgical celebration makes remembrance of the past a present unfolding of the future, the NT concentrates on the fullness of time; in Christ Jesus the eternal word is present in time. Church seasons and feasts and daily prayer situate the Christian through time-oriented texts.

The invitatory psalm verse, "If today you hear God's voice, harden not your hearts," begins the cycle of daily prayer. Easter's "This is the day the Lord has made" resonates with the Christmas antiphon "Today Christ is born." Paul's admonition "You know what hour it is, how it is full time now for you to wake from sleep" (Rom 13:11) begins the Advent cycle and "Even now, says the Lord, return to me with all your heart" (Joel 2:21) is the opening proclamation on Ash Wednesday.

The liturgy is thus time-centered rather than space-centered. It expresses not only time as timeless, intimations of an unfolding eternity, but also time as timely, a mediation of God's presence in the moment. Time is intrinsic to the mode of becoming; in liturgy time is the mode of sanctification.

The liturgy's understanding of time, grounded in incarnational theology, takes seriously God's communication of the definitive word in Jesus become flesh. Jesus remains present to God's people in all time through the Spirit outpoured.

"Christ yesterday and today, the beginning and the end, Alpha and Omega, all time belongs to him and all the ages; to him be glory and power through every age for ever" runs the proclamation at the Easter vigil. God's word to humanity does not change; it remains forever the same, yet is experienced as a timely reality.

Some conclusions can be drawn at this point.

1. Time, understood philosophically or scientifically, names events as before or after. Thus, temporal structures insert human beings into narrativity. For Christians who believe that God is manifest in human events, God is present in humanity's time. Christian life is an insertion into sacred narrativity, both for the individual and the collectivity. The liturgy rehearses that sacred story, not as a pious memory, but as a living reality.

2. The Christian attends to the present moment as revelatory (time as timeless), but within the context of sacred narrativity (time as timely). The present becomes meaningful in relationship to a past and future. Not only is the individual's experience important, but also the social body's experience. The liturgy announces God as humanity's future, already experienced mysteriously in the present.

3. The liturgy also deals with quantified time, but not per se. The cyclic repetition of festivals, quantitatively determined, provides an understanding of and perspective on present reality—time as qualified. This symbolic time generates a future and calls for appropriate behavior. Liturgy shapes the Christian stance in the world.

4. Within liturgical celebration itself memory and hope become critical. The commemoration of the historic Christ-event leading to the parousia provides symbolic images in timely time. Memory becomes active so that commemoration is not only of a past, but a past present. Hope becomes enlivened to the point of shaping a future present. The present reality of life in Christ—the fullness of time—is celebrated and renewed.

5. In the liturgical celebration, the psychological arrow of time points in two directions. Like several Eastern eucharistic prayers, that of Basil of Caesarea prays: "... remembering his holy sufferings, and his resurrection from the dead and his return to heaven ... and his glorious and fearful coming again..." Liturgical anamnesis in this context defies the scientific arrow of time—we remember the future.

While scientists and philosophers would bristle at the assertion, it provides a way of viewing liturgical time. The active remembering of the fullness of the present encompasses both past and future. Those who have gone before us are ahead of us; liturgy remembers the future present.

In liturgy the punctiform present is not what exists, but the presence of eternity in time, the communication and regeneration of the Christ-life in timely time.

C. Feasts and Rituals

Despite some NT passages' ambivalence toward feasts and seasons (cf. Col 2:1), the Christian scriptures attest to the fact that Christian faith was articulated in temporal terms. Christ, however, has fulfilled the meaning of all time-bound ritual observances. The historical manifestations of God-incarnate provided a framework for the elaboration of celebration within calendric structure.

1. Sunday is the place to begin. The scriptures are careful to note that it was the morning of the first day that the empty tomb was discovered. Belief in the Resurrection meant the dawning of a new age in Christ and the fullness of time.

Christians celebrated this newness of life on the first day of the week, the "Lord's day" (1 Cor 16:2; Rev 1:10; Acts 7:11). Sunday for the Christians was not a day of rest, but a day of the Lord; it was the day for gathering as people of new creation to celebrate the eucharist. Not only did Christians name it the Lord's Day, but also the eighth day, a day which stood outside of the calendar, a day that pre-figured eternity in time. Sunday commemorated not what had happened in time to Jesus raised from the dead, but celebrated what Christians had become in light of the timely and timeless Christ-event. It was a feast of identity. So the day itself manifested symbolic time; end-time revealed and celebrated the new social identity of Jesus' followers.

If Christians do not regenerate time through repetitions of cosmogony, Sunday does renew time, not by a return to first creation, but by being a festival of fulfilled creation. The primacy of Sunday makes it iconic; as a ritual symbol it gives character to the rest of the week.

2. Feasts and Seasons. By the 2nd century, the feast of Easter had developed as an annual commemoration. While the focus was on the passion, death and resurrection of the Lord, the language of interpretation was analogous to the language of Jewish passover. Just as Passover, on which the messiah's coming was awaited, celebrated deliverance from slavery, Easter celebrated deliverance from sin and death through Christ, in expectation of his parousia. Both were feasts of redemption and hope.

While the Resurrection became a dominant motif, Easter was a unitive celebration of charter historical Christic events: passion, death and resurrection. What gives significance and constitutive character to the feast is not the chronological aspect of the sequence, but rather its relation to the transformative power within a social group.

The feast of Easter prepared for by fasting was a special time for initiation of Christians through the sacraments of baptism, chrismation and eucharist. Gradually there developed a prolongation of the period through fifty days of rejoicing, Eastertide, and a protracted period of ascetical preparation for initiates, Lent.

The entire cycle was the cycle of life, celebrated under ritual time with symbols of darkness and light, fast and feast, desert and mountain, flood and water, milk and honey, bread and wine. For the initiates the ritual time of the season is structured as a sequence passing from creative intentional crisis to transformation, a passage from a condition of death to one of life, i.e., entrance into a fullness of time.

The date of Easter was determined by historical calculations. The December 25

Nativity date may have arisen in similar fashion from an identification of March 25 with 14 Nisan, the date of Jesus' death in the Jewish lunar calendar according to Johannine chronology. In Rome the 4th-century feast of Christmas was also associated with the celebrations of the mythic Sol Invictus, the invincible sun. This temporal motif was reinterpreted through Christian images. The birth of the sun is now the commemoration of the birth in time of the timeless Son of God, the one who brings light to the darkness of sin.

If the Easter cycle was a cycle of life, the Christmas season, gradually prepared for by Advent, and prolonged through Christmastide, was the cycle of light.

The particular significance of annual feasts stems from the widespread notion of the year as a full completed unit of time. While some religions' annual celebrations herald an entirely new beginning through a return to origins, Christian annual festivals do not admit of a totally new creation, but an on-going transformation of Christian life in time and history. Time is primarily a mode of becoming.

3. While the celebration of Sunday framed the week and Easter and Christmas framed the year, there was another experience of time, that of the day. That ancient peoples lived by the natural rhythms of the day is not surprising, nor is it unusual that humankind's religious spirit would find sunrise and sunset, beginning and end of the day, apt times for prayer.

What is noteworthy is that the day itself was interpreted symbolically by Christians. Clement of Rome, writing toward the end of the 1st century C.E., speaks of how day and night make visible a resurrection. "Night goes to sleep, the day rises; the day departs, the night follows" (1 Clem 24:3). Time itself becomes a sacrament, a visible sign of an invisible reality.

While some NT texts emphasize the imperative of "pray always," other writings make note of specific times for prayer. In the early church a tension between praying always and praying at specific times existed—a tension that is perennial.

Gradually systems or patterns for prayer throughout the day developed, differing according to geographic locale and the lifestyle of the participants. Despite differences many of the recommended prayer times were interpreted christologically. Prayer at day's end took the setting sun as an antitype of Christ, the sun that never sets; prayer at the beginning of the day saw Christ the Sun of Righteousness; prayer at the third, sixth and ninth hours were variously interpreted in light of Christ's passion or the descent of the Spirit. In other words, the day itself was seen as sacrament, revelatory of the Christian message.

While the General Instruction on the Liturgy of the Hours uses the phrase "sanctification of time" in reference to daily prayer, the phrase is not apt; liturgical prayer is for the glorification of God and the sanctification of people. For Christians the rhythms of the day become lenses for seeing the reality of the Christ-life; prayer becomes an experience of union with God. If these ritual times differ from, e.g., the transformative power of Easter sacraments, they are similar insofar as they rearticulate an existing covenantal bond.

Pastoral Considerations

While the Roman Calendar: Text and Commentary presents a lofty vision of how the church keeps festival, often the actual celebration of Sunday, feasts and seasons, and day falls short of the ideal.

A. Erosion of Sunday

Culture competes with liturgical celebration. Three factors contribute to the erosion of Sunday. First, the spirit of individualism, while helpful in many areas of life, militates against Sunday as the day for assembly. The pressure of individualism affects not only the family unit, but also the church at prayer. Can we actually engage in a truly corporate act of prayer and praise? The tide of individualism can lead to Sunday shipwreck.

Second, culture presents a skewed vision of work and leisure. Research has shown that ancient Greek and Roman slaves and medieval European laborers worked no longer than an employee in the 1970s. Leisure time in bygone days was genuine leisure, but today many tasks that resemble work encroach on leisure. Free time becomes a respite to recoup energies for work. Further, people today are caught up in the work of creating happiness, fulfillment and self-realization. Can the Sunday once again be a time for communitarian liberating activity? If the cycle of production and self-fulfillment yields to a true feast, a useless time, then worship can celebrate what God is accomplishing in our time.

Third, corresponding to secular causes (e.g., ecology day) and economic trends (e.g., Labor Day sale), the church has adopted similar approaches with "theme" Sundays. Various church lobby groups—national and international—supporting their cause, usurp the calendar. Vocation Sunday, Catechetical Sunday, Mission Sunday, etc., become a round of church "sales," promoting what are surely worthwhile causes. Nonetheless the trajectory of the church year and lectionary is interrupted. Life is presented as fragmented, a sequence of unrelated events; information is overlaid on the day's character and the local church is left responding to decisions ad extra.

B. Erosion of the Season

Liturgical seasons seem to be taken more seriously today, especially Advent and Lent. The growth of the R.C.I.A., for example, has rightly shaped the Lenten season. There are, however, some difficulties which persist.

1. Anticipation takes precedence over prolongation. Advent and Lent may be strong seasons, but their prolongation often suffers. Churches would benefit if the rhythm of the Advent season extended through the Baptism of the Lord, and Lent became a gateway not only to Easter, but to Eastertide.

2. Intellectualization overrides experience. Often the seasons are intellectualized with parish themes and slogans. Far more spiritually enriching is the concentration on the ritual image. The image gives rise to thought. Those parishes which allow the liturgy to break open the dominant images of the seasons better facilitate deeper experiences of faith.

3. Historicism infects celebrations. Good Friday illustrates the point. The appropriate question for Good Friday is not "Were you there when they crucified my Lord?" but how is the passion, death and resurrection of Jesus as present reality a faith reality experienced among God's people today. Historicized celebrations distance congregations from the mystery, whereas genuine liturgy draws people into the mystery present.

C. Erosion of the Day

1. If ancient peoples lived by cosmic rhythms of light and darkness and saw in them icons of grace, today's Christians live by other rhythms, especially because we can control darkness with artificial lighting. Is it still possible to celebrate morning, evening and night as God's?

2. Culture views time pragmatically. Time is money. As the national treadmill speeds up, exhaustion and collapse become more prevalent, but time is for productivity. Daily prayer, however, offers non-pragmatic praise and intercession, celebrating time as God's gift. Entering into this contemplative vision of the world is a challenge that remains.

History moves according to God's plan; seasons and days move similarly. For the Christian, history, seasons and days can be interpreted as part of God's unfolding plan. The Christian is to cooperate with the movement of God's spirit that the risen Christ may be incarnated in all times.

LITURGY

Liturgy is the word currently used among Roman Catholics and among some Episcopal and Protestant scholars to describe the public worship of the church. In classical Greek, liturgy (leitourgia) had a secular meaning; it denoted a work (érگون) undertaken on behalf of the people (laós). Public projects undertaken by an individual for the good of the community in such areas as education, entertainment or defense would be called leitourgia.

The Greek OT, however, uses the word to refer to divine worship and to the ministry of the Levites. Similarly in Heb 8:2 it is used to refer to the priestly work of Christ. Christ is called "a minister (leitourgòs) of the sanctuary." In Rom 15:16 Paul speaks of himself as "a minister (leitourgòn) of Christ Jesus among the Gentiles.

Among Greek-speaking Christians in the first centuries of the Christian era, the word indicated both the ministry of church officials and any act of divine worship. But by the 4th century in the Eastern church the word was used to refer only to the celebration of the eucharist.

In the Western church the word fell out of use for many centuries. Other words such as "divine office," "ecclesiastical office," or "sacred rites" were used to denote worship services. When the word liturgy returned into use in the 18th century it referred to the entire cultic activity of the church. It is that usage which has been confirmed in the documents of the Second Vatican Council and in the 1983 Code of Canon Law.

Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy does not present a strict definition of liturgy but rather it offers several descriptions of liturgy, each of which illuminates a different aspect of this most important activity of the church. The liturgy is "the outstanding means whereby the faithful may express in their lives and manifest to others the mystery of Christ and the real nature of the true Church" (S.C., 2). The liturgy is considered "an exercise of the priestly office of Jesus Christ, that is, by the head and his members" (S.C., 7). From the liturgy "grace is poured forth upon us; and the sanctification of men in Christ and the glorification of God ... is achieved in the most efficacious possible way" (S.C., 10). The liturgy is "the summit towards which the activity of the Church is directed; at the same time it is the fount from which all her power flows" (S.C., 10).

The liturgy "does not exhaust the entire activity of the Church" (S.C., 9) nor is it the only time when Christians offer worship to God. The church engages in many other activities essential to its mission which are acts of worship: evangelization, catechesis, social action and various other forms of Christian service. But it is full and active participation in the liturgical celebrations of the church which is "the primary and indispensable source from which the faithful are to derive the true Christian spirit" (S.C., 14).

The liturgy comprises public, communal, ritual activities in which "the sanctification of man is signified by signs perceptible to the senses, and is effected in a way which corresponds with each of these signs" (S.C., 7). The council undertook to reform the individual rites of the church in order that their authentic form would appear. Thereafter when enacted by the faithful assembled they would speak with their own power to the present generation of Christians. This work called for careful historical reconstructions, theological understanding and pastoral sensitivity. It continues to require of the church careful adaptation of these inherited rites to various cultures in the contemporary world.

The proper enactment of liturgical rites requires attention to various symbolic language employed in ritual activity. The most obvious of these is the text of the rite. But other elements are also of great importance: music, gesture, vesture, various ritual objects and environment. The Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy has addressed these aspects of the liturgy in Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (1978) and Music in Catholic Worship, (1972, revised 1983).

Over the centuries various aspects of the paschal mystery began to be celebrated at different times of the year. In addition to Sunday, the original Christian feast, and Easter, the principal yearly celebration of the paschal mystery, other feasts celebrating different aspects of the mystery and life of Christ, as well as feasts honoring the Virgin Mary and the saints were gradually introduced in different parts of the Christian world. A yearly cycle of seasons and feasts known as the liturgical year was the result.

The amount and kind of Christian prayer that has been referred to by the term liturgy has varied over time. Today the term is understood to refer to the rites contained in officially promulgated liturgical books. This includes all seven sacraments: baptism, confirmation, eucharist, reconciliation, ordination, marriage and anointing of the sick. Also included would be the newly created rites of installation to the liturgical ministries of acolyte and reader, along with two rites for the dying: viaticum, the final eucharistic communion, and the commendation of the dying. The rites of Christian burial are included as well as the rites for the dedication of a church, for religious profession and the consecration of virgins. The church's official morning and evening prayer, the divine office, is included in the term liturgy as are the contents of the revised Roman liturgical Book of Blessings.

Liturgy is to be distinguished from private prayer and from other pious exercises. The celebration of liturgical prayer requires an assembly of the church. This means that at least two Christians must be present. Liturgical prayer must be related to the paschal mystery and it must be under the official regulation of the church (C.I.C., 834, 2). While many celebrations of liturgical prayer require leadership by an ordained person, some, such as the liturgy of the hours, the commendation of the dying, certain burial rites and many blessings do not.

Liturgical prayer is usually characterized by a spirit of praise and thanksgiving stemming from the assembly's recollection of God's saving deeds on behalf of God's people. It is also characterized by a lively hope in the final establishment of the Kingdom of God. Prayers of supplication as well as songs of lament are also regular features of liturgical prayer.

LITURGY AND CHRISTIAN LIFE

1. Introduction

(1) Meaning and Purpose

In the important sense that liturgy is an essential constituent of Christian life, the duality supposed by the title of this article is misleading. As involving formal, communal and explicit activities of Christian worship, liturgy may be distinguished from the rest of Christian life. Distinction without separation is central to the Christian and Jewish traditions. The further complexities of the relationship whereby Christian life is a form of worship and Christian worship a concentration and manifestation of the life will gradually emerge. The purpose of this article is to expose and explore these complexities as they have developed in the Christian tradition and continue to challenge the Christian community.

(2) Liturgy and Moral Theology

As a central theological discipline the study of liturgy is relatively new. In the Catholic tradition moral theology has been a major, to many a dominant, part of theology since the Council of Trent. Although there was no adequate alternative for a time, it would be a mistake to call moral theology a theology of Christian life in that phase. It was too narrow in scope, too juridical in form and too preoccupied with the failures of sin. Its relationships with liturgy were extrinsic and legal. The obligation to attend Sunday Mass, etc., and the requirements for validity and licitness in the sacraments were typical.

The renewal of moral theology and its ambition to become a theology of Christian life coincided by and large with the renewed interest in the liturgy and in its theological significance. Since Vatican II this has led to a more self-conscious interest by both moral theologians and liturgists in the interaction between worship and Christian action in the world. Eucharist and justice, a theme frequently addressed in contemporary theology, would have been unintelligible to moral theologians of an earlier generation.

These welcome developments raise a number of problems for theologians. How does one study moral theology, as theology of Christian life, in separation from liturgy and also in separation from doctrinal or dogmatic theology and scripture? Who can command the expertise to range over these disciplines and their historical evolution? Is some new alignment of specialties required? Should there be specialists in (provisional) synthesizing as well as in analyzing theological issues? Is team theology now necessary? What form could it take? It is necessary to mention these questions here to alert readers to the inevitably partial treatment of the relationship of liturgy and Christian life which is all that is possible here, not for reasons of space but for reasons of method and expertise in current theology.

(3) Outline

The main sections of this article will involve systematic exposition of the Christian tradition and its current understanding of the relationship between liturgy and Christian life. The biblical and historical basis will be for the most part integrated into the systematic. This in turn will open up some new questions or rather new aspects of perennial questions. Theology shares the pilgrim condition of its people, God's people. In this area theology has still much exploring to do. As the people of God moves on, so do theological areas of exploration.

The emphasis will be on the interaction of formal Christian worship and general Christian living in the idiom of contemporary moral theology with all the attendant limitations. After a brief comment on the biblical and historical background (II), the systematic sections will deal with (III) Liturgy, Life and the Kingdom of God; (IV) Divine Word and Human Communications; (V) Sacraments, Society and Environment; (VI) Kingdom Values and Sacramental Engagement. More exploratory sections will consider (VII) the problem of evil, sin and redemption in terms of consumption and communion and (VIII) the triune God and a holistic view of liturgy and life.

II. Biblical and Historical Background

A few biblical points need to be recalled and underlined. The Mosaic Covenant, central to Hebrew religion, maintained a close connection between response to Yahweh and response to the neighbor. Its charter in the Decalogue is so structured. The great 8th-century prophets, their predecessors and successors, insisted that liturgical worship of God was futile, indeed offensive, from a people who neglected and exploited the poor and the stranger. Justice (sedaqah) in life was essential to authenticity in liturgy. Love of God and love of neighbor belonged together.

The relation between love of God and love of neighbor was re-emphasized and deepened by Jesus and the NT. Prayer without care was valueless. Indeed the NT reader might be forgiven for taking love of neighbor as the only test of the authentic follower of Jesus (Matthew 25; Romans 13; 1 Corinthians 13, et al.). Such a life of love does, however, depend on love for God and particularly love by God, who first of all loved us (1 John 4). This love by God was manifested above all in Jesus' death and resurrection, recalled and shared in the liturgies of eucharist and baptism (1 Corinthians 12; Roman 6).

This basic connection between liturgy and life shaped the early church. Christian life was that of a member of Christ's body into which Christians were integrated in baptism and by which they were nourished in eucharist. Serious life-failures (sins) cut people off from such sharing unless they repented and were forgiven in the liturgy of penance. Christian moralists, subtle and sophisticated like Clement of Alexandria, or harsh and prophetic like John Chrysostom, maintained the crucial connection between true worship and good living. Liturgy as summons to, judgment on and empowerment of Christian life remained a church constant through the centuries.

III. Liturgy, Life and the Kingdom of God

The early Christian linking of Christian liturgy and Christian life emphasized, without always developing, the intrinsic nature of these links. Yet the incorporation into Christ by baptism, the nourishment in eucharist, the reconciliation in penance shaped from within the new life of the Christian its liturgical actions and its life-tasks. The seven sacraments were themselves related to critical needs and moments in Christian living and dying. The word of scripture carried its saving power and significance as part of every complete liturgy. In seeking an integrating vision for the celebration of liturgy and the challenges and achievements of life, Christians are bound to look to the Kingdom of God preached and inaugurated by Jesus. Despite its linguistic awkwardness in many modern contexts, God's Kingdom remains the most comprehensive and fertile symbol for the new pattern of worship and living established by God for humanity through Jesus Christ.

This Kingdom in its "already" stage is to be discerned and celebrated. In its "not-yet" stage it is to be prayed for, striven for and received. Christian liturgy in its remembering for the future symbolizes, realizes in word and sign the divine achievement of the kingdom in Jesus and prays for, anticipates its complete human and cosmic reception. Humanity and cosmos are opened to the healing and transforming presence and power of God by the community of disciples, taking bread and wine as Jesus' body and blood until he comes again. What is announced in word and signified in sacrament liberates human beings and cosmic forces to seek the fullness which is to be theirs by the self-giving of God. Human and cosmic fulfillment by the transforming presence and power of God is the scope of the kingdom as symbolized in the liturgy and expressed in the Christian living of the explicit and implicit followers of Jesus Christ.

IV. Word of God and Human Communications

The conventional duo of word and sacrament, with their Reformed and Catholic/Orthodox associations, can be useful in more detailed relating of liturgy and Christian life. Their essential belonging together must not be ignored if artificial divisions are not to emerge in Christian community and life as well as liturgy. In undertaking in this section then to examine in detail the relation between the word of God and human communications, the word-sacrament unity as proclaiming and realizing God's Kingdom must be kept continuously in mind. Human communications in turn are not to be understood in a narrowly verbal way but as meaningful expressions between members of the human community which are in turn forming (or deforming) of that community.

Liturgy as word of God and human language/communications share many of the great dualities of the human condition. Both are received (as gift) and achieved by human effort. For the word of God, gift and reception may be the more obvious aspect. Yet the decline of any single dictation theory of inspiration and the increasing awareness of the human context and the human struggle which shaped the diverse documents of the Hebrew and Christian scriptures reveal the other dimension of the Bible as word of God, human achievement. The role of the word of God in liturgy requires further human effort from presenter and listener if the gift is to be effectively received.

Human communication is clearly a matter of some human effort and achievement. Yet each receives the language of parents and larger community as a gift. The struggle to speak, to communicate, is the struggle to learn a language which has been handed on as tradition and gift. Even the great refiners of language in literature are operating out of gift, of a language given, of talents received, of people encountered and not invented, of experiences undergone, often without any advance planning, and certainly without predetermined conclusions.

The word of God and of humanity as gift to be recognized and accepted, celebrated and enjoyed, marks a critical connection between liturgy and Christian life. An ethics of speech and communication for Christians will start from this divine and human gift to be celebrated, in part by celebrating the donors. Praising God in liturgy and honoring one's father and mother and community in the language received draw together the liturgical and ethical. So did the Decalogue in the range of its ethical demands and in the original liturgical setting of its recitation.

Such connections suggest another important human duality, the personal and the communal. Language is a communal heritage to be used personally. Liturgy is a communal religious celebration to be entered into personally. The word of God in its liturgical character operates communally and personally for humanity. It was given to a people to become a people, a community of persons with personal gifts and responsibilities to be exercised in forming community.

Word and communications require an ethics that is personal and communal. Traditionally this has been an ethics of truth-telling, of not bearing false witness. The Hebrew origins of truth (emeth, fidelity of God to his word) and the NT concept of saving and liberating truth require a larger vision of word and truth for person and community. What we celebrate as the word and truth of God in liturgy must exercise its liberating, Kingdom function in the community of disciples, the church and in the larger human community. Personal authenticity, witnessing in word first of all to the truth that is in one and witnessing before the others, telling the truth, is an inescapable demand of the gift of truth.

Truth-telling as personal charge is not the whole of it. Truth-seeking and truth-sharing as personal and communal tasks belong just as much to the divine gift and human capacity. The ethics of truth for Christians insists on the seeking (e.g., freedom of research) and the sharing (e.g., freedom of information) in church and society in ways that often will be disturbing for power-holders. Stirring up the people with his kingdom-truth was one of the more serious charges against Jesus. His disciples may do no less. Liturgical celebrations of the word of God by people who refuse these tasks of truth deserve the age-old condemnations of Amos on "such solemn assemblies" (Amos 5). To dare to proclaim the word of God in public is to take on a formidable task, which can be discharged only by somebody open to the grace of that word. "Lord be merciful to me a sinner."

Word and truth as community-building and person-developing take narrative-form. Narrative of origins and subsequent history provides identity for community and person. The Hebrew and Christian scriptures perform that task for Christian community in its liturgy. Political and ethnic communities have their own narratives of origin and development. The Christian community narratives touch on human origins at their deepest and on human destiny at its furthest. They are faith-narratives shaping identity, and hope-narratives for a destiny which finally transcends (hi)story. Their truth does not conflict with the truth of other human narratives of origin (e.g., evolution, discovery and development of the Americas by Europeans) but it provides at once critique and transcendence. Purely human narratives of origin and destiny must be continually tested against the ultimate in the stories of God if they are not to become imprisoning ideologies like some forms of racism, nationalism and marxism. The word in liturgy offers judgment as well as challenge and empowerment.

The truth of divine and human word is not only the truth of history. The stories on which communities are built may be larger than any modern concept of evidence warrants without declining into ideological packages. The creative storytellers of the past and present are liberatingly truthful in ways not measurable by the contemporary canons of history. The authors of the books of Genesis and of Job, of the Divine Comedy and Hamlet, have a range of liberating truth for the sensitive reader or listener. Creative word of God moves close to creative human word in its fictional, dramatic and poetic forms. Liturgy and literature have more in common than an indifferent reading of the word of God and an equally indifferent homily may often suggest. The historic relationship of drama and liturgy is only one part of an association that has enriched Christian liturgy and human culture over centuries. Christian life and liturgy must take seriously this connection of prayer and poetry in church and home, in school, theatre and concert hall, indeed wherever two or three gather together. This interconnection concerns not just "high culture" any more than it concerns just "high" liturgy. Both liturgy and culture are essentially people's work. And the word of God did not come to any elite. It was the poor who were to have the gospel preached to them. The tension between the popular and the sophisticated in liturgy as in literature can be critical and creative for both.

The inauthentically high and the trivializing popular threaten language, living and liturgy in multiple ways. Christians as carriers of the word of God have their own responsibility to oppose the inauthentic and the trivial. A community whose communications are dominated by the trivial and the purely commercial (and inauthentic) is readily exposed to the living lie and beyond the reach of life-giving truth. When the trivial and the commercial combine to operate a pseudo-liturgy, Jesus is doubly denied before men. The word of God as a two-edged sword remains a permanent challenge to all genuine human communication in life and in liturgy.

V. Sacrament, Society and Environment

Word and sacrament are distinguishable but inseparable in celebration of Christian liturgy and in proclamation and promotion of God's Kingdom. The distinction centers on the sacraments as symbolic actions by the community, as enacted and ritual remembering, realizing and anticipating the work of God in Jesus Christ rather than simply verbal remembering. The words come too. Such enactment carries its own verbal narratives, songs of praise and words of blessing. As signs of the Kingdom, sacraments are liturgical dramas in which the cast is the Christian community but the director and leading actor is Jesus Christ. Encountering Christ in the sacrament has been a form of theological short-hand since Edward Schillebeeckx' work in the 1950s, a period of considerable renewal in sacramental theology involving people like Schillebeeckx, Rahner and Semmelroth.

The transforming presence and power of God in cosmos and history, which Jesus proclaimed and inaugurated as God's Kingdom, emerges in different forms in those actions of the Christian community called sacraments. The different forms relate to different stages and dimensions of Christian life and need. What is significant here is that they are directed to the in-breaking Kingdom of God and so to the transformation of person and community in history and cosmos, a transformation to be completed like the resurrection of Jesus in transcending history.

Sacraments are then gifts and tasks of the Kingdom. They are expressions of and resources for that transformation of humanity and cosmos which became available in the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. They are personal and community activities with personal and community implications. In recent times they had become almost exclusively clerical in performance and individualist and passive in reception.

There was the clerical confessor and individual penitent in isolated confessional, or individual priest with isolated-in-public recipient of communion at the altar-rail. The essential community dimension of liturgy and sacraments had been obscured to the point of vanishing. The implications for life were equally serious. An individualist and sometimes trivializing morality prevailed: eating meat on Friday was on the same sinful level as adultery or murder. Person was diminished as well as community.

The thrust of the current liturgy of the sacraments is to promote personal participation and community celebration. The inherent tension of Christian and human living, personal differentiation in fuller community, is seen to cohere with the liturgical structures of encounter between God and humanity. The gifts and tasks of Kingdom and humanity are revealed at their deepest in the sacraments. Person and community are judged in their failures, as well as healed and empowered for new life. For Christians their ethical tasks in society and cosmos relate closely to their engagement with liturgical celebration of the sacraments.

Personal and community events, the sacraments have clear cosmic connection. Earthly elements, the matter of traditional theology, are integrated with the symbolic action and words into a unified mediating of the divine-human encounter. Water and oil, bread and wine, breath and fire, light and darkness, place and time, are recognized in their earthly reality and at the same time transformed into instruments of divine activity. Respect for the earth and its elements, required by the Christian stories of creation, acquires a deeper range and urgency with their sacramental role. Sacraments, as signs of the Kingdom and so of God's design for the ultimate human community, also proclaim the current value and ultimate significance of planet earth and of the whole cosmos. A sacramental ecology is basic for Christians to an ecological ethics.

VI. Kingdom Values and Sacramental Engagement

The fuller relationship of sacraments and Christian life in ethical terms may be best pursued by exploring the connections between individual sacraments and what are sometimes called Kingdom values and virtues. These Kingdom values and virtues derive from the biblical tradition of the Kingdom in Hebrew and Christian scriptures. The primary Kingdom values and virtues are faith-hope-love, taken as a dynamic, interconnecting triad in the Pauline fashion. They are both entrance values/virtues and continuance values/virtues. To enter the Kingdom and remain in it, faith-hope-love are essential. Christian life then is first of all a life of faith-hope-love. Christian liturgy and sacraments require and confer faith-hope-love. Christian community lives by faith-hope-love. Christian faith-hope-love must themselves be expressed and developed in Christian life, in what have been traditionally called the moral virtues. No entirely satisfactory classification or ordering of these is available. A crucial value and virtue for Christians and one very akin to the primary virtue of faith is that of truth and truthfulness already discussed. For biblical, sacramental and contemporary social reasons three others are considered here: liberation and freedom; justice and equality; solidarity and peace. Their biblical and Christian background cannot be fully pursued here although it will emerge in discussing their connection with particular sacraments. Their contemporary social and political connections may be discerned by comparing them with the revolutionary political triad of the last two hundred years, liberté, égalité, fraternité.

(1) Liberation and Freedom

The coming of God's reign or Kingdom constituted a liberating event for the Hebrews released from captivity in Egypt (Exodus), for Jesus' disciples offered the truth that would set them free (John), for the early Christians set free indeed (Galatians 5 et al.). This liberation from poverty, privation and prison (Luke 4, Isaiah 61 et al.), from sin, death and the law (Paul), has once again become a central concern in Christian life and theology. As effective signs of this liberation, of this Kingdom both come and to come, the sacraments are to be celebrated by the Christian community as liberating events, liberating human beings to one another and to God. They form countersigns to oppression and enslavement, personal and communal. Baptism as the first sacrament of Christian life draws candidate(s) and community together in the liberating death and resurrection of Jesus, in the new exodus from slavery in Egypt. The liberating presence of God at baptism judges, challenges and empowers candidates and community to live together in freedom and to renounce the demons of oppression and exploitation. To celebrate baptism with Christ authentically, and to complete it in confirmation, community and candidate must be willing to go beyond the oppressions of race, class and sex. "For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither slave nor free, there is neither male nor female; for you are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:27f).

Other sacraments such as penance and eucharist offer their own witness to the liberating power of Jesus' death and resurrection. So does the sacrament of anointing in face of the spiritual, mental, emotional and physical ills to which humanity is heir. Embodiment and sexuality, interpreted too often in human history as entrapment for human beings, enjoy their own Christian liberation in the sacrament of marriage, symbol of the free surrender of Jesus Christ out of love for his friends (Ephesians 5). Freedom to serve the community liturgically and otherwise and so the Kingdom is what is at issue in the sacrament of ordination. As that freedom cannot be restricted by race or class, one must question if it can be restricted by gender?

In sacramental theology today, the community-church is the primary sacrament, at once sacrament of Christ and of humanity transformed in Christ. It is as a liberated and liberating people that it is to be effective sign of the Kingdom of God and of the new humanity. In liturgy the community-church acts precisely as such a sacrament of liberation. The individual sacraments must bear their own witness to this liberated and liberating community and so set the standard and provide the capacity for the divine and human work of liberation. The community-church is in turn challenged to be its sacramental self by the liberation movements abroad in the world.

(2) Justice and Equality

Justice (sedagah, dikaosune) is one of the central themes of the Hebrew and Christian scriptures, of the Mosaic Covenant and the New Covenant in Jesus Christ. The outcome of all that is described in another great Pauline word "justification," making just parallel to liberation and setting free. The community of disciples, the primary sacrament, becomes the community of the just. What is to be witnessed and realized is the breakthrough of divine justice in human person and community, the person and community which are Jesus Christ.

Without rehearsing the relations to all the sacraments as with liberation/freedom, it will be more useful to examine two aspects of the biblical tradition of justice, equality and preference for the poor. Created in the image of God, recreated in Jesus, the New Adam, all human beings enjoy basic equality. Paul's rejection of age-old division and discrimination in Gal 3:28 underlines the impact of Jesus' dismissal of power and privilege to be replaced by openness to the least. A certain paradox emerges here in Jesus' leveling mission. Nobody is to lord it over others ("and yet the last shall be first and the first last"—Mk 9:35). Jesus is picking up on the divine strategy of Yahweh in his call of Israel, a fragmented group of slaves lost in the imperial grandeur of Egypt. Indeed he is rehearsing the strategy of Abba in choosing a marginal person and place ("can anything good come out of Nazareth?"—Jn 1:46), and a person destined to be rejected as a criminal on a cross, as the "corner-stone" of the new temple, the Kingdom come.

To establish equality in glory for all through identification with the poor and deprived has been the strategy of Yahweh, Abba and Jesus. It must remain the strategy of the community of disciples. The community's liturgy and sacraments are intended as symbols of that strategy.

The interactions between liturgy/sacraments and equality/preferential option for the poor in Christian life must be mutual. Each dimension of liturgy and life is challenge and empowerment to the other. The liberating effect of liturgy and sacraments discussed earlier relates closely to equality and preference for the poor. In more political terms, human rights, which can be great protectors of the weak, are human freedoms due in justice to persons. The overlap between liberation, justice and preference for the poor has been critically developed in liberation theology. It may be less obvious in Christian liturgy where wealth and power may be displayed and indulged in counter-sacramental ways, at least where one is speaking of sacraments as effective signs of Christ. There is still much need for dialogue on liturgy and Christian living before their implementations of Jesus' strategy is manifest and effective.

(3) Solidarity and Peace

For all its revolutionary resonance fraternité has a certain hollow ring today. This partly because, of the 18th century triad, it is one which has had least evident effect. The wars and massacres of the 20th century alone make a mockery of that 18th-century aspiration. The gender block also suggests a change in terminology. Solidarity has attained in current usage a sense close to fraternité and the biblical fellowship (koinonia). Responsibility for and to others, interdependence, living community are all suggested by solidarity with its ecclesial and civil, national, international and even cosmic dimensions, all in the same ecological boat. Only one earth for the only one human community.

The biblical shalom suffered some impoverishment in the translation process: through eirene, pax and into peace. Originally it probably meant something like "flourishing in communion" for Israel first and then for all the nations as well. It was both Yahweh's gift and Israel's (humanity's) task. It became in turn Jesus' gift ("My peace I leave with you"—Jn 14:27) and the disciples' task ("Blessed are the peace-makers"—Mt 5:9).

The relation between solidarity and peace in the sense of shalom is obvious and close. The gift which the community-church has received is also its Kingdom task. The community of solidarity and shalom is to provide the pre-view, the first earnest (arabon, 2 Cor 1:22) of the final flourishing in communion. This shalom was promised to Israel and definitively offered in Jesus Christ. This community is called and empowered to be sacrament of solidarity and shalom. In its self-manifestation and self-realization in the liturgy and in the individual sacraments, its peace-giving and peace-making character is to be manifest and realized. It is to be sacramentalized.

Eucharist and penance have clear peace-giving and peace-making capacities. They are both in the traditional sense sacraments of reconciliation, even if their forms of celebration have not always made that clear. In the interchange between liturgy and Christian life this reconciliation dimension has been frequently over-individualized: "my sin, my confession, my God, my forgiveness." Social division, oppression and sinfulness have been obscured. More seriously the administration of the sacraments and the call for reconciliation have too often endorsed deeply divisive and oppressive conditions. Performing signs of reconciliation without any conversion of heart and structure renders these sacramental signs futile. God is mocked and humanity is more deeply injured. Christian life in genuine search of peace and solidarity will challenge with Amos such inauthentic liturgy.

VII. Communion in a Consuming Universe

Christian life and liturgy occur in the context of sin and evil. The great symbols of God's achievement in Israel and Jesus, liberation, salvation, redemption, justification, new creation, make clear this presence of evil to be overcome. Jesus' own suffering and death which are basic to Christian life and liturgy ("If anyone will come after me"—Mk 8:34; "Do this in remembrance of me"—Lk 22:19) confirm the reality of evil in the world and the need to overcome it. The book of Job wrestles with one of the most poignant and puzzling aspects of evil in the world: why do the innocent suffer? The power of that book rests eventually in its acceptance of the mystery of this suffering but set off against the transcendent power and goodness of God. The passion and resurrection narratives in the NT follow much the same pattern. Suffering is real and puzzling, in Jesus' case (and in many other cases) undeserved. But out of that goodness may come, as the loving and creative power of God prevails. And the final enemy, death, has been overcome in God's raising Jesus to life as first fruits for all.

Liturgy properly insists on the goodness of God and creation in psalm and hymn, prayer and creating, saving narrative. Praise and thanksgiving are primary liturgical functions. So are they primary functions of Christian life. Yet the tragic dimension of life continues to assert itself and to demand liturgical response. In the liturgies of forgiveness and of entrusting the dead to their merciful God, this tragic dimension finds some response. Yet the pervasiveness and depth of evil in the world, its connection with the very dynamism of life itself, has not been fully addressed so far in this examination of liturgy and life.

"God looked on the world and saw that it was good." After the creation of humankind "that it was very good." Yet this becomes rapidly the world of evil and sin, of human division ("she did it"), alienation from nature, fratricide (Cain and Abel), breakdown of all communications (Babel) (Genesis 1-11.) The fertile myths of Genesis and other Hebrew works were struggling to reconcile the good work of a good creator with the undoubted presence of destruction and evil. Job undertook the most searching examination of this puzzle in life and thought and, while he banished the easy answers, he too had to bow before the mystery.

In a different world with its own fertile, truth-bearing myths, such as evolution, and its own potent, destructive myth of consumerism, a rather different symbolic and imaginative effort may be needed to relate evil to Christian life and liturgy. Something analogous was attempted by Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (The Hymn of the Universe). His emphasis was on the predominantly good creative and evolving world with less attention to the interweaving evil. One of his great liturgical images was his "Mass on the world," a eucharist of the universe, a fitting anticipatory sign for his vision of the coming Kingdom in the emerging Christogenesis. The richness of his vision remains to be developed in various ways by the Christian community in its life and liturgy.

A less simply hopeful, less optimistic vision than that of Teilhard de Chardin would undoubtedly look with awe and respond with praise to the created masterpiece of our physical and human world. It would also look more closely and less uncritically at the consuming, destroying, nature of that world.

In what Teilhard called the biosphere, the sphere of living things or the chain of life as it is called in ecological terms, the dynamism of survival and growth is that of consumption. All living beings live off other living beings. To survive is to consume the others. Such consumption extends, as certain environment crises indicate, from that of the ozone layer to that of fossil fuels, from the living to non-living. We live in a self-consuming universe. And it is no decisive mark of human difference that we as humans may consume non-human or sub-human reality and avoid consumption ourselves. In the end we too are consumed. From dust to dust. Earth-consumers, we are finally consumed by earth. And in the interim we humans are frequently busy consuming one another. The necessary and natural consuming of the baby at its mother's breast has its own beauty and value. The malice or weakness which issues in adults or even children consuming one another, from the most intimate relations of marriage and family to the more distant but no less potent relationships of politics and commerce, provides so many modern parables of sin. Natural consumption with its inevitable killings and dying for plants, animals and humans, reaches the new human sphere of tragedy and sin in human hatred and war, power-seeking and oppression, self-indulgence and other-destruction. What we may lightly call a consumerist world is deeply pervasive of us all in continuity with structures of the universe. The culling of seals has its parallels in the periodic culling of humans we call war or massacre. The dignity, freedom, equality and solidarity for which humans are created in the Jewish and Christian vision reveals their own tragic role in self-destruction.

The history of Yahweh's relation with Israel marks a struggle to overcome human self-destructiveness within what remained a consuming universe. Israel's consumption of the prophets, God's messengers, drew Yahweh further into the self-giving task of forming this people as God's own people, from there to all people as God's. Last of all God sent God's son (Hebrews 1). The entry to God in Jesus into this destructive and consuming universe was the final challenge. As human, Jesus was a consumer from his mother's breast, through childhood and adolescent needs to table-fellowship with publicans and sinners.

His person and ministry were directed beyond the inevitable and necessary biological consumption: with "living water" by which one will never thirst, for the Samaritan woman (John 4); for the disciples "fruit for eternal life" (John 4) and "the bread which comes down from heaven" (John 6). In the more mundane synoptic accounts he confronts consuming and consumed humanity by feeding the hungry, healing the sick, raising the widow's son, forgiving sinners. All these are signs of the Kingdom, of the new presence and power of God which could overcome the trap of simply consuming and being consumed. Not yet though. Not until he himself was drawn into the circle of malicious human consumption, betrayed and deserted by his closest friends, mocked and tortured, given a show trial, had a notorious criminal preferred to him, unjustly sentenced and cruelly executed. The savage consumerism of the powers and the powerless, the political and religious leaders and the mob, could indulge their consuming lust in his passion and death.

God had died, had been consumed by human destructiveness. Consummatum est. It was all over. Yet the night before he died "as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed, and broke it, and gave it to the disciples and said: 'Take, eat: this is my body.' And he took a cup, and when he had given thanks he gave it to them saying, 'Drink of it; for this is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins'" (Matthew 26).

"And after the sabbath, toward the dawn of the first day of the week, Mary Magdalene and the other Mary went to see the sepulchre . . . the angel said to the women: 'Do not be afraid: for I know that you seek Jesus who was crucified. He is not here; for he has risen, as he said '" (Matthew 28).

Jesus' passion narrative is framed by the last supper and the resurrection. His gift of himself to his disciples in bread and wine, his body and blood, in memory of him, until he comes again, is the critical acceptance and transcendence of our human consumption of one another. Consumption must yield to communion at least in symbol. The ultimate reality of that symbol, of communion beyond all consumption, only emerges with the resurrection of Jesus. When consumption had done its worst in death, indeed in killing unto death, the life-giving power of God raised Jesus to communion with God and with all in ways which human destructiveness could never again touch. The age of natural and sinful consumption had been conquered in the dying and rising of Jesus. The symbol, the sacrament of that conquest had already been given in eucharist. The central liturgical act of the community of disciples became a gift of communion to enable communion to overcome consumption. The final overcoming must wait until he comes again. Doing this in memory of him establishes communion now in and through the very consumption of the elements, of the body and blood of Christ. By taking consumption on at its most destructive Jesus has shown how symbolically or sacramentally, in a life nourished by liturgy, communion may be sustained in a world still dependent on controlled consumption, but exposed to the temptations of uncontrolled, self-indulgent and exploitative consumption.

VIII. In the End God: The Danse Macabre and Perichoresis

Liturgy and Christian life belong to history but are not confined by it. The irruption of God into human history has opened it up to the transhuman, the transcendent and the eschatological. The coming of the Kingdom now eschatologically shapes Christian life and liturgy in many significant ways. Both are expressions of hope for final liberation to one another and to God, for ultimate flourishing in communion, a communion that completely transcends consumption. Liturgy and life look to resurrection and to eternal life, life with God and with one another in eternal fulfillment. In the end, God. Of course in the beginning God also. And in the interim God who became human, who took on the conditions of history and surrendered to the consuming universe to establish true communion.

God thus proved to be a communion God for creation but also for the creator. The community of God which was gradually revealed/discerned was the mystery of triune God. Yahweh, the God of Israel and of Christians, emerged for Christians as triune, one God in three persons: Abba/Father; Word/Son/Redeemer; Spirit/Sanctifier.

In liturgy and in life it is possible to worship the one God, saying abba in Christ by the Spirit's gift of daughterhood and sonship. In concept and language the triune God is less easy to deal with. Further connecting points with the mystery may be developed in liturgical celebration and Christian living by attesting to the character of communion within God and its exemplary and empowering force for those created in God's image.

The traditional doctrine of the Trinity as it developed in the early centuries stressed the differentiation, the equality and the unity. Many theologians see in this a model for human community with differentiation, equality and unity keeping close to freedom, equality and fraternity in both their recent political and more ancient biblical senses. A trinitarian shaped liturgy addressed to Abba through Christ by the Spirit provides in turn a model and power for human society. Developments in freedom, equality and solidarity in human society make the divine image in humanity more evident and challenge liturgy to do likewise.

In the idiom of consumption and communion, the triune God forms dynamic communion without consumption. This is the eschatological operating in history. What Jesus did, what we recall in liturgy, what we attempt in living is to realize the communion that breaks through the destructive circle of consumption that the divine communion may be shared with all, that God may be "all in all."

The Eastern tradition had a term for the dynamic triunity of God, which may take us a little further. Perichoresis referred to God's dynamic community in terms of the dance, the moving, harmonious and loving interchange of the three persons. Dance sometimes figures significantly in liturgy. As image for liturgy and life it is rich in possibilities. Connecting the divine perichoresis with the dance or the loving musical movements of liturgy and with the harmonious, loving movement of life at its best, can illuminate the gifts and tasks of Christians. The invitation to the dance, finally to the eternal and divine perichoresis, is offered in history. But the offer is never closed. The historical dance may not be self-enclosing. The range of partners is all humankind. The poor, the sick, the racially or sexually excluded, all these must be sought out by Christians to be genuine partners in the dance of life. Only thus will the danse macabre be replaced by perichoresis. Liturgy and Christian life are enabled and called to be exhibitions and expressions of that dance of life. Together, in mutual confirmation, challenge and empowerment, they create a widening circle of human involvement in the dance of God.

LITURGY AS PROPHETIC

It might seem strange to speak of liturgy as "prophetic." Prophets seldom praised and often lamented priests, false worship and ritualism.

Your piety is like a morning cloud, like the dew that early passes away.
For this reason I smote them through the prophets,
I slew them by the words of my mouth;
For it is love that I desire, not sacrifice, and the knowledge of God rather than holocausts (Hos 5:4-6).

Jesus distanced himself from the role and title of the priesthood and its association with empty sacrifices. Is it possible to hold liturgy and prophecy together? And in spite of the history of abuses in all religions and churches, is it possible for liturgy be prophetic?

We shall explore three common denominators of liturgy and prophecy: 1. both proclaim God's word; 2. both read the signs of the times and either judge or console; 3. both look to present and future.

Proclaiming God's Word

In Hebrew the prophet (nabi) is one called to speak on behalf of another, in this case to speak with passion on behalf of God. Of course, God's message of covenant and grace and justice is in turn speech on behalf of us. Prophets speak God's message especially on behalf of the poor and victims of oppression. In speaking on God's behalf they inveigh against all idols, all principalities and powers, all personal and social systems of oppression and sin which are not divine. For prophets only God is divine. Every system is subject to prophetic judgment.

Prophets include more voices than the authors of the canonical books of the prophets. The Jews see Moses as the greatest of Hebrew prophets. Although Jesus may not have seen himself as a prophet since he spoke on his own authority, his disciples saw him as a prophet (cf. Lk 24:19). Prophecy continues in those who see God's presence (or absence) in our wounded world and speak boldly on behalf of God for a new world where God reigns and only God reigns.

Prophets speak not just in word but in deeds. The Hebrew word for "word" (dabar) means word/deed. The prophets' most powerful preaching is often in symbolic action. These actions function as sacraments, e.g., Jeremiah buys a field (Jeremiah 32); Ezekiel turns to mime (Ezek 4:1-5:4, 12:1-7, 21:23f, 37:15f); Jesus eats with sinners (Lk 15:1-3). Their entire lives are prophetic, e.g., Hosea's tragic marriage. No chasm lies between word and deed. Like sacraments, they effect what they signify. Jesus is the Word made flesh. His life enfleshes God's message of self-giving love and life through death. Jesus' life is his great parable. We think we know how stories will end, but great storytellers and parable makers throw a curve at the end—workers overpaid, prodigals embraced, Samaritans who heal. We know that Jesus' cross and death are the end, but God throws us a curve—life out of death, power out of powerlessness, fullness out of emptiness. That is what the parable of Jesus' life proclaims for him and for us.

In that sense, liturgy and sacramental actions also speak of covenant, grace, and justice on behalf of God. "...the liturgical (sacramental) event is best understood as a communications event. It rests upon the conviction that a liturgical service as a whole, together with its constitutive elements, says something" (Searle, "Liturgy as Metaphor," p. 98).

We noted that the great lament of prophets is the gulf between what rituals say and who the people are and what they do.

I hate and despise your feasts,
I take no pleasure in your solemn festivals,
When you offer me holocausts,
I reject your oblations....
But let justice flow like water,
Integrity like an unfailing stream
(Amos 5:21-22, 26).

The actual dabar of the people meant worshipping idols and victimizing the poor. The "din of their chanting" and "strumming on harps" (Amos 5:22) failed to drown out their treachery and infidelity. Empty ritualism. Liturgy as lie—worship without witness, celebration without service, liturgy cut off from life, supper without the washing of feet, and Jesus-and-me divided from Jew-Gentile, male-female, slave-free, black-white, Wall Street-Skid Row, cleric-lay, Anglo-Hispanic, East-West, North-South.

The challenge is to stop lying and to become and do what we say at liturgy. That lie persists until we cease seeing sacraments as magic moments (words of institution) done in sacred spaces (sanctuaries) performed only by sacred persons (ordained) and consisting only of sacred things (bread and wine). The great sacraments are not things but persons—Jesus, sacrament of God, and church, sacrament of the risen Christ (L.G., I; S.C., 5). These persons are "visible signs of invisible grace" who enflesh God's message of covenant love and justice. No lies. No gulf between worship and justice, liturgy and life. Dying/rising in church buildings is our dabar outside those buildings. Just as Jesus most powerfully proclaims that message at meals, so the church acts as prophet at eucharist where bread broken and grapes crushed witness that we wash feet and share the brokenness of sisters and brothers crushed and crucified.

The bishops of the United States published a pastoral letter entitled To Teach As Jesus Did which called the church to preach his message of good news. The church most boldly proclaims that message not in word but in word/deed, in action, when the community welcomes to table those welcomed by Jesus—to eat as Jesus did.

The seven derivative sacraments, therefore, are best seen as actions of a people (initiating, eating/drinking, reconciling, healing, marrying, leading, dying/rising) and not as static objects (water, oil, bread and wine). The theology of transubstantiation too often reified sacraments into objects. Only the priest was "in on the action," and his action was often limited to changing those objects. The community was passive. Even the verbs spoke passivity—we "received" sacraments, we "attended" or "saw" Mass. If the community is the basic sacrament, we transform the seven sacraments from objects to actions of that community, from nouns to active verbs.

Vatican II in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy insists, therefore, that communal celebrations with every sacrament take preference to individual and quasi-private rites (S.C., 27) so that the community can act. That constitution called for "active participation" (S.C., 14). That means far more than words and song. It means being and acting as sacrament of the body of Christ broken for the life of the world. It means prophecy.

When the church gathers to celebrate and proclaim that message in ritual, the community remembers and resounds that message from its privileged source—the scriptures, the word of God broken open by homily for human life today. Homilies do not exegete texts; they exegete our lives in light of scriptural texts. Vatican II restored the "paramount importance" of God's word and called for a "warm and living love" of scripture (S.C., 24). All liturgies are to proclaim God's word. If the scriptures are full of prophecy, liturgies are full of prophecy. We hear again and again prophetic voices decrying liturgies as lies.

We not only have scripture as our privileged text. Although church is the basic sacrament, among the other sacraments the church sees the sacraments of initiation (baptism/confirmation/eucharist) and the eucharist (the repeatable sacrament of initiation) as privileged. The eucharist, seen not as things but as the body of Christ continuing to break body and shed blood for our sisters and brothers, is the "summit" and "fountain" of the Christian life (S.C., 10). Many insist that the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (R.C.I.A.) is the most prophetic document since Vatican II. Ralph Keifer claims it calls us from a penitential spirituality centered on the sacrament of penance, which held sway for centuries, to a spirituality of paschal mystery and baptismal vocation rooted in adult initiation (Mass in a Time of Doubt). The R.C.I.A. calls the entire community as sacrament to be about its prophetic mission of proclaiming good news (R.C.I.A., 4:9). It calls the community to a galaxy of rites and prophetic, symbolic acts—to welcome, sign senses, proclaim the word, bless, present our life of faith and prayer, elect, scrutinize, exorcize, bathe, anoint, eat and drink. At the heart of prophecy is our experience of paschal mystery, the dying/rising of Jesus. All sacraments celebrate that, but their source is baptism/ eucharist. In paragraphs that follow when I speak of liturgies as prophetic, I assume that this is especially true of initiation and eucharist. When the church as sacrament truly proclaims the dying/rising begun in initiation and renewed in eucharist and extends that to our wounded world, we shall be akin to prophets who speak God's message of covenant and grace and justice.

Signs and Seasons for Judgment or Consolation

Both prophets and liturgies deal with human life. They read the signs of the times. Those times are full of both agony and ecstasy. Viktor Frankl says humans are so evil that they built the gas chambers of Auschwitz but so magnificent that they entered the chambers proudly with the "Lord's Prayer" or the Shema Israel on their lips. John Shea claims humans stand tall but never so tall we aren't brought to our rear by a banana peel. Ernst Becker complains that we are torn apart as body/spirits; we are "angels who crap."

Since prophets know both the horror and the glory, their message changes with the times. Especially in pre-exilic times they are prophets of judgment, doom, threat and punishment (Amos, First Isaiah). During the exile they are often prophets of hope and consolation (Second Isaiah). After the exile the message is restoration and pardon (Haggai, Zechariah). Jeremiah both judges and consoles; he is sent to "tear up and to knock down, . . . to build and to plant" (Jer 1:10).

Therefore, if judgment and consolation/restoration mark the polarities of prophets responding to signs of their times, they will mark our liturgies. Liturgies will name the dark and the light side of human life.

First, concerning judgment, Bruggeman insists that prophets do not scold. They complain and grieve. They are not nags ranting from outside the people. They stand in compassion with the deathliness gnawing at the people and "bring to public expression the dread of endings, the collapse of our self-madness, the barriers and pecking orders that secure us at each other's expense, the fearful practice of eating off the table of a hungry brother or sister," and the ultimate consumerism of consuming each other (The Prophetic Imagination, p. 50).

Bruggeman states that Moses as prophet first assaulted this deathliness by his radical break from the imperial reality of Egypt sustained by gods which were immovable lords of order. He frees Israel both from the religion of static triumphalism and the politics of exploitation. "In place of the gods of Egypt, creatures of the imperial consciousness, Moses discloses Yahweh the sovereign one who acts in his lordly freedom . . . and is captive to no social perception. . . . Religiously, the gods were declared no-gods. Politically, the oppressiveness of the brickyard was shown to be ineffective Moses introduced not just the new free God and not just a message of social liberation. Rather, his work came precisely at the engagement of the religion of God's freedom with the politics of human justice" (The Prophetic Imagination, pp. 16, 17).

Bruggeman claims Israel soon lost that engagement with the development of a "royal consciousness" that saw the Davidic king as necessary agent of God's purposes. The primary vision became the well-being of the king and not the role of advocate for the marginal.

He sees that imperial model in our culture present in a civil religion where we identify national purpose with God's purpose. It is in an economics of affluence with some so well off they can eat their way around pain; in a politics of oppression which hears cries of the marginal as noises of kooks and traitors; in a religion of immanence and accessibility with God so present that we don't notice God's hard message, absence, banishment; and we reduce the problem to psychology (cf. The Prophetic Imagination, p. 41). During the period of the kings, that is the economics, politics, and religion condemned by prophets. Jesus condemns it in Roman empire and Jewish church. Liturgy as prophecy will echo that rebuke today for both churches and states.

That is hardly what happens in practice. Liturgies still lie. Church becomes cozy with state and wary of prophetic critique. The church of martyrs was clearly counter-cultural and rebuked the idols. Ralph Keifer says: "Again and again it was the problem of idolatry as a fact of virtually all spheres of public life which forced the church to remain a separate enclave within the culture of the ancient world. It is clear, both from the refusal to compromise with the idolatrous state and the immense concern for such things as the concrete care for the poor, that the church's evangelization of individuals had nothing in common with modern approaches to a gospel of personal salvation which elicits no concern for justice, and which gladly joins in contemporary versions of emperor worship" (Ralph Keifer, "Christian Initiation: the State of the Question," p. 144).

Our emperor worship means: "We are as American as the pollution of Lake Erie, as beaches littered with flip tops, as houses not forty years old and in shambles, as health care that sucks away the lifeblood of the destitute. We are as American as the quick solution, the throwaway art, the despising of all that is not obvious, instantly perceptible, and of immediate pragmatic relevance. We are as American as the tolerance of all ugliness except human misery, which can be hidden away in nursing homes and ghettos and buried under rhetoric" (Keifer, "Christian Initiation . . .," p. 143).

To confront that America, prophetic liturgy proclaims and creates a different world. When we celebrate the Judaeo-Christian world of Moses and Jesus, we again engage the religion of God's freedom with the politics of human justice. When we tell and renew the stories of exodus from slavery to freedom and of paschal mystery through death to life, we name and create a world which shatters idols and empires. That is the power of story, myth, and ritual language. We shape the nature of things by naming and calling it so. That was God's great gift to Adam—to create by naming. In liturgy we name our world as the place of God's freedom and human justice. We proclaim, "This God and no other! This world of the beatitudes and no other!"

"Lord have mercy" is a weak rendering of Kyrie eleison. It also bears the meaning of "the Lord reigns." In times when the emperor (the kyrios) was god, Kyrie eleison was a Christian protest. "No, Jesus is Kyrios. God is King. In this space, in this world, God reigns."

In empires of American consumerism and Marxist materialism, with imperial armies bearing arms of nuclear holocaust, divided by racism, sexism, nationalism and every other "ism," with resources diverted from wars on poverty and homelessness to wars on drugs, liturgy proclaims that God reigns in this people. That God judges nations and people on what we do for the hungry, thirsty, naked, prisoner and stranger (cf. Mt 25). That is why pioneer liturgists, such as Virgil Michel and H.A. Reinhold, could not conceive of liturgy divorced from justice. Some liturgical concoctions today seem aimed primarily at producing feelings and fellowship. These trailblazers saw liturgy's purpose as changing worlds, creating worlds, judging all imperial worlds of tyranny and oppression and celebrating God's world of freedom and justice. Kyrie eleison!

Is the contemporary church capable of such liturgical prophecy? Would Amos and Isaiah judge our church and rituals with their usual outrage? In practice, does liturgy lie?

For example, Keifer claims we are in danger of baptismal lying, because the R.C.I.A., that supposedly prophetic document, is so far from present pastoral practice that it is either "suicide or prophecy of a very high order." "The clear intent of the reform is that initiation should be experiential, not only for those who are initiated, but also, and equally important, for the local church which does the initiating. Here is the pastoral difficulty. The conception of church as local communion in faith, as vehicle of the experience of the risen Lord, as eschatological sign, exists only in official text and clerical rhetoric, not something perceived by the great majority of churchgoers." (Keifer, "Christian Initiation . . ." pp. 141-142).

What Keifer says about baptismal lying Tom Conry says about eucharistic lying. We spew forth theologies about all the baptized called to their dignity as people of God, yet eucharistic liturgy often treats them as serfs back in Egypt and the empire: "There is an announcement that everyone should stand and greet our celebrant" and he walks solemnly to the front of the room . . . in a procession that is clearly the remnant of court royalism. He turns to the assembly from his point in front of everyone where only he has access to the important ritual furniture and his first substantial ritual action is to forgive the assembly for being in its own space; "for all the times we have gotten out of line, Lord have mercy." . . . A mere two minutes and thirty seconds into the liturgy we have already said everything about that parish's theology of the importance of baptism that there is to say" (Conry, "How Can We Keep from Singing?" p. 33).

In light of this and other less than stunning stabs at renewal Mark Searle asks: "Is the concept (and practice) of 'active participation' a genuine step towards the redistribution of responsibility in the church, or is it a means to heading off more radical forms of participatory democracy? . . . Is the revised liturgy serving the pedagogical role of fostering a genuinely new consciousness, or is it a way of perpetuating the old imperialist theology in more attractive packaging?" (Searle, "The Pedagogical Function of the Liturgy," p. 347).

Therefore, before rhapsodizing about liturgy as prophetic we need to submit liturgy itself to critique and the prophecy of judgment. Prophets lament a royal consciousness and imperial power wherever it appears.

Second, when times call not for judgment but consolation/restoration, liturgies welcome, reconcile, and heal with prophetic compassion and mercy. As Hosea lures his unfaithful wife back, so will the church lure those who are alienated or in sin: "When that day comes . . . I will betroth you to myself forever, betroth you with integrity and justice, with tenderness and love; I will betroth you to myself with faithfulness, and you will come to know Yahweh" (Hos 19, 21-22).

In a homily echoing that prophetic word Bishop Untener calls the church to be a sacrament of God's faithful love and mercy: "There has been a prevailing wind in the Church moving us away from softness and toward severity. But John XXIII brought a fresh emphasis on mercy and love. But we're not sure how to handle this new breeze . . . Our tendency will surely be to stifle it . . . You will pass on the tradition of a Church remarkable for its tenderness and mercy" (Kenneth Untener, "A Church Remarkable for Tenderness and Mercy," Origins, 16:47, p. 826).

The church doing eucharist is the sacrament of reconciliation. If our church moves toward severity, at prophetic liturgies of consolation/restoration we need to eat as Jesus did, with the most rejected and alien, e.g., the woman "who had a bad name in the town" (Lk 7:36-50), prodigal children (Lk 15:11-32), Zachaeus the hated tax collector (Lk 10:1-10), motley crowds at wedding feasts (Mt 22:1-10), entiles finally sharing loaves with Jews (Mk 8:1-10), all brought to a climax by broken disciples who recognize the Lord in shared brokenness when they break bread (Lk 24:13-35). That church as prophet will hear the self-righteous grumbling heard by Jesus: "This man welcomes sinners and eats with them" (Lk 15:3). It is even more scandalous if we recall that then and now at meals in the Middle East both host and guest begin with rituals of heaping praise on each other. Jesus is sacrament of God's love at those ritualized meals. At our meals he calls us to set no condition for restoration than the one which he set—accept the Father's mercy.

Robert Hovda describes the prophetic witness of such meals in a society riddled with cutthroat competition and upward mobility. "Where else in our society are we all addressed and sprinkled, bowed to, incensed, touched and kissed and treated like somebody—all in the very same way? Where else do economic czars and beggars get the same treatment? Where else are food and drink blessed in a common prayer of thanksgiving, broken and poured out, so that everybody, everybody shares and shares alike?" (Liturgy 80, June/July 1982, p. 6).

Much of Christian liturgical life proclaims reconciliation in the broadest sense—within our body/spirits, with all creation, each other, the community of faith, all races, nations and males/females, with God. When everybody is somebody at font and table, all liturgy consoles/restores with that wonderful prophetic vision of St. Paul: "There are no more distinctions between Jew and Greek, slave and free, male and female, but all of you are one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 4:28).

Bruggeman also makes helpful distinctions regarding the psalms which also speak on behalf of both God and us. Psalms are the cult of Israel, the liturgical response to varied times and seasons. They resound in Christian liturgy. He names poems of orientation—sung in seasons of well-being and evoking gratitude for the constancy of blessing, e.g., Psalm 145. Second, there are seasons of hurt, alienation and darkness evoking rage, resentment, self-pity which appear in psalms of disorientation, e.g., Psalm 13. The Faithful One and the Judge promises to be in the darkness with us, and we find it transformed by the power of relentless solidarity. Bruggeman quotes Elie Wiesel: "Poets exist so that the dead may vote." They do vote in the Psalms. They vote for faith. But in voting for faith they vote for candor, for pain, for passion—and finally for joy" (The Message of the Psalms, p. 12). Bruggeman adds that the church continues to sing songs of orientation in a world disoriented, "a frightened, numb denial and deception that does not want to acknowledge or experience the disorientation of life" (p. 51). Third, there are seasons of surprise which overwhelm us with new gifts of God, when joy breaks through despair. We sing psalms of new orientation, e.g., Psalm 30.

If Israel in her cult sings of orientation, disorientation, and new orientation, a prophetic Christian liturgy also attends to all these seasons. As Bruggeman notes, the church is better at psalms and liturgies of orientation praising God for the way things are than at entering the death side of paschal mystery in disorientation or the surprise/resurrection side of paschal mystery in new orientation. Cultic songs of orientation are often creation psalms praising God's creative fidelity found in the present as generosity, continuity, and regularity. Chaos is not present and is not permitted a hearing. At times this might not be a high and noble faith. It may celebrate the status quo, the unfair way that the powerful arrange life. It can be social control. Bruggeman proposes that if we praise God in doxology as always good and in charge, never acting, we become worshippers who are docile, passive, a satiated, conformist community without energy nor vocation nor hope, who only treasure and defend "the way things are" (cf. Bruggeman, Message . . . , pp. 25-28).

Tom Conry complains that much contemporary church music is only about praise in a world well oriented and devoid of death and terror. He finds: "lots of songs about the comfort of Jesus, about good-old-faithful-God, lots of music consisting of melodic and textual appeals to 'come and worship, come and praise, honor the Lord, sing a joyful song, praise, honor, wisdom, praise, alleluia, alleluia, alleluia and more praise.' It puts one in mind of Goethe's declaration that 'those who cannot love must cultivate flattery.' . . . C. Alexander Peloquin says that all of this music can be reduced to the lyrics: 'I like Jesus, you like Jesus, why the hell don't we get together?'" (Conry, p.33).

Prophetic liturgy which prays and sings and names a world on behalf of the God of the oppressed believes not just in civil religion which goes "from strength to strength" but in a God present in the darkness, weakness, emptiness, in times of disorientation. In those deathly places when it is clear that we cannot save ourselves, God gives new life.

How much longer will you forget me, Yahweh? Forever?

How much longer will you hide your face from me?

How much longer must I endure grief in my soul? . . .

But I for my part rely on your love Yahweh . . . (Ps 13:1-2, 5).

In a culture often closed to change and surprise, in which self-made messiahs don't need grace, prophetic liturgy also prays and sings and names a new world of unearned grace, a new orientation.

"Yahweh, my God, I cried to you for help, and you have healed me You have turned my mourning into dancing, you have stripped off my sackcloth and wrapped me in gladness and now my heart, silent no longer, will play you music; Yahweh, my God, I will praise you forever" (Ps 30:2, 11-12).

In celebrating times demanding judgment or crying for consolation/restoration and seasons of well-being, chaos, or surprise, prophetic liturgy makes the absolutely critical connection between liturgy and life, worship and justice. It bridges any gap between the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy and the Constitution on the Church in the Modern World by linking liturgy with life in our world. In liturgy we proclaim that: "The joys and the hopes, the griefs and the anxieties of the people of the age, especially those who are poor or in any way afflicted, these too are the joys and hopes, the griefs and anxieties of the followers of Christ. Indeed, nothing genuinely human fails to raise an echo in their hearts" (G.S., 1).

Present and Future

Here again, tensions between judgment and consolation/restoration emerge. From the perspective of time and history the tension is between immanence (restoration) and transcendence (judgment), the "already" and the "not yet," the horizontal and the vertical, realized eschatology and proleptic eschatology, liturgy as present "pledge of future glory" (S.C., 47) and liturgy as sustenance of a pilgrim people on the way to the future.

Concerning immanence, prophetic consciousness sees that God is already present in the signs of the times. Prophets see the future and what it will bring because they see so clearly the present. They summon us to hope and consolation because they not only see the evils of the present time (calling for judgment by a God who summons us to a better future); they see the movements of God in Christ Jesus through the Spirit acting in our times to create a world marked by poverty of spirit, thirst for righteousness, fullness of mercy, and the making of peace (Mt 5:1-10). Jesus is risen now. The Spirit gifts us now. We are Christ's body now. The reign of God is happening now. The future is present now.

That brings us back to a vision of church and liturgy as sacraments which enflesh the life of God now. Prophetic liturgy speaks in behalf of God in the present and acts symbolically in the present to inaugurate the future now. Eucharist is the eternal banquet now. Initiation makes us one now and anticipates St. Augustine's vision of heaven—"one Christ loving himself." Reconciliation and anointing heal divisions and wounds now. Marriage of two in one flesh enfleshes Christ's eternal love and union with the church now. Most important, the church is sacrament of Christ and his presence in the world now.

That is why the Catholic difference (shared by other sacramental churches) is the experience of incarnation and sacramentality—the discovery of God in Christ through the Spirit already enfleshed in creation and human life which are sacraments of God's life and love. That experience leads to seven, not just two sacraments. It means celebration of God's presence in all kinds of "smells and bells," in Mary and the saints, in ministries of the baptized, the ordained, popes and peasants. Ultimately, it means that human life is the place of God's presence and revelation. Prophets see the mystery of God in all human moments of dying and rising. They see what the poet Gerard Manley Hopkins calls "the dearest freshness deep-down things." John Shea says: "There are moments which, although they occur within the everyday confines of human living, take on larger meaning.

They have a lasting impact; they cut through to something deeper; they demand a hearing. It may be the death of a parent, the touch of a friend, falling in love, a betrayal, the recognition of what has really been happening over the last two years, the unexpected arrival of blessing, the sudden advent of curse. But whatever it is, we sense we have undergone something that has touched upon the normally dormant but always present relationship to God" (An Experience Named Spirit, Chicago: Thomas More Press, 1983, p. 98).

Prophets call us to remember God's promise and God's covenant to be with and in God's people in such moments. "I will adopt you as my own people, and I will be your God" (Exod 5:7). "I am in my Father and you in me and I in you" (Jn 14:19). "You are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a consecrated nation, a people set apart" (1 Pet 2:9). Liturgies of consolation/restoration and psalms and prayers of orientation and new orientation celebrate that prophetic memory and vision of the covenant with an immanent and faithful God always present to our lives now.

If immanence and sacramentality, however, constitute the Catholic difference, they also bear the Catholic peril—idolatry. The Reformation was in essence a protest and a prophetic judgment against equating the human with the divine—church with reign of God, popes with Christ, sacraments with God's actions which worked magically without the need for faith, the present with the future. Reckless talk about an immanent God who is already present in a realized eschatology can shatter hope in a more just future for all God's people. It can identify human structures of both church and state with divine presence and yield new forms of imperialist social control. In that world, "the present ordering, and by derivation the present regime, claims to be the full and final ordering. That claim means there can be no future that either calls the present into question or promises a way out of it. Thus the fulsome claim of the present arrangement is premised on hopelessness. This insidious form of realized eschatology requires persons to live without hope" (Bruggeman, The Prophetic Imagination, p. 63).

It can radically rend asunder the constant prophetic commitment to monotheism; for prophets there is only one God, and only God is God. Prophets forever remind us that the future is God's future, and only God can make us one at the eternal banquet which we hope for and anticipate at eucharist. In that regard the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy is strong on language of anticipation but woefully weak in naming ethical imperatives implied in the chasm experienced in liturgy and life between "the already" and the "not yet."

Prophetic liturgy will name those gaps, call to conversion, challenge the status quo, and proclaim God's promise and God's future. It will proclaim a transcendent God who is always more than and beyond our rites of church and state. It will proclaim God's word, with judgment or consolation/restoration according to the signs of the times, and interpret the present while stretching us into the future.

JAMES B. DUNNING

LITURGY IN A TECHNOLOGICAL AGE

Introduction

Before the liturgical reforms of Vatican II, the American Catholic community expressed itself primarily along paraliturgical lines, its most meaningful religious symbols appearing in a host of popular devotions. The Sorrowful Mother, the Infant of Prague, the Nine First Fridays, the Miraculous Medal, Benediction and the Forty Hours: these and many others flourished. Alongside these devotions, four unquestioned characteristics symbolized a good Roman Catholic: meatless Fridays, attendance at Sunday Mass, no birth control except for the rhythm method, and no divorce. The Latin Mass expressed the mystery of the bond with God by providing a required weekly event wherein one could pray in quiet while the priest conducted the sacred ritual.

Vatican II called this individualistic model into serious question, arguing for and eventually legislating reforms aimed at a much more radically communal form of worship. Now, a quarter century later, the success of the reforms remains spotty. Some extraordinary parishes, helped by the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (R.C.I.A.) and other programs for renewal, exhibit a vibrant liturgical life. Others appear to have lost touch with the vital core of their faith life. The old popular devotions have died but the symbolic expression of the new liturgy has failed to engage their hearts. Significant numbers of younger adults have opted for the "silent schism" of nominal church membership, often with the complaint that the Mass seems insipid and offers little help in coping with the challenges of their lives. For the Vatican II liturgical reforms to succeed in renewing Catholic life, it would seem necessary to address this question: "how can the church integrate its commitment to a communal liturgy with contemporary symbolic experience?

In the years since Vatican II it has become commonplace to observe that liturgy depends, for its vitality, on a meaningful intersection of symbol and community. Catholic tradition is rooted in the fleshy, sacramental relationship between God and human beings. The church flourishes only when it lives as a community of shared symbolic meaning. This essay begins by asking how Catholic communities of shared symbolic meaning operated in the pre-Vatican II era and how the council's liturgical reforms have interacted with contemporary technological and societal changes to influence present liturgical experience. With the help of this broad cultural perspective, I will conclude with several observations about trends that may point the way toward a deepening of popular liturgical renewal.

Popular Devotion Before the Council

The devotions depended on symbols that were publicly shared within a culture. Symbols such as the Sacred Heart, the Infant of Prague, the Lady of Lourdes, created frames of reference in which people could relate their ordinary lives to God, where daily life—success and failure, birth and death, violence and tranquility—had a meaningful place. They were “popular” because they were local, rooted deeply in the fabric of a people's history. Like many good wines, they did not travel easily. In contrast to Latin sacramental worship, with its monolingual embodiment of church universality, devotions called to us from the depths of our unique traditions. They reminded us that while we were one human family, the people of God, we were also beautiful in our diversity.

Catholicism has always provided a home for both experiences. It is not surprising, nor is it theologically unsound, that Mary appears in the cultural clothing of many lands, nor that many saints reside in particular home towns. “God,” so this tradition seems to say, “loves the flesh and blood of our local existence.” Jesus, the Galilean, emerges as the universal Christ precisely from his fleshly embrace of a historically unique starting point. Seen from this perspective, local popular devotions participate in the core tension of Christianity: Christ, human and divine, culture-bound and Lord of all. Our centuries-long experience wherein the hierarchical church responds to and evaluates popular devotions, sometimes approving them and sometimes not—one thinks of the “appearances” at Guadalupe and at Necedah, Wisconsin, as contrasting examples—continually renews the mystery of the incarnation.

The conditions that rendered this division of church experience into sacramental life (Latin and global) and paraliturgical devotional life (local and fleshy) have, however, been transformed in the decades since World War II. In the process the balance between sacrament and popular devotion has been disturbed so that a new understanding of the tension between locality and universality has become necessary.

Popular devotions require, as a necessary precondition, the existence of a local culture which I shall call a “community of shared symbolic meaning.” Before any saint or any vision of Jesus or Mary can spring forth as a focus for daily faith life there must first exist a people who perceive reality within the same frame of reference. Human beings, as Karl Rahner reminds us, are symbolic at the core and our experience of God and of the meaning of life itself withers when reduced to fleshless abstraction. The popularity of devotions such as the Sacred Heart depended therefore on the existence of a cultural frame of reference in which holy symbols, such as the Heart of Jesus, carried deep religious meaning.

In the United States we have often called that common culture "ghetto Catholicism." U.S. parishes typically reflected specific European immigrant traditions. Thus, in the 1950s my small mill town in northern Wisconsin supported four parishes—French, German, Irish, and Polish—even though the presence of the Staudenmaiers in the Irish parish presaged the breakdown of those tight ethnic communities. Popular devotions "worked" because the Catholic ghetto "worked." That is to say, Catholics experienced themselves as a distinct people within the larger civil order that was the United States of America. We knew who "we" were. Our insularity provided the cultural frame of reference in which mid-century American Catholic practices—devotions, parish life, the place of priests and sisters—made sense. Of course this oversimplifies the matter considerably. Ethnic American Catholics felt powerful ambivalence about their relationship with the larger social order. We longed to prove ourselves good Americans even as we held on to our Catholic identities.

A Crisis of Community and of Symbol

A host of developments, which gained significant momentum during World War II, began to revolutionize ghetto life. This extraordinarily popular war galvanized most citizens and provided a common goal that challenged old prejudices. The pressure of national emergency broke open the nation's subcultures as previously disparate men and women mixed on an almost equal basis in the armed services and the factories of the land. The same forces that began to erode black-white racial barriers served a similar purpose among Catholics, other Christians, Jews and people of other faiths, or none. Indeed only a decade and a half later, our ethnic search for American legitimacy reached its apogee in the election of an Irishman and a Catholic to the presidency.

One could say that Catholic devotional life began to decline as American Catholics began to settle into the mainstream of the nation's cultural life. As far as it goes, this is a valid and helpful interpretation. Taken alone, however, it overlooks two related technological developments which complicate devotional life still further. The first has to do with an extraordinary change in the way people today experience "community" and the second with the pervasive assault of contemporary advertising on symbolic meaning.

The Changing Sense of Community

In the United States, as in Western Europe, the 19th and 20th centuries saw a gradual shift from a village life-style toward an urban, national, and global frame of reference. The change followed in the wake of the new rail, air, and auto transport networks, on the one hand, and electronic media (telegraphic wire services, telephone, radio, television, computer networks) on the other. Village and neighborhood culture prevailed as long as the transportation of information was limited to the speed of physical bodies traveling only a few miles per hour. Because information moved so slowly, most social interaction took place within walking distance of where one slept at night. Thus, whether one lived one's entire life within the same neighborhood or migrated to distant places, one's primary frame of reference was necessarily local. One depended for friendship, for livelihood, and for cultural meaning, on the handful of people close by. Letters to loved ones, given the uncertain and painfully slow transportation systems of the time, were no substitute for the daily interactions that constitute the stuff of ordinary life.

In the past few decades, however, community has become increasingly individualized and fragmented. Who, one might ask, belongs to "my community"?

As sociologist Claude Fischer has observed, once-local communities have begun to be replaced by "support networks," an array of individuals with whom we communicate via telephone or transport systems. Support networks differ most radically from village and neighborhood communities in that the members of one's support network often do not know one another. They constitute a meaningful social entity only in their relationship with "me." How readily do such social groupings share a common symbolic life? Friends and colleagues represent not only many ethnic traditions and work experiences, they are religiously pluralistic as well. What forms of popular devotion can emerge from affiliations that are polyglot in the most basic sense of the term?

Twentieth-Century Advertising

Historians of advertising commonly agree that, in the U.S., World War I marked the rise to dominance of consumerist advertising. The new style grew in part from an obsession with social control as the nation's traditional elites reacted to the eastern and southern European immigrants who surged across the U.S. border at the century's beginning. Social psychologists, progressive-era politicians, and proponents of scientific management sought to Americanize the newcomers by such "melting pot" processes as the Ford Motor Company's English language schools and by the study of human motivation to control what appeared to be chaotic cultural pluralism. At the same time, the maturation of mass production in the automotive and electrical appliance industries demanded a revolution in the selling of goods. U.S. citizens, it was felt, had to be taught to consume the flood of new products.

In response, advertising agencies gradually shifted from a rational style that focused on product qualities to emotional appeals that called attention to product benefits. The advertiser's task, in the new dispensation, was to forge a powerful affective bond between consumer and product.

Semiotics, a recent theory of the process of symbol making, provides a helpful model for explaining one of the most common agency procedures. Advertisers faced the task of taking a product which has an already-accepted symbolic meaning and attaching some other cultural symbol to that meaning in order to enhance its marketing appeal. Before 1920, for example, the wildly popular Model T carried the symbolic meaning of a tool for transportation: durable, economical, and easy to repair. The symbol worked well for Ford because the vast majority of buyers were purchasing their first car. But the saturation of this virgin car market in the next decade led General Motors and the advertisers it employed to search out other American symbols that might enhance the car's affective appeal. They chose four: individual freedom, independent mobility, sexual prowess, and rising social status. Their advertising success created a new symbolic entity in the nation. The car began to be seen less as a transportation tool and more as what ad specialists call an "ego-enhancer," a commodity that dispensed freedom, mobility, sexuality, and status.

Advertising historian Roland Marchand (Advertising the American Dream) has identified a host of such symbolic transfers that emerged during the 1920s and 1930s. One type, of particular importance when considering popular devotions, was the application of sacred symbols to secular products. Thus the 1925 Oldsmobile was shown surrounded by radiant beams streaming from heaven. Listerine ads adopted the ritual of family night prayers ("now I lay me down to sleep"). Marchand offered this observation of the cumulative effect of such symbolic transference on public discourse: "To the extent that they attained the numinosity of "sacred symbols," the visual clichés of advertising acquired what cultural anthropologist Clifford Geertz describes as the "peculiar power . . . to identify fact with value at the most fundamental level." In so doing, they pushed forward the process . . . of appropriating traditional symbols for modern ends" (p. 284).

Today however, after seven decades of the process, we find ourselves living in a society whose capacity for symbolic meaning has become jaded. "The cultural impact was reciprocal. Products gained temporary enhancement, but traditional symbols were 'trivialized.' And the process has continued, so that now, in our own time, it seems inconceivable that traditional and sacred symbols can be further impoverished" (ibid., emphasis added).

This sketch necessarily oversimplifies these patterns. Much more could be said about the complex interrelationships between the technological, social, political, and business factors involved in advertising's new consumerist style. Still, even this brief overview raises troubling issues. How might the church retrieve the basis for a community rooted in sacred symbols in a culture whose technological infrastructure fragments community even as its best funded form of public discourse, advertising, demeans the symbols themselves?

Recent Substitutes: Cults and TV Entertainments

Given the cumulative effect of World War II and these several technologically-based developments, it should come as no surprise that Catholics have begun to lose their taste for the old popular devotions. In their place a number of popular practices, embodying widely divergent ideological perspectives, appear to be responding to our malnourished symbolic condition. Consider the role of cults and TV evangelists, on the one hand, and soap operas and music videos, on the other.

Cults such as the Moonies or, more tragically, James Jones' fatal Jonestown movement, share central characteristics with television preaching. Both forms of prayer life offer the security of a symbolic ghetto at a very high price: namely, surrendering adult judgment and creative interaction with nonmembers. Jonestown's fatal flaw was its jungle isolation. Cult members lacked the balancing perspective of outsiders who, if taken seriously and listened to reverently, might have warned the group of its suicidal tendencies. Television evangelists, though much less extreme in their articulation and necessarily less effective in enforcement, often call adherents to cultic uniformity by savage attacks on outsiders who do not share the group's beliefs. Their appeal to Catholics is suggested by a startling recent statistic claiming that Catholics make up almost forty percent of the audiences for the television church.

The hunger for meaningful symbols may well explain the enormous popularity of two of the most popular current offspring of 20th-century advertising techniques, television soap operas and music videos. Many young people are mesmerized by the always compelling, sometimes savage, high pressure symbolic rituals of the videos. The soap operas' formulaic dramatizations of "ordinary life," routinely punctuated by episodes of sexual turmoil or violent conflict, attract an audience from across the age spectrum.

These trends, fundamentalist faith and intensely secular drama, mark the existence of a serious crisis of community and symbol for the contemporary world as a whole and for the church in particular. Insofar as it is cut off from ideological diversity and ancient tradition, cultic community tends toward fanaticism. The marketing of high-intensity televised symbols, for its part, erodes viewer capacity to find meaning in the ordinary fare of non-televised life. Neither form, in its present state, offers much hope for a renewal of Catholic faith life.

Indeed, they threaten the core of Vatican II's achievement. By convening the council, John XXIII reaffirmed the essential incarnational character of Jesus' call to "read the signs of the times" (Mt 16:2). The human reality of the Jesus of history cannot be replaced by an abstract and a-historical faith that ignores the culturally specific graces and temptations of subsequent eras. Recognizing this central faith requirement, the council inaugurated what Karl Rahner has called "the third major epoch" in Christian history: the "world church" (the first being the Jewish-Christian era and the second, the many centuries of a Europeanized church).

From this perspective, the shift from a universal Latin liturgy to a host of local vernacular forms, together with a correlative de-emphasis on popular devotions, can be seen as the incarnational response to a world rendered radically interactive by the world-shrinking transport and media technologies noted above. For citizens of the 20th century, the cultural isolation of earlier village life can no longer serve as a valid form of local context within a universal and monolingual church. Thus the attempt of cults and TV evangelists to reconstitute an essentially village form of communal life is in fact a rejection of the church's essential vocation to read and respond to the signs of the times. Christians must learn to be polylingual, must learn the radically new art of translating faith from one vernacular to another. Symbolic uniformity has, in short, lost its innocence and no longer offers Christians a faith-centered alternative.

Just as important and perhaps even more challenging, the church must learn how to bond contemporary polycultural experience with the ancient traditions of sacred symbols and articulated theological wisdom. This task is rendered more challenging still by the complicating factor of consumerist advertising and its omnivorous appetite for fresh symbolic meat.

A final factor is perhaps most ominous. There is today in the U.S. a hitherto unprecedented division of Catholics along the lines of economic class as earlier immigrant groups enter the middle and upper middle classes and recent immigrants, Hispanics in particular, are relegated to a Catholic underclass. Middle class Catholics appear to have bought into the fragmented individualism so aptly described in Habits of the Heart (Robert Bellah, et.al., 1985) at about the same rate as their non-Catholic peers. Thus, to reconstitute the Catholic church into one community of shared symbolic meaning calls for a conversion at once affective and economic.

How then might the church, in countries especially where consumerist advertising and new technologies dominate, integrate Vatican II's call for communal worship with the chaotic symbolic experience of contemporary believers?

Conclusion

A number of post-World War II movements, such as Cursillo, Charismatic Renewal, and Marriage Encounter, indicate a widespread desire for a more communal manner of faith life. It is possible, given the cultural climate in which they exist, that such movements could drift into cult-like group individualism. Thus, participants in these movements are faced with the same challenge that confronts the church as a whole, namely, to create forms of communal life which are characteristically Catholic, forms that foster local, daily and physically-interactive symbolic life while remaining open to the holy pluralism of the diverse cultural perspectives found in the universal church community.

Three recent trends offer considerable hope for the success of such a venture. First, our centuries-long commitment to theater, music, and the arts generally continually drew from and contributed to popular media. In keeping with that tradition we find a movement toward increasing attention, at once critical, contemplative and creative, to current media of all forms. Given the council's mandate to reincarnate the church in the modern world, it is not surprising to see Catholic media research centers and diocesan sponsored media specialists. No less surprising, John Paul II represents our first media-conscious pope. Still in an early stage of maturity, these developments respond directly to one of the major areas in which a healthy faith life must engage.

Attention to the media finds its necessary complement in the remarkable renewal of interest in the tradition of spiritual direction which has, for centuries, taught the art of discernment. Thus, the R.C.I.A. and similar adult renewal programs foster individual responsibility for following the journey of one's faith life as an essential requirement of communal faith life. In a world of overworked and polyvalent media symbols it is hard to imagine how faith life could do without spiritual direction's habits of discernment.

Perhaps even more to the point, spiritual direction provides a striking example of the recent renewal of theological and ecclesial commitment to narrative. Spiritual direction involves the integration of two modes of narrative, telling the story of one's inner journey to the director and situating that personal inner journey in scriptural narrative. More than almost any other human activity, storytelling calls forth fresh and vital symbols which offer access to the self-transcendent dimensions of human life. As such, the very process of spiritual direction promises to renew jaded imaginations.

The liturgical renewal begun by the Vatican II emerged as a necessary faith response to the radically changed cultural context in which 20th century believers must learn to live an incarnate faith life. It may well be that the related post-conciliar developments noted here: struggles with multi-cultural church governance, a faith-centered interpretation of media, and renewed emphasis on spiritual direction and narrative theology, will prove to be key areas in which the church is finding its way to integrate the passion and turbulence of culture-specific affective life into the faith life of the universal church.

LORD'S PRAYER, THE

It is now more commonly recognized that the evangelists relied upon pre-Christian Jewish prayer forms in fashioning what has come to be called the Lord's Prayer or the Our Father. The Lord's Prayer has been handed down at two places in the NT. It is found in Matthew as part of the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6:9-13), and in Lk 11:2-4. As the gospels of Matthew and Luke were being composed (c. A.D. 75-85), the Lord's Prayer was being transmitted in two forms which are in essential agreement, though one is longer than the other. The longer form is found in Matthew and also, with minor variations, in the Didache (8:2), while the shorter form is found in Luke.

The structure of the Lord's Prayer is made up of: (1) the address; (2) two "thou-petitions" in parallel (in Matthew there are three); (3) two "we-petitions" in parallel, both forming an antithesis; (4) the concluding request. The doxology is not found in Luke's account, and in Matthew it is not present in the oldest manuscripts. It is first found in the Didache. It would be incorrect, however, to conclude from this that the Lord's Prayer was used without some concluding words of praise to God.

In the course of Christian history, the Lord's Prayer has come to be used universally and regularly in personal and liturgical prayer. Hippolytus advocates its use as part of the daily prayer of the Christian. It was not a part of the eucharistic liturgy, however, prior to the middle of the 4th century at the earliest, its use being first clearly indicated in Cyril of Jerusalem's Mystagogical Catecheses. Since the practice in Jerusalem at this time is probably representative of the ancient church as a whole, it is likely that the Lord's Prayer was a part of the Lord's Supper and, together with the creed, is one of the elements of instruction to which catechumens were introduced just prior to, or immediately following their baptism.

Beginning with John Chrysostom, liturgical commentators in the East refer to praying the Lord's Prayer as a preparation for communion. In the West, both Ambrose and Augustine assume its use for the same purpose. From about 400 on, the Lord's Prayer has occupied a place in the communion rites in eucharistic worship. Though its place in the communion rites has not always been uniform, the Byzantine liturgy and, since Gregory the Great, the Roman liturgy, put it immediately after the anaphora.

Early interpreters emphasize that it is appropriate to pray the Lord's Prayer as a preparation for communion in the body and blood of the Lord, highlighting the petition for forgiveness of sins and for daily bread. The connection between daily bread and the heavenly bread, or eucharist, is often made in the early liturgical tradition, thus providing Christian writers, such as Ambrose, with occasion to advocate more frequent reception of communion.

Not surprisingly, the Lord's Prayer came to be viewed as the paradigm for all Christian prayer, as exemplified in the treatises on prayer in the writings of Cyprian in the West and Origen in the East.

The contemporary usage of the Lord's Prayer in liturgy includes, but is not limited to, the following: (1) as the creed is presented or "handed on" to the candidates for baptism during the week after the Sunday of the first scrutiny, so the Lord's Prayer is represented to them during the week after the third scrutiny; (2) it is recited regularly as part of the liturgy of the hours; (3) it concludes the general confession of sins, done in the form of a litany, in the use of the second and third forms of the revised Rite of Penance (1973); (4) the Lord's Prayer opens the communion rite in both the Roman and Byzantine liturgies, but in the Byzantine liturgy, it is integrated in that place into a prayer for unity in faith.

The revised Roman rite stands in continuity with the ancient custom of praying this prayer as a preparation for communion, affirming the association between daily bread and the eucharistic bread received in holiness through the forgiveness of sin which is petitioned in the Lord's Prayer. The presiding minister offers the invitation to pray. The assembly says the prayer with him. He alone adds the embolism, Deliver us . . ., which the assembly concludes with the doxology. The embolism, developing the final request of the Lord's Prayer petitions, in the name of the entire community, deliverance from the power of evil. The invitation, the Lord's Prayer itself, the embolism, and the doxology are sung or recited aloud.

As an expression of personal or liturgical prayer, the Lord's Prayer is an affirmation of the sovereignty of God and of human dependence upon the divine initiative. Praying the Lord's Prayer entails a recognition of human interdependence as well as the interdependence of all creation. It is an acknowledgement of human failure and sin, and of the need for forgiveness, both human and divine. It is a bold statement of confidence in God's graciousness in the face of evil, and a proclamation of belief in the power of love which prevails over all evil.

The Lord's Prayer expresses confidence that the age of salvation is not being realized. It expresses the conviction that the consummation of God's reign is bestowed in advance, and that the divine presence breaks into human life in the present. Praying in the name of Jesus with childlike confidence, trusting that God's presence will be revealed, and that the heavenly "Abba" will provide daily bread and grant forgiveness from sin, is itself a manifestation of the rule of God for which Christians pray.

MARGINALIZED, LITURGY AND THE

Referring to a person or group as marginalized is a practice of rather recent custom. To which person or group the designation applies is not always as clear as it may seem at first. The marginalized may be said to be those who are at the margins or edges of a social body which, from this perspective, may be viewed as the mainstream. The reasons for marginalization vary. Marginalization may result from the poverty which relegates one to a lower economic status or class than that of the mainstream. The mentally and physically handicapped are often viewed as marginalized because of their difference from "normal people," the healthy and robust in mind and body. Gender or sexual identity may also place one at the margins of a social body: women in a "man's world," and homosexuals in a world where heterosexual relationships are the norm, same-sex relationships being viewed as unnatural or abnormal. A person or group may be marginalized because of race or language.

In the Roman Catholic church those at the margins include, but are by no means limited to, single persons in parishes where the virtues of marriage and family life are extolled in sermonizing week after week, the divorced and remarried, laicized priests, and couples in inter-church marriages.

Common to all of these persons and groups is the element of difference from that which is identified as acceptable, regular, normal or status quo. Such differences more often than not place persons and groups in positions of powerlessness in the face of a predominant ideology, economic system or political structure. The marginalized are those who have little or no access to the power at the core of a dominant ideology, or at least their access to it is more restricted than that of the privileged. As a result, those at the margins have little or no determination over the systems of meaning and value, the predominant modes of perceiving and being, which, nonetheless, profoundly affect them. From this perspective, they may be said to be voiceless.

Related to the notion of the marginalized are the terms "the alienated" and "the oppressed." The first of these signifies much the same as what is designated by the term "marginalized," but from an economic or political perspective, while the latter bears the connotation of persons as victims of a more active form of violence.

Another related term, "scapegoat," signifies the worst form of marginalization. With origins in the Mosaic ritual of the Day of Atonement (Leviticus 16), the scapegoat was one of the two goats chosen to be sent out alive into the wilderness to die, the sins of the people having been symbolically laid upon it, while the other was appointed to be sacrificed. The scapegoat is the person or group who is blamed for the failure or wrongdoing of others, and cast out or expelled from the social body. Such a person or group is often already distinct from the main body by reason of national identity, social status or religious practice. In the history of Christian countries, the way in which Jews have been used as scapegoats is particularly significant.

The NT is particularly instructive on the subject of liturgy and the marginalized, if the various accounts of the meal, and of Jesus partaking of food and drink, are integrated into an understanding of the eucharist and, by extension, all Christian liturgy. Jesus eats with sinners (Lk 5:29-32; Mk 2:15-17; Mt 9:10-13), and feeds the crowds (Mt 15:32-39; Mk 6:30-44; 8:1-10), thereby indicating his willingness to be in a relationship of communion with them. The sharing of a meal with them indicates sharing of life and the strengthening of a bond with outcasts: those at the margins of society and religious institutions. It is more than likely that an early understanding of the eucharist is presented in these meal stories, and in the way Jesus is depicted partaking of food and drink.

The manner in which Paul dealt with divisions and factions in the Christian community is also instructive. The social world of the apostle Paul was marked by rigid stratification. Such stratification was judged incompatible with the communio in Christ, which had particular appeal to those who occupied an ambiguous or marginal place in society, especially because of the co-equal discipleship in which all were called to share through their baptism into the one body of Christ (Gal 3:27-28). There were no outsiders in the communio in Christ. But layers of the rigid social stratification carried over into the life and practice of the church, so that Paul was pressed to chide the church at Corinth for liturgical practices which hindered the participation of some members of the body because of their economic or social status (1 Cor 11:17-34).

One of the functions of liturgy in the Christian communio of the early church was to provide a sense of belonging and shared identity, particularly for those who occupied an ambiguous place in society. Those who were baptized into Christ's body and shared at the eucharistic table were invited to live in the promise of a world in which the rich and powerful will be cast down from their thrones, and the poor and wounded will hold pride of place (Lk 1:46-55). This stands in marked contrast to the social world in which their place was uncertain and tenuous, and provided a vision of unity, a sense of purpose, cohesion and hope. Further, the alternative vision projected and enacted in the liturgy of the early communio stood in marked contrast to the dominant ideology of the "world" and functioned as a critique of it.

Alongside others, then, liturgy may be said to have two important functions which are brought to the fore by a consideration of liturgy and the marginalized. First, liturgy is to facilitate building the communio in Christ by projecting and enacting a vision of God's reign in which those who occupy an ambiguous or marginal place in social and religious bodies will hold pride of place. Second, liturgy is to serve as a critique of those political, social, economic and religious systems and ideologies which keep persons and groups at the margins, thus preventing the communio from being realized, and obfuscating the reign of God to which Christians look in hope and confidence.

History has gone to show that these two functions have not always been operative in Christian liturgy. Perhaps due to an emphasis on matters of doctrine and discipline, liturgical practice has often excluded, rather than included, those who occupy an uncertain or marginal place in the social and religious body. And, more sadly still, rather than serve as a critique of the dominant ideological assumptions of economic systems, political structures, and religious institutions, liturgical practice has often uncritically endorsed these as divinely ordained, thus clouding the non-identity between them and the coming reign of God.

The recovery of these two functions of liturgy more often than not occurs through alternative liturgical practices of marginalized communities of self and mutual help which gather in the name of Jesus in memory and in hope. The liturgical life of the base Christian communities in Central and South America and of groups of Christian feminists, and the liturgical services of communities of handicapped persons and their families and friends, may serve as examples of practices rooted in an ethic of inclusion more in keeping with the communitas in Christ and the call to co-equal discipleship at the heart of the gospel. Further, such liturgical practices raise critical questions about dominant modes of perceiving and being in the human and Christian communities.

The identity of the Christian community is found precisely in difference (1 Corinthians 12). It remains an unfinished task to bring about liturgical forms which are inclusive of a wide array of persons who are pressed to the margins of social and religious bodies. This calls for much more than welcoming the marginalized into the mainstream, or incorporating the alternative practices of these communities into the larger tradition.

MARRIAGE RECORDS

See Records, sacramental

MARRIAGE TRIBUNAL

The judicial courts, or tribunals, of the Roman Catholic church handle almost exclusively cases of marriage nullity, hence, their common though non-technical designation as "marriage tribunals." According to church teaching, a sacramental marriage (between two baptized persons) that has been consummated is indissoluble; the bond of marriage cannot be broken by any human power, and it persists until the death of one of the parties. Since the church does not recognize civil divorce, in order to remarry in the church while one's first spouse is living it is necessary to obtain a declaration of nullity of the first marriage. This declaration, commonly called an "annulment," is a judicial sentence given by the tribunal judges who reach moral certainty that the marriage in question was from its inception invalid on some legal basis. Although the relationship may have had the semblance of a marriage, and may even have lasted many years, an annulment acknowledges it to have been juridically null and void from the beginning.

Annulment petitions are most frequently based on one or more grounds of defective consent. The consent of the parties, their free will decision to give and accept one another in matrimony, constitutes the juridical essence of marriage. In virtue of the natural law, the parties to marriage, whether Christian or non-Christian, must give free consent. If this consent is lacking or is juridically defective, the marriage is invalid and can be declared such by a church tribunal.

The various grounds for defective consent are found in canons 1095-1103 of the Code of Canon Law. The so-called "psychological grounds" are the most frequently alleged bases of defective consent. In these cases the petitioner attempts to establish that one party or both parties to the marriage either suffered from grave lack of discretion of judgment concerning essential matrimonial rights and duties, and/or were incapable of assuming the essential obligations of matrimony due to causes of a psychic nature (cans. 1095, 1°, 2°).

Another frequent basis for marriage nullity is lack or defect of canonical form. The law of the canonical form obliges a Catholic in ordinary circumstances to marry in the presence of an authorized priest or deacon and two witnesses (can. 1108). Those who are baptized in or received into full communion with the Catholic church are bound to the canonical form unless they have left the church by a formal act. If a Catholic who has not formally left the church marries without observing the canonical form, the marriage is invalid and can be annulled quite easily through a documentary process. A less frequent basis for marriage nullity is the presence of a diriment impediment that was not dispensed (cans. 1083-1094).

Every diocese is required to have a tribunal unless an indult has been given by the Holy See for a regional, inter-diocesan tribunal. The diocesan bishop usually exercises judicial power vicariously through the judges he appoints. The principal judge who oversees the operation of the tribunal is called the judicial vicar, or officialis. The bishop also appoints other judges according to the needs and resources of the diocese, one or more of whom may be given the title of adjutant judicial vicar, or vice-officialis. In marriage cases the judges must weigh carefully the evidence in light of church law and come to moral certainty before declaring a marriage invalid.

An important officer of the court for marriage cases is the defender of the bond whose task it is to ensure that the procedural and substantive law is correctly observed and interpreted in the trial. Nullity proceedings are handled as contentious cases between the two parties, between the petitioner who requests the annulment and the defendant, called the respondent, who can respond to the allegations of the petitioner. In reality, marriage cases are seldom truly contentious, since both parties usually are civilly divorced and the respondent often desires the annulment also or is indifferent to the outcome of the case. The presence of the defender of the bond in the trial theoretically maintains the contentious nature of the process.

Both parties may also have their own advocate, an attorney who represents them in the case. The respondent may not require an advocate, unless he or she wishes to contend the petition. All officials of the tribunal, including advocates, must be approved by the diocesan bishop and meet all other qualifications required by law. Deacons and laypersons are eligible for all tribunal offices except officialis and vice-officialis, which can be held only by a priest.

Every marriage nullity case must receive an affirmative sentence from two separate tribunals before the annulment is granted. An affirmative decision in first instance must be appealed to the court of second instance, usually the metropolitan tribunal, a designated suffragan tribunal, or a regional appeals court. Marriage cases are decided by a collegiate tribunal of three judges, at least two of whom must be clerics. With permission of the episcopal conference, the diocesan bishop can constitute in first instance a tribunal consisting of a single judge who must be a cleric (can. 1425, §4). If a single judge decides a case in first instance, it must be reviewed by a collegiate tribunal of three judges in second instance.

Remarriage in the church is also possible after a dissolution of a non-consummated or a non-sacramental marriage, even if the first marriage is valid. Dissolution cases, though they often are initially processed by the marriage tribunal, are not properly judicial in nature.

MARRIAGE, VOWS, RENEWAL OF

Wedding anniversaries are being recognized more frequently as a time of celebration for the whole community. In times past, couples and their families did tend to celebrate their wedding anniversaries, especially the twenty-fifth, fiftieth, and sixtieth. Today, however, there is greater recognition of the specialness of enduring love, of faithful love, not only for the married couple and their immediate family, but also for the community and society at large.

The foundational concept of marriage as a covenant, which was enunciated in Vatican II, has led us to a deeper respect for the ongoing dynamics of the partnership of a husband and a wife, a communion which involves their whole lives (G.S., 47, 48). A covenant leads us to celebration again and again; a contract is often celebrated only at the time of its signing. Covenant touches the mutual and ongoing gifting and acceptance of each other. This gifting and acceptance can never cease; it is continuous and ever-sensitive.

The celebration of this reality on an ongoing basis is reflected in the development of prayers and blessings for wedding anniversaries. These celebrations may take the form of focusing on a twenty-fifth or fiftieth anniversary, celebrated by a votive Mass of thanksgiving, or by a prayer service, or by a banquet at which not only the specific couple but other married couples are recognized and prayed for. It may take the form of having a eucharist each month for all couples whose anniversaries fall within the month.

There are not many times in a person's life where one's story can be shared with the community. Each couple has a unique story of their married life and has developed personal symbols of their happy and sad moments. The pastoral possibilities of storytelling and symbol sharing go beyond imagination. These times are too precious to be ignored or performed in a perfunctory manner. Various formulae are suggested for the renewal of vows or for the recollection of vows. However, the vows take on a much deeper meaning after these stories of married life.

The impact of reaffirming these vows is very profound and, often, quite moving. In an analogous way, it is similar to the renewal of our baptismal vows during the Easter vigil. Married lives, as our Christian lives, are lived on a daily basis. However, it is important to stop, to move from chronological time to kairoic time, to affirm and celebrate the mystery at hand, to remember the journey travelled and to enunciate and hope and promise for the future.

After the renewal of the vows, a prayer of thanksgiving is offered to God for the gift of married love which has been experienced and lived by the couple. This thanksgiving is offered by the whole community who recognize the symbolic quality of this covenantal love. Here again, others may be invited to share their experience of the love and life of this couple. God's blessing is then requested for the couple, for all couples, for the community, that it may live its covenantal calling to be one with Christ in a manner that touches every fibre of their being, and for the world, that it may recognize its hunger for love, its source, and its fulfillment in God.

To face one's spouse after many years of married life—of moments of happiness and sadness, success and failure—and once again to pledge love and commitment and fidelity, is a moment of sacredness, of wonder, of the presence of God. It is a time which grounds us in the mystery of love as lived in daily life. It is not a superfluous liturgy; it is a liturgy which is open to great depth and significance.

MARRIAGE, CANONICAL ISSUES CONCERNING

Canonical references are to The Code of Canon Law, promulgated by Pope John Paul II in January 1983. This Code came into legal effect on November 27, 1983, and abrogated the first Code, which with subsequent emendations, had been in effect since 1918.

I. The Legal Dimensions of Marriage

Marriage is generally understood to have private and public effects; it serves the good of the persons who marry and common, societal goods, such as the stability of family, boundaries of kinship, and nurture of offspring. Consequently, various jurisdictions, cultures and societies have recognized a number of legal dimensions of the marriage of a man and a woman, including:

- A. rights and obligations in law, such as common life, domicile, economic sustenance, productivity and the use of income from productivity, protection from harm, and the nurture and supervision of offspring;
- B. consequences in law, such as legitimacy of and liability for offspring, entitlement, beneficiary, use and ownership of property, succession to title or office;

C. juridical requirements governing how people marry, record keeping, who (if anyone) may or must officiate at a wedding ceremony, what words may or must be spoken;

D. legal determinations of how, when, and by whom a marriage may be terminated, either by separation ("from bed and board"), dissolution, annulment or divorce;

E. categories of persons who by law are capable or incapable of marrying, or of marrying one another; the status of persons who marry; requisite conditions, knowledge, intention; even certain criminal effects of fraud, deception, or bigamy.

Whether social or cultural, civil or religious in origin, there are any number of regulations, rules and requirements, permissions and prohibitions, rights and obligations attached by law to the action of marrying and the status of being married persons, and to the consequences of a marriage contract or marriage bond. Different authorities claim the power to regulate marriage and/or divorce in accord with divine, canonical and civil law.

II. The Church and Marriage

Motivated by scripture and theological reflection, influenced by cultural and social environment, guided by or reacting to existing customs and practices, and shaped by historical contexts, various Christian churches and communions have regulated some or all of these dimensions of marrying, marriage and divorce. The rediscovery of Roman law in the 12th century, the systematization of sacramental theology in the 12th and 13th centuries, and the 16th-century reform canons and decrees of the Council of Trent (especially those establishing the requirement of canonical form for the validity of the marriage) are influences which continue to shape the norms of the Roman Catholic church governing the act of marrying, the state of marriage, the rights and duties of married persons, and the boundaries for dissolving certain marriages.

In some countries, and again for historical reasons, what was or is determined by ecclesiastical authority still serves also as civil law; in other instances, religious authority has instead adopted laws enacted by civil authorities. In the Western Christian world, this spectrum of legal approaches to marriage reflects the religious and political aftermath of the Anglican, Reform and Catholic Reformations of the 16th century. In the Eastern Christian world, the effects of civil and canon law on marriage reflects the fluctuating relationship of the Oriental churches (especially the Orthodox) to the political rule of the several empires: Eastern (Byzantine) Roman, Ottoman (Muslim), and Russian (now, Soviet Union), as well as the rule of other non-Christian political and religious entities.

III. Documents on Marriage: Evolving Theology and Legislation

Oftentimes, church documents on marriage employ different technical languages and intermingle a variety of statements: dogma, doctrine, theological opinion, liturgical practice, aids for pastoral ministry, as well as juridical elements strictly speaking, i.e., laws or rules of behavior to govern individuals and a community. Each genre of literature must be interpreted according to its own nature.

Foundational doctrinal texts on marriage are: The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (G.S., 1965), nos. 48-53, of the Second Vatican Council, and the papal text, "Exhortation on the Family" (1981) by Pope John Paul II, prepared after the deliberations of "The Synod on the Family" (1980). The primary liturgical and ritual text is the revised Rites of Marriage of the Roman Ritual (1969). The legal text which currently regulates marriage in the Catholic church is the Code of Canon Law (1983). This revised Code, the work of a papal commission, is intended to reflect conciliar texts and post-conciliar documents issued by Pope Paul VI, particularly those that dealt with "mixed marriage" (Matrimonii sacramentum, 1966, and Matrimonia mixta, 1970) and the marriage of Latin (Roman) Catholics and Oriental non-Catholics (Crescens matrimonium, 1967).

Six canons (cans. 834-839) introduce "Book IV: The Office of Sanctifying in the Church"; eight canons (cans. 840-847) introduce "Part I: The Sacraments." Several of these are foundational canons, and are broad in scope; all of these govern the interpretation and application of the marriage canons. They deserve careful reading for their notes on the faith dimensions of worship and sacraments, the public activity of liturgy, the valid celebration of sacraments, the duties and rights of both ministers and all the faithful regarding access to and preparation for sacraments.

Under Title 7, "De matrimonio," are found the 111 canons on marriage (cans. 1055-1165). Thirty-seven canons, under the title, "Certain Special Procedures," (cans. 1671-1707), regulate the procedures to be observed in various marriage cases.

IV. "De Matrimonio": The Content of the Revised Code

A. An issue: rewriting the laws

A number of the disciplinary laws governing the formalities of marrying, marriage tribunals, personnel and procedures, and norms to be used in cases of nullity and dissolution, as established in the 1917 Code, had undergone significant development both prior and subsequent to Vatican II. With the revision of the Code we have not only an updated compendium of these modified canons, but also changes in the canons on marriage itself.

The following lists those canons on marriage in the 1917 Code for which there is no existing corresponding canon (in whole or in part) in the 1983 Code of Canon Law. These deleted canons no longer have legal effect:

Cans. 1021, §1; 1022; 1030; 1031; 1036, §§1 & 3; 1042; 1048; 1049; 1050; 1051; 1052; 1053; 1054; 1055; 1056; 1057; 1058; 1059; 1063, §§2 & 3; 1064; 1075, 1°; 1077, §2; 1079; 1089, §4; 1092, 1° & 2°; 1095, §1, 3°; 1097, §1, 2° & 3°; 1099, §2; 1101; 1102; 1108; 1112; 1120, §2; 1124; 1126; 1142; 1143.

Comments on Table 1: When the 1983 Code took legal effect, 37 of the 132 canons on marriage in the prior Code, or 28%, no longer had legal effect, i.e., more than 1/4 of the previous canons.

Table 2: Canons on Marriage that are new to the Code.

The following lists the canons on marriage that are entirely or in part (subparagraph or number) new to the Code; i.e., these have no corresponding or equivalent canon in the prior Code. Many of these embody previously enacted legislation and administrative directives:

Cans. 1063, 2°, 3° & 4°; 1064; 1071, §1, 2° & 3°; 1079, §4; 1083, §2; 1095; 1098; 1102, §3; 1108, §2; 1112; 1120; 1121, §3; 1123; 1126; 1127, §2; 1128; 1143; 1147; 1161, §3; 1165, §2.

Comments on Table 2: Twenty of the 111 canons on marriage, i.e., 18% or nearly 1 in 5, are new to the Code.

Table 3: Canons on Marriage in the 1983 Code that have been substantially revised.

The following lists marriage canons in the 1983 Code corresponding to canons in the 1917 Code, but which have been significantly revised, i.e., the canon:

(a) contains a reversal of previous rule or principle; namely, cans. 1055; 1078; 1111, §1; 1117; 1118, §3; 1163, §2.

(b) amends, deletes, or adds to a canon, and as a result alters the sense of the canon considerably; e.g., cans. 1057, §2; 1059; 1067; 1084, §2; 1108, etc.

(c) contains an exceptive clause not stated in prior canon, which radically alters the prior rule; namely, cans. 1099 and 1100. Listed in order they are:

Cans. 1055; 1057, §2; 1059; 1063, 1°; 1067; 1071, §1, 4° & 5°; 1078; 1079, §1; 1084, §2; 1099; 1100; 1101; 1102, §§1 & 2; 1108; 1111, §§1 & 2; 1115; 1117; 1118, §3; 1124; 1125; 1127; 1130; 1142; 1148, §§1 & 2; 1153; 1163, §2; 1165, §1.

Comments on Table 3: Some 27 of the 111 canons on marriage in the revised Code which correspond to canons in the 1917 Code have been substantially changed, i.e., 24.3%, or nearly 1 in 4 of the canons on marriage.

Summary: Nearly 1/3 of all the canons on sacraments deal with the sacrament of marriage (111 of 326); that high number reflects the manifold aspects of marriage as a human and sacred reality, as a legal and sacramental entity, and as an event, an ongoing state, and an interpersonal relationship.

An assessment of the legislative activity that culminated in the revised Code, therefore, must note something more than the reduction in the number of canons on marriage (from 132 to 111). It must also account for the extensive revision of the content of the canons. Noting that 20 canons on marriage that are entirely new, that 27 have been substantially revised (these two groups alone constitute some 47 of the 111 canons on marriage; i.e., 42.3% of the existing canons) and that 37 out of 132 canons of the prior Code have been abrogated, we have a better measure of the extensive revision in the content of the canons.

B. The Scope of the Canons

Underlying all the canons on marriage is a fundamental legal and theological distinction: the sacramental marriage of two baptized persons, and the non-sacramental marriage of two non-baptized persons, or a baptized person and a non-baptized person (cans. 1055, §§1 & 2; 1056; 1061, §1; and 1134). The distinction has broad canonical, liturgical, pastoral and juridical consequences, e.g., in the way these marriages are (are not) celebrated (cans. 1059; 1086, §1; 1117; 1124-1129), and in their legal effects (e.g., in the procedures that govern their (in) dissolubility, cans. 1141; 1142; 1143ff).

Seven introductory canons head the chapter; two of these contain a theological and canonical description of marriage:

Can. 1055: §1: "The matrimonial covenant, by which a man and a woman establish between themselves a partnership of the whole of life, is by its nature ordered toward the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of offspring; this covenant between baptized persons has been raised by Christ our Lord to the dignity of a sacrament."

Can. 1056: "The essential properties of marriage are unity and indissolubility, which in Christian marriage obtain a special firmness in virtue of the sacrament."

Can. 1057 serves as a "table of contents" of the canonical issues concerning marriage: that marriage is brought about through the consent of the parties (cans. 1095-1103, 1107); legitimately manifested (canonical form: cans. 1058; 1108-1123); between persons who are capable according to law of giving consent (cans. 1073-1094).

Several canons give legal principles and definitions. Can. 1058 is a statement of a fundamental human right: "All persons who are not prohibited by law can contract marriage."

This right, however, is not unrestricted. Divine, canon and civil laws regulate marriage, and especially the marriage wherein at least one of the parties is a Catholic (can. 1059). Another legal rule is stated: "Marriage enjoys the favor of the law," and consequently its validity is upheld until the contrary (invalidity; lack of legal effect) is proven (can. 1060). Can. 1061 defines several legal terms describing different kinds of marriage according to: the baptismal status of the persons who marry; whether or not the marriage is consummated after it has been contracted; and whether or not the marriage is valid. A single canon treats the much-restricted legal implications of betrothal (can. 1062).

V. Canonical Issues and Method: "First Rule, Second Rule"

The canonical system of the church rests upon the interaction of general and particular norms: the general (universal) rule operates as a "first rule," the particular (specific) rule, which may appear as a sub-paragraph or number, a dependent clause, or an exception or "unless" clause, operates as a "second rule."

A. Consent: the indispensable personal act which brings marriage into being; nature and notions; how intention and knowledge interact; the invalidating effect when consent is lacking or inadequate.

(1) The "first rule." Can. 1057, §1, contains the basic legal principle: marriage comes into existence through the consent of the two parties who marry; no other human power can replace this consent; §2 offers a definition of that consent and a description of the intended object of that consent: it is an act of the will by which a man and a woman, through an irrevocable covenant, mutually give and accept each other in order to establish marriage.

(2) Consent is a complex notion; hence, the canons include an extensive series of

"second rules." The law recognizes that not all persons are capable of giving the requisite consent (can. 1095) due to the insufficient use of reason (1°); or because a person suffers from a "grave lack of discretion of judgment" concerning the essential rights and duties of marriage which are to be mutually given and accepted (2°); or because a person is "incapable of assuming the essential obligations of matrimony due to causes of a psychic nature" (3°). The latter two numbers of the canon are new to the Code, and derive from the jurisprudence of the Roman Rota developed in the last half century. They also are the ground of nullity cited in the greatest number of nullity cases adjudicated by tribunals.

(3) Several other "second rule" canons deal with the legal implications of the interaction and operations of the will (the locus of intention) and the intellect (the locus of knowledge), namely, the automatic or potentially nullifying effects of: ignorance (can. 1096); error (cans. 1098; 1099); deception by fraud (can. 1098); knowledge or opinion about nullity (can. 1110); the positive act of the will to exclude (a kind of "negative intention") either the marriage itself (see cans. 1055 and 1135), some essential element of marriage (see can. 1096, §1: that marriage is a permanent consortium of a man and a woman which is ordered toward the procreation of children by means of some sexual cooperation), or an essential property of marriage (see cans. 1056, 1099 and 1134: perpetuity, exclusivity, and in a Christian marriage, sacramentality); conditions placed at the time of the marriage (can. 1102); and force or grave fear inflicted upon a person (can. 1103).

(4) Notable evolution in the Code's understanding of the relationship of the will and intellect is traceable in two canons. Whereas the former Code (can. 1084) practically ruled out any interaction in its expression "simple error," implying that error might remain simply in the mind without passing over into the will, the revised can. 1009 reads: "Error concerning the unity, indissolubility or sacramental dignity of marriage does not vitiate matrimonial consent so long as it does not determine the will" (emphasis added).

The final clause of the revised canon is new, and creates another instance of the "first rule, second rule" method of the Code. The first rule is: certain kinds of error do not vitiate consent; the second rule is: that certain kinds of erroneous knowledge could determine the will, and so vitiate consent. Similarly, in can. 1110: "The knowledge or opinion of the nullity of a marriage does not necessarily exclude matrimonial consent" (emphasis added).

Here also the revised canon, in its expression "not necessarily," creates a "first rule" presumption: a person's sure knowledge or belief does not preclude that person from validly marrying; but the "second rule" admits the possibility that knowledge or opinion could vitiate consent.

B. The Formalities of Marrying: the meaning of "legitimate manifestation" of consent; "canonical form"; provisions for flexibility: permissions and dispensations; jurisdiction and its delegation.

The act of marrying consists of the expression of consent in words or equivalent signs (can. 1104, §2), and personally (can. 1104, §1), through proxy (can. 1105), or through an interpreter (can. 1106).

(1) Can. 1059 initiates the series of canons which establish the "first rules" for the marriage of a Catholic; later canons will provide "second rule" exceptions: "Even if only one party is Catholic, the marriage of Catholics is regulated not only by divine law but also by canon law, with due regard for the competence of civil authority concerning the merely civil effects of such a marriage" (see also can. 1127, §1).

Under the title of "form of the celebration of marriage," several canons regulate the legal and liturgical formalities of marrying which bind a baptized Catholic or a person who has been received into the Catholic church and who has not "left the Catholic church by a formal act" (can. 1117). That latter clause is new legislation; as a result, those who have left the Catholic church in some formal, external and provable manner are no longer bound by the Catholic form for marrying.

(2) The "canonical form" for marrying is a complex legal institute which regulates whether or not the marriage will enjoy legal standing. Enacted originally as a remedy for clandestine marriage, the institute guarantees the public celebration of marriage. Failure to observe canonical form may result in the invalidity of the marriage.

Canonical form for marriage consists of this: the ceremony must be conducted by a person to whom jurisdiction has been given, i.e., who has been delegated according to the norms of law to officiate at a marriage ceremony (cans. 1108, §1; 1109; 1110; 1111). The actual contracting of marriage must occur in the presence of a bishop, a priest-pastor, or another authorized priest or deacon, as well as two other witnesses (can. 1108, §2). The liturgical rites approved by church authority (cans. 1119; 1120) are to be used. New legislation (can. 1112) provides that in situations where clergy are lacking, a qualified lay person may be delegated by ecclesiastical authority to officiate at the wedding ceremony.

(3) Before the ceremony occurs, and before delegation to officiate is given, the law requires that the freedom of the persons to marry must be established (cans. 1113; 1114). After a marriage has been celebrated, the marriage is to be recorded properly (cans. 1121-1123).

(4) Whereas the former Code required that the marriage be celebrated in the parish church of the bride-to-be, the revised canon (can. 1115) designates the parish where either party has legal permanent or part-time residence; the same canon provides that the ceremony could take place "elsewhere" (generally understood as another church or chapel) with the permission of the local bishop or the pastor. Can. 1116 provides special rules for validly contracting marriage in the presence of two witnesses only in situations such as danger of death, or the prolonged absence of an officiant, when it is "impossible without serious inconvenience" to observe canonical form.

(5) Dispensations from canonical form. Can. 1127, §1, contains special provisions for the form required, or the grant of dispensation from form, for the marriage of a Catholic to a non-Catholic of an oriental rite (e.g., Orthodox); §2 provides for the possibility of dispensation from form in other mixed marriage cases, requiring for validity, however, that a public celebration occur; and §3 forbids either repeated or divided religious ceremonies in mixed marriages.

A ruling handed down in May 1985 by the Pontifical Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code decreed that the local ordinary may not dispense from the requirement of canonical form in a marriage of two Catholics. C. "Second Rules": special provisions for "mixed marriage" and the pastoral care of couples and family.

These revised canons largely derive from post-conciliar legislation. Cans. 1117 and 1127, §1 restate the general rule of canonical form in "mixed marriage."

(1) Can. 1118 contains a new rule in the case of "mixed marriage": reversing the prohibition in the earlier Code, the revised Code permits the celebration of a mixed marriage in a parish or other church (§1), or, when the local bishop permits, in "some other suitable place" (§2); if it is the case that the Catholic is marrying a non-baptized person (see can. 1086 on "disparity of cult") that marriage can take place "in a church or in some other suitable place" (§3). A new chapter entitled "Mixed marriages" contains six canons (1124-1129) regulating the marriage of a Catholic and a baptized non-Catholic (can. 1124), and the marriage of a Catholic and non-baptized person (can. 1129).

(2) The present Code distinguishes more consistently the "permission" required for a "mixed marriage" (cans. 1124; 1125) from the "dispensation" required for a disparity of cult marriage (cans. 1129; 1086, §1), both of which may be granted by proper ecclesiastical authority "when there is just and reasonable cause" and provided that certain requirements are met (can. 1125). In some dioceses, it is the practice that pastors have been delegated the faculty to grant permission for mixed marriage; granting the dispensation from disparity of cult, however, remains restricted to the diocesan bishop or his delegate.

(3) Whereas the prior Code obliged both the Catholic and the non-Catholic party, the current law requires only the Catholic party to affirm his or her faith and make "a sincere promise to do all in his or her power to have all the children baptized and brought up in the Catholic church" (1°); the non-Catholic is "to be informed at the appropriate time" of the promise and obligation of the Catholic (2°); and both parties are to be instructed on the essential ends and properties of marriage that are not to be excluded by either party (3°).

Can. 1128 obliges bishops and pastors to provide spiritual assistance to the Catholic spouse and children of mixed marriage. This new canon is a positive change from the "deter" and "danger" attitudes of the former Code; but one wonders why the canon does not extend spiritual care to both spouses.

(4) Can. 1071, §1, 4° and §2 treat of the permission required in the special case of a Catholic seeking to contract marriage with a person who has "notoriously" left the Catholic church.

D. The Capacity in Law of a Person to Marry: invalidating (nullifying) impediments; dispensations (relaxation of the requirements of law).

Can. 1058 establishes the general rule: "All persons who are not prohibited by law can contract marriage." Some persons, however, are legally prohibited from marrying.

(1) "Licit" celebration of marriage: "permissions." Several canons of the former Code regulated the so-called "impedient impediments," which affected only the licit celebration of the marriage but not its validity. That title has been suppressed; in its stead one canon (can. 1071) treats several situations in which a certain caution is to be exercised. The canonical concept of permission does not, however, touch the validity of the marriage.

Can. 1071 lists the seven cases when the permission of the local ordinary is required for the licit celebration of the marriage: (1°) of transients; (2°) which cannot be recognized or celebrated according to the norm of civil law; (3°) of a person who, because of a prior union, is bound by natural obligations toward another party or children; (4°) of a person who has "notoriously" rejected the Catholic faith (see also §2); (5°) of a person under ecclesiastical censure; (6°) of a minor child (someone under the age of 18) when the parents are unaware of it or are reasonably opposed to it (see also can. 1072: Pastors are to prevent youths from marrying before the age at which marriage is usually begun in accord with practices of the region; and can. 1083, §2, on the power of the conference of bishops to establish a minimum age for the licit celebration of marriage.) and (7°) when entered into by proxy (see also can. 1105).

Can. 1118 refers to "permissions" for the celebration of a mixed marriage in a place other than the parish church.

(2) "Valid" celebration of marriage: legal standing. The general rule of can. 1058 is limited also by a series of canons which establish that, because of a "diriment impediment" (a legal obstacle to marrying; see cans. 1073-1082) a person is incapable in law of validly contracting a marriage. The institute of invalidating impediments is complex, and is regulated as to who may establish such an impediment (cans. 1075; 1076); the extent of the power of the local ordinary either to prohibit a marriage for a time (can. 1077), or to grant a dispensation from the impediment (can. 1078); certain special cases when dispensation can be otherwise granted (cans. 1079: in danger of death; 1080: when, at the last minute, it is learned that an impediment exists; and 1081); and certain prerogatives of the Apostolic See (cans. 1075, §1; 1078).

The prior Code distinguished so-called major and minor invalidating impediments, according to their origin, and whether or not they could be dispensed from. That distinction has been eliminated. The impediment of "spiritual affinity" deriving from baptism has been suppressed.

The twelve specific impediments with invalidating effect are: lack of minimum age, which is 16 years for the male, 14 for the female (can. 1083, §1); antecedent, perpetual, and certain impotence to have sexual intercourse, whether on the part of the male or female (can. 1084, §1; §2 states that in cases where there is a doubt concerning the impotence, the marriage is not to be impeded nor declared null; §3 makes it clear that sterility neither prohibits nor invalidates a marriage); prior bond of marriage (can. 1085); disparity of cult: a Catholic seeking to marry a non-baptized person (can. 1086); dispensation from this impediment is commonly granted; persons who are in holy orders (can. 1087; see also can. 1009:

the orders are episcopacy, presbyterate, diaconate); persons who are bound by a public perpetual vow of chastity in a religious institute (can. 1088; see also cans. 654 and 658, on such vows); abduction or detention of a woman for the purpose of marriage with her (can. 1089); persons who physically or morally cause the death of either one's spouse for the purpose of being freed from an existing bond of marriage (can. 1090); persons within a certain degree of consanguineous (blood) relationship (can. 1091; see also cans. 108; 1078, §3) or affinity (relationship through marriage); (can. 1092; see also can. 1093: affinity arises only through a valid marriage); "public propriety," that is, a kind of affinity relationship arising from an invalid marriage or cohabitation; and certain degrees of legal relationship arising from adoption, as determined by civil law (can. 1094).

(3) Convalidation of marriage (cans. 1156-1165). Two legal procedures exist for validating an invalid marriage. The general rule (can. 1157) recalls the indispensable requirement of consent: "The renewal of consent must be a new act of the will concerning a marriage which the person who is renewing consent knows or thinks was null from the beginning."

The first procedure, "simple convalidation" requires a new act of consent, and can be applied in three types of cases:

(a) when a marriage is invalid due to an impediment: when the impediment has ceased, or has been dispensed, renewed consent is required at least by the one who knew of the impediment (can. 1156).

(b) when a marriage is invalid due to a defect of consent: the party who had not consented must give consent (can. 1159).

(c) when a marriage is invalid due to a defect of form: then the marriage must be contracted anew according to canonical form (can. 1160).

The second procedure, "radical sanction," is a more subtle canonical entity.

It presupposes that the consent of both parties continues. Sanation is validation of a marriage without the renewal of consent "with retroactivity into the past of the canonical effects" (can. 1161, §1).

(a) Provided that the consent of both parties continues, sanation can be applied in cases where the marriage was invalid because there was an impediment, and/or canonical form was not observed (cans. 1161, 1163); dispensations can be granted retroactively in both latter instances (can. 1163). Convalidation is understood to have occurred "at the moment the favor is granted" (can. 1161, §2).

(b) A marriage cannot be sanated if consent was lacking in the beginning or was revoked; it may be sanated if, although originally lacking, consent was afterwards given (can. 1162).

(c) The sanation can be granted by the Apostolic See (can. 1165, §1) and, in a new canon, by the diocesan bishop, certain restrictions applying (§2).

The two sets of procedures operate differently: convalidation requires the renewal of consent (usually, in a simple liturgical ceremony, popularly spoken of as "having the marriage blessed"); sanation, presupposing consent continues, is a documentary process. The mere existence of both institutes acknowledges the reality of the non-observance of marriage laws. Both procedures have a single canonical (and pastoral) focus: validating an otherwise invalid marriage.

E. Pastoral Preparation for Marriage. A new chapter heading, and ten canons, treat "pastoral care and what must precede the celebration of marriage." New canons expand the notion and importance of "pastoral preparation" beyond the canonical obligations of the pre-marital investigation.

(1) Can. 1063 is one of the lengthiest canons of the revised Code. It is a foundational and comprehensive canon, describing the obligation both of pastors and members of the ecclesial community to provide assistance to the Christian faithful "so that the matrimonial state is maintained in a Christian spirit and makes progress toward perfection." Four extensive sub-paragraphs outline: the remote, early preparation that occurs in preaching, catechesis, and media; the proximate, personal preparation of couples; the fruitful liturgical celebration of marriage; and assistance for those who are married. The canon requires pastoral care of the persons and the sacrament; something more is called for than merely making wedding arrangements.

Can. 1064 obliges the local ordinary to provide such assistance; it seems overly cautious in adding: "even after consulting men and women of proven experience and skill, if it seems opportune."

Can. 1065 urges the reception of the sacrament of confirmation before marrying, and penance and eucharist, as aids in the fruitful celebration of marriage.

(2) Cans. 1066-1070 shift the focus to more juridical aspects: before the marriage is celebrated, it must be determined that nothing stands in the way of its valid and licit celebration; the episcopal conference is to enact norms concerning the publication of banns, the examination of the parties, and the necessary inquiries regarding impediments, dispensations or permissions. A wise canon urges caution in the marriage of youths who are minors (can. 1072).

F. "In Order to Establish Marriage": the purposes of the marriage covenant; the "ends" and "goods" and effects of marriage.

(1) The prior Code, in can. 1013, §1, stated that the "primary end of marriage was the procreation and education of children; its secondary end is mutual help and allaying of concupiscence." Consistent with this view, the "object" of matrimonial consent was described in can. 1081, §2: "Matrimonial consent is an act of the will by which each party gives and accepts a perpetual and exclusive right over the body, for acts which are of themselves suitable for the generation of children" (see also can. 1082, §1).

Can. 1111 reads: "From the beginning of the marriage both parties have the same right and duty as regards the acts peculiar to the conjugal life." This canon was commonly understood to refer first of all to the primary end of marriage.

(2) Can. 1055, §1, in accord with the doctrine of marriage of Vatican II (see G.S., 48), restates the ends of marriage: "The matrimonial covenant, by which a man and a woman establish between themselves a partnership of the whole of life, is by its nature ordered toward the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of children...."

Consistent with this doctrine, the revised can. 1057, §2 states the purpose of marriage (which is the object of matrimonial consent): "Matrimonial consent is an act of the will by which a man and a woman, through an irrevocable covenant, mutually give and accept each other in order to establish marriage" (emphasis added).

In like manner, the scope of can. 1135 has been expanded: Each of the spouses has equal obligations and rights to those things which pertain to the partnership of conjugal life."

The net effect of these changes is the incorporation of the doctrine of Vatican II into the church's law: that the ends of marriage are so interrelated that although distinguishable, they cannot be separated nor ranked, and that persons who marry do so "to establish married life." In this way, the description of marriage as a "partnership of the whole of life" takes on a richer, more personal and more integrated sense: nothing of the mutual rights and duties, "goods" and effects of marriage is to be excluded.

Also, the phrase "as a remedy for concupiscence," derived from an Augustinian justification for sexual intercourse even within marriage, has been deleted from the revised canon.

G. "Covenant" As Framework; "Contract" As Content. Whereas the prior Code described the act of marrying and the marriage bond in contractual language, in three instances the revised Code substitutes the conciliar expression "matrimonial covenant" (matrimoniale foedus; cans. 1055, §1; 1057, §2, and 1063, 4°). The language of covenant evokes a richer biblical and theological appreciation of marriage; notwithstanding, there are forty-five references to the language of contract in the revised Code. In its laws, then, the church continues to use and largely regulates marriage primarily according to the legal concept of marriage as a contract.

H. Contract and Sacramentality. The doctrinal identification of the valid contract of marriage of two baptized persons and the sacramentality of marriage has not been changed:

Can. 1055, §1: "... this covenant between baptized persons has been raised by Christ the Lord to the dignity of a sacrament."

§2: "For this reason a matrimonial contract cannot validly exist between baptized persons unless it is also a sacrament by that fact."

Can. 1056: "The essential properties of marriage are unity and indissolubility, which in a Christian marriage obtain a special firmness in virtue of the sacrament."

Can. 1134: "From a valid marriage arises a bond between the spouses which is by its very nature perpetual and exclusive; furthermore, in a Christian marriage the spouses are strengthened and, as it were, consecrated for the duties and the dignity of their state by a special sacrament."

(1) Despite some early theological opinions (e.g., that all marriages are sacraments "in the order of creation," or, that a marriage is sacramental even if only one of the parties was baptized), it is generally held, as affirmed by the Council of Trent, that a marriage is sacramental when both parties are baptized. Nonetheless, contemporary questions are raised concerning the ipso facto identity of a valid contract of marriage between baptized persons and its sacramentality, when, e.g., faith is lacking altogether, as in the case of those baptized non-Catholics who neither know nor intend a sacrament, or as in the case of the baptized Catholic whose inadequate faith does not include a sacramental marriage (some of these latter approach the church merely as the socially acceptable manner and place to marry). While recognizing that these present acute pastoral problems, the church continues to insist that the valid contract of marriage of two baptized persons cannot be separated from its sacramental dimension.

I. The Doctrine of Indissolubility: the practice of dissolution cases. The "essential properties" of all marriage are unity and indissolubility (can. 1056); from a valid marriage arises a bond between the spouses which by its very nature is perpetual and exclusive (can. 1134). However, the actual practice of the church admits the relative dissolubility of certain kinds of marriages, not by the parties themselves but by a power invested in the church.

(1) Can. 1141 states the general, "first rule": A ratified and consummated marriage cannot be dissolved by any human power or for any reason other than death. By definition (see can. 1061), a ratified marriage is the valid marriage of two Christians. Thus, the canon ascribes absolute indissolubility only to the valid contract of marriage of two baptized persons (a sacrament) which subsequently is consummated. This canon implies, then, that other kinds of marriage are only relatively indissoluble. In fact, the "second rule" canons which follow describe those marriages which can be dissolved.

(2) Can. 1142 gives the first of these "second rules": "A non-consummated marriage between baptized persons or between a baptized party and non-baptized party can be dissolved by the Roman Pontiff for a just cause, at the request of both parties or of one of the parties, even if the other party is unwilling."

A non-consummated marriage of two baptized persons, although a sacrament, can be dissolved; likewise, a non-consummated, non-sacramental marriage. In both instances, it is by means of a dispensation from the pontiff that the marriage is said to be dissolved. Formerly, can. 1119 of the 1917 Code provided also that solemn profession of religious vows ipso facto dissolved a non-consummated marriage. Although a practice of the church that lasted for nearly eight centuries, that clause has been deleted from the current Code.

(3) The "Pauline privilege." Cans. 1143-1147 apply in the case of a marriage of two non-baptized persons, when one of these two persons receives baptism. Portions of this practice can be traced to the early church, although it is uncertain at what point the church went beyond merely permitting the separation of the spouses, to allowing a new marriage. The legal elements of the institute have evolved considerably during the centuries, but still require the verification through interrogatories (or, dispensation from these) of at least the baptism of one of the spouses and the non-baptism of the other, with his or her departure, refusal to cohabit, or refusal to cohabit in peace.

In this case, the baptized person has the right to contract a new marriage (can. 1143, §1) with a Catholic party (can. 1146) or, with the permission of the local ordinary, with a non-Catholic, whether baptized or not (can. 1147). The latter provision recognizes a series of developments which considerably expanded the use of the Pauline privilege.

(4) Can. 1148, §1, is a distillation of two 16th century papal constitutions on the dissolution of marriage (see 1917 Code, can. 1125), with still-evolving elements. This "second rule" canon permits a polygamous man or woman, after receiving baptism, to contract marriage (§2) with any one of his or her non-baptized spouses, while dismissing the others, "if it is difficult for him [her] to remain with the first"; §3 is new, and rightly urges that the local ordinary, "after considering the moral, social and economic situation of the area and the persons ... take care that sufficient provision is made in accord with the norms of justice, Christian charity and natural equity for the needs of the first and of the other wives that are dismissed."

(5) Can. 1149 similarly abstracts from another 16th century papal constitution on the dissolution of marriage of non-baptized persons in cases of slavery and deportation. The new canon, however, reflects a continuing evolution, with its references to situations wherein cohabitation cannot be restored "due to captivity or persecution." Either of the spouses, after receiving baptism, can contract another marriage.

In the latter two instances, as with the Pauline instance (but unlike the dispensation from a non-consummated marriage), it is understood that the consent by which the new marriage is contracted dissolves the bond of the former valid but non-sacramental marriage (the former Code termed these "natural" or "legitimate" marriages). Also unlike the instance of non-consummation, these cases are adjudicated by the local ordinary.

Can. 1150 provides the underlying motive for such dissolutions: the privilege of the faith, i.e., that the church favors the reception of baptism of the person(s). A non-sacramental marriage is not to be an obstacle to one's being baptized (see cans. 842, §1 and 849 on the salvific significance accorded to baptism). Since it is not required that the newly contracted marriage be a sacramental marriage, it is clearly baptism that is favored.

(6) Beyond the boundaries of the Code: "favor of the faith" cases. During the process of revision, a newly formulated canon was drafted, underwent several revisions, and was included in the 1980 schema of the proposed Code, can. 1104, §1: "Marriage entered into by parties, one of whom at least was not baptized, may be dissolved by the Roman pontiff in favor of the faith, as long as the marriage was not consummated after both were baptized." The schema also proposed several procedural canons regulating such cases.

The proposed canon was an attempt to formulate a legal principle for a practice begun already in the 1930s, whereby the church allowed the dissolution of a marriage of a baptized person and a non-baptized person. For several decades, that practice was the subject of sometimes intense debate, even as it simultaneously underwent considerable development (e.g., its boundaries were eventually extended to include the dissolution of a disparity of cult marriage contracted with the church's permission). Inappropriately labelled the "Petrine privilege," the still-evolving practice, the theoretical discussions, and the proposed canon seemed destined to assert that the non-sacramental marriage of a baptized person and a non-baptized person was dissolved by power of the pontiff.

That proposed canon was not promulgated in the revised Code; the practice, however, continues. Norms for such cases, issued in 1973 by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, and affirmed in 1983, remain in effect. Jurisdiction belongs solely to the Apostolic See. An instruction accompanying a recent decision clarifies that the "favor" is granted in view of the new marriage (Canon Law Digest 9, 678). The conclusion to be drawn is that the actual dissolution is effected not by the power of the pontiff but by the consent to the new marriage. If that is the case, then "favor of the faith" privilege cases are akin to the Pauline privilege. The valid but non-sacramental marriage is dissolved, where there is evident good and serious cause, in favor of the baptism of one of the parties, and the dissolution results from the new consent.

J. "Separation While the Bond Endures" (cans. 1151-1155). Can. 1151 states the first and second rules: "Spouses have the duty and the right to preserve conjugal living unless serious causes excuse them." Specific examples of the exceptive clause are the case of adultery, wherein the innocent spouse "does have the right to sever conjugal living" (can. 1152, §1) and the case of "serious danger of spirit or body to the other spouse or children" which creates a "legitimate cause" for separating (can. 1153, §1). Woven into these canons are a "recommendation" that pardon not be refused, that the innocent spouse "be induced" to forgive the misdeed or to readmit the guilty spouse to conjugal life (can. 1155), as well as the qualification that the adultery not have been expressly or tacitly condoned. Additionally, after the separation, provision is to be made for the adequate support and education of the children (can. 1154).

K. Procedures: tribunals and marriage nullity cases. Three canons establish the general rules: the first two operate as presumptions of law (see cans. 1584-1586); the third states the church's jurisdiction over marriage cases of the baptized.

Can. 1060: "Marriage enjoys the favor of the law; consequently, when a doubt exists the validity of a marriage is to be upheld until the contrary is proven."

Can. 1101, §1: "The internal consent of the mind is presumed to be in agreement with the words or signs employed in celebrating marriage."

Can. 1671: "Marriage cases of the baptized belong to the ecclesiastical judge by proper right."

Different cases follow different procedures:

(1) Documentary procedures apply not only in the above-mentioned dissolution cases (see, e.g., on non-consummation, cans. 1697-1706) but also in the cases of presumed death of spouse (can. 1707), separation of spouses (cans. 1692-1696), and impediment or lack of canonical form (cans. 1686-1688).

(2) Formal cases of marriage nullity, however, involve judicial procedures, and are subject to the rules governing tribunals (cans. 1400-1500), contentious causes (cans. 1501-1670), and special norms for matrimonial cases (cans. 1671-1685).

It is generally held that the specific object of a marriage nullity case is the contract of marriage; it must, however, be remembered that doctrine inseparably identifies the valid contract of marriage of two baptized persons with its sacramental nature. Particularly sensitive canonical and pastoral situations arise when the case to be adjudicated involves a marriage and divorce of two baptized non-Catholics, neither of whom recognize the authority of the Catholic church to rule over them or their former marriage. Such cases arise when, e.g., one of those persons seeks to marry a Catholic, or, being already in another marriage, seeks to be received into the Catholic church.

VI. Conclusions

The canonical issues surrounding marriage are many: baptismal status, consent, consummation, canonical form, permissions and dispensations, jurisdiction and delegation, impediments (and dispensations from them), preparation for marriage, the properties attributed to different kinds of marriage, and various procedures of convalidation, separation, dissolution and nullity.

It has been criticized that marriage in the church has been overly juridicized, (that the numerous canons have overwhelmed its theological, liturgical, pastoral and personal aspects. Perhaps, however, the law is elaborate because marrying and marriage are complex human and sacred realities, and the persons who marry are complex beings with varying capacities to will and to know, to initiate and to fulfill the rights and obligations of marriage which is described as "a partnership of life and love."

It is the task of pastoral and liturgical ministers, as well as those who prepare couples for marriage, to ensure that the legal considerations are neither the sole nor primary metaphor of a person's experience of marriage and the church.

MARRIAGE, CIVIL, CHURCH AND

The attitude of the church toward civil marriage manifests one of the more convoluted areas of Catholic theology, Canon Law and practice. Vatican II states very clearly that all sacraments "not only presuppose faith, but by words and objects they also nourish, strengthen, and express it; that is why they are called 'sacraments of faith!'" (S.C., 59). The Rite of Marriage (1969), again stipulates that "Priests should first of all strengthen the faith of those about to be married for the sacrament of matrimony presupposes and demands faith" (7).

Both of these references seem simple enough. However, they do not take into account the situation today where a number of baptized Catholics no longer exercise any form of faith. Some may wish to have their marriages recognized as valid by the Christian community because of family and community connections or for other personal reasons. In order for that to happen they would have to pretend that they have faith and then celebrate their marriage in the church as a so-called sacramental marriage. There is no other alternative. Officially, the civil marriage, which in many ways would respond to their situation, is not recognized as valid. The paradox is obvious. As will become apparent, there are other paradoxes around this issue.

It was within this context that a number of dioceses in France developed a program of a ritual welcome or acknowledgement of the mandatory (in France) civil marriage for those couples who are not able to profess the faith which is the basis of a sacramental marriage (Schmeiser, "Marriage: New Alternatives"). Although this program has not been followed in the English-speaking world, the knowledge and concerns underlying its development were very present during the 1980 Synod of Bishops on the role of the Christian family in the modern world. Canadian Archbishop Henri Légaré, stated in regard to baptized non-believers: "We would like to refer to a final question, the marriage of baptized non-believers, or rather the refusal by incapacity—the sacrament being an affirmation of faith—of sacramental marriage to baptized non-believers, dismissing them by this fact to the state of public sinner as well as denying them the right to a natural or civil marriage. On one side, how do we establish the relationship of the human institution of marriage in its anteriority as a place of God's gift with the sacrament; on the other side, how do we establish the relationship between baptism, faith, intention and marriage as sacrament? In other words, would it not be opportune to support further the actual questioning of the teaching which joins the matrimonial contract of baptized persons who no longer believe and the sacrament?" (Pastorale et Famille, 76 [1980], p. 61 [author's translation]).

Other submissions were equally forceful.

One of the underlying concerns of these bishops is the importance of faith in all sacramental celebrations. Marriage has been designated as a covenantal relationship, a relationship which is symbolic of the relationship of Christ and the church. This covenantal relationship is rooted in the faith of the ministers and the receivers of the sacrament (i.e., the couple). Faith, as we know, is not a static reality. Levels of faith are certainly possible and the absence of active faith, even among the baptized, is also in the realm of possibility. To state, as has the present Code of Canon Law, that "a valid marriage cannot exist between baptized persons without its being by that very fact a sacrament" (C.I.C., 1055), places baptized nonbelievers in an untenable situation. They are unable, according to the law, to be validly married.

This certainly raises the issue of religious freedom and respect for the basic marriage relationship, in which the sacrament of marriage finds its home for those who share in Christian faith. The Declaration on Religious Freedom clearly states that "... in matters religious every manner of coercion on the part of men should be excluded" (D.H., 10). As well, the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World stipulates that the church should be ready to renounce any practice that raises doubts about the sincerity of its witness or when new conditions of life demand different arrangements (G.S., 76). It is serious to state that those who marry in a form other than that approved by the church are not really married, thus living in concubinage and in sin. On the other hand, great respect for sacramental marriage is not demonstrated when a person, breaking a previous civil marriage by divorce, is permitted to celebrate a new marriage in the church with little or no regard paid to the reality of the previous marriage.

Historically, we know that the position taken by the Code of Canon Law in can. 1055, par. 2, is significantly different from the statement of the Council of Trent and it is certainly debatable whether all marriages between baptized persons are sacraments. The International Theological Commission, sponsored by the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith, studied the issue and were unable to come up with a definite answer (Origins, 8 [1978-79]: 237). Many scholars have not had the same difficulty in affirming the impossibility of celebrating the sacrament of matrimony against one's will.

The propositions of the 1980 Synod of Bishops, although recognizing that no person is a believer if he or she formally rejects the faith (and thus cannot marry within the church), does not indicate whether these same people have the right to marry and whether this marriage is to be recognized by the church (The Tablet, 31 January [1982], p. 117, no. 12).

The Apostolic Exhortation on the Family, issued by John Paul II (Nov. 22, 1981) does not deal with the right to marry. Faith is required (ibid., p. 459-460, no. 68) and a civil marriage is not acceptable (but not forbidden) (ibid., p. 464, no. 82). This document does recognize the difference between a civil marriage and concubinage because of the commitment present in a civil marriage (ibid., p. 464, no. 82).

Research on the attitudes of the American and Canadian hierarchy toward civil marriage was carried out and published after the synod (Schmeiser, "Faith and the Right to Marry," Larson). Canadian pastors are frequently encouraged to recommend a civil marriage to couples when they are unable to celebrate a sacramental marriage. The authentic human value of this marriage is recognized and others are encouraged to respect the decision of the couple to marry in a civil ceremony. There is no reference to "concubinage" or "living in sin."

The American documentation is much more cautious. Almost nothing is said about civil marriage apart from condemning it as an evil. On the other hand, there are the usual statements about the necessity of faith for a sacramental marriage.

Other research on the good faith solution (internal forum) for Catholics living in a second marriage without the blessing of the church also indicates that there is implicit recognition of some kind of authentic validity to a marriage that is technically invalid (Schmeiser, "Internal Forum..."). A marriage is considered valid, in the internal forum, even though it is beyond legal or technical validity.

One other aspect of this issue is the historical recognition for sixteen centuries of a civil marriage as the sacramental marriage for Christians. These marriages were recognized as valid and sacramental even when a priest was not present and no blessing was given. This is still the situation where death is imminent or when a priest is unable to be present for a month (C.I.C., 1116). Possibly, a similar recognition of a civil marriage lies in the dispensation from the canonical form of marriage which can be given by an ordinary when a Catholic and baptized non-Catholic marry in a ceremony apart from the Catholic community (C.I.C., 1127).

Many scholars, in addition to many members of the hierarchy, are examining the possibility for two baptized persons to enter into a civil marriage. There is a pastoral need for some way to celebrate the marriage of a couple who have inadequate faith for a sacrament, but who are otherwise prepared. Chapter III of the Rite of Marriage offers a rite for celebrating a marriage between a Catholic and an unbaptized person. Possibly this rite could be broadened to include couples who may be baptized but who really have inadequate faith for a full sacramental celebration.

JAMES A. SCHMEISER

MARRIAGE, ECUMENICAL

Within the Roman Catholic church the source of new approaches to ecumenical or mixed marriages can be traced to the Second Vatican Council's Constitution on the Church (esp. L.G., 15), where it is acknowledged that the Catholic church is "joined in many ways" to all the baptized who are rightly honored by the name of Christian. From this perspective Catholics see that there is a real, even if yet imperfect communion which unites all baptized Christians. That is to say that as Christians we are linked through our churches and ecclesial communities to one another in various degrees of communion, even when we are not yet in full communion.

This understanding of degrees of communion is not found in earlier official

Catholic documents, such as the 1917 Code of Canon Law. In the view of the earlier document, either one was in full communion with the Catholic church or one was not. No further distinctions were made as far as other Christians were concerned. It was when the council highlighted the truth that even when not in full communion, Catholics remained linked by various bonds to other Christians, that Catholics began to speak of their "separated brethren." Perhaps because of its quaintness, that expression has begun to fade from official Catholic documents, being replaced simply by "other Christians" or "members of other churches and ecclesial communities."

From this shift in perspective, we can see developing many other shifts in pastoral outlook and practice. Some of the most notable can be seen with respect to mixed marriages uniting Catholics with other Christians. In years gone by, such marriages were seen to constitute a danger to the faith of the Catholic spouse and the children of the family. An impediment to such marriages was established in church law and no Catholic could validly enter such a marriage unless first dispensed from the impediment by the Catholic bishop for certain specific "canonical reasons." In 1967, Pope Paul VI removed this impediment from the law in his apostolic letter Matrimonia Mixta. Thereafter, with the permission of their bishop, Catholics could enter such mixed marriages for any just and reasonable cause. At the same time the pope waived the prior requirement of Canon Law that other Christians sign promises that children be baptized and brought up as Catholics. Now, only the Catholic party entering a mixed marriage is asked to promise to do what he or she could to share the Catholic faith with future children. The other Christian party is to be informed of the Catholic partner's promise. Pope Paul VI at the same time modified what had previously been the Catholic church's nearly universal insistence that all mixed marriages involving a Catholic partner be entered into according to "canonical form," i.e., in the presence of a Catholic priest and two witnesses. This requirement was originally introduced into church law to obviate the danger of clandestine marriages. In the 1983 Code of Canon Law, following the direction of Paul VI, Catholic bishops may dispense from the required canonical form "if serious difficulties pose an obstacle to its observance" and as long as there is "some public form of celebration of the marriage" (can. 1127).

As the provisions of Catholic law changed, one can also perceive a gradual shift in Catholic attitudes as revealed in successive statements of the popes. While inter-Christian marriages involving Catholics could be more readily provided for, the emphasis at first remained on the undoubted difficulties couples in such marriages must face, rather than on the positive ecumenical contribution they might make. This was not unexpected given the higher incidence of marital break up in exogamous marriages. Thus in the 1967 apostolic letter, Paul VI wrote that "The Church is indeed aware that mixed marriages, precisely because they admit differences of religion and are a consequence of the divisions among Christians, do not, except in some cases, help in re-establishing unity among Christians." Later in 1975 in his apostolic exhortation on Evangelization in the Modern World, he advanced a somewhat more positive view of the ecumenical role of mixed marriages. There he wrote that "families resulting from a mixed marriage also have the duty of proclaiming Christ to the children in the fullness of the consequences of a common baptism; they have, moreover, the difficult task of becoming builders of unity." In 1980 a synod of bishops met in Rome to discuss the situation of the family in contemporary society. The following year, Pope John Paul II issued another apostolic exhortation, On the Family, which speaks still more positively about the ecumenical role of mixed marriages. He wrote: "Marriages between Catholics and other baptized persons have their particular nature, but they contain numerous elements that could well be made good use of and developed, both for their intrinsic value and for the contribution that they can make to the ecumenical movement. This is particularly true when both parties are faithful to their religious duties. Their common baptism and the dynamism of grace provide the spouses in these marriages with the basis and motivation for expressing their unity in the sphere of moral and spiritual values. For this purpose and also in order to highlight the ecumenical importance of mixed marriages which are fully lived in the faith of the two Christian spouses an effort should be made to establish cordial cooperation between the Catholic and the non-Catholic ministers from the time that preparations begin for the marriage and the wedding ceremony even though this does not always prove easy."

Though not always easy, pastoral practice in recent years has evidenced great strides forward in this area. Catholic deacons and priests as they prepare couples for mixed marriages will show the respect due to the conscience and religious liberty of the partner who is not a Catholic just as they hope to ascertain the same respect for the religious rights and duties of the Catholic partner. Often these matters come into clear focus in the counseling sessions when the religious upbringing of future children is discussed by the couple. Experience in this field has led pastoral counselors to certain practical conclusions.

If it is at all possible to do so, it is far better for the couple, acting jointly, to come to a clear determination concerning the religious formation of children prior to their marriage and then to hold to it unless serious new factors in the future demand a reconsideration. As a married couple they shall have to make many serious decisions jointly. Their capacity to reach this decision together would be one clear indication of their preparation as persons to enter married life together. When the couples' decision is known before-hand, they are also somewhat protected from an ensuing tension between their families which may seek to exert claims on the religious upbringing of children once they are born and eliciting strong bonds of affection from their grandparents, uncles, aunts and others. If, on the other hand, the couple find themselves truly unable, even with the help of counselors, to come to an agreement about the religious upbringing of future children, they have prima facie reason to pause and reconsider their situation. They may be facing incompatibilities of a serious nature which they shall no more be able to resolve in married life than before it.

Pastoral experience has also convinced many counselors that it is not a solution to defer the question with the proposal that when the children are old enough they may choose their church allegiances for themselves. Such an approach does not readily provide a secure religious orientation for young children, a sense of truly belonging, since they are being prompted to defer and avoid a childhood identification with one church community. As they grow older and are asked to come to a decision, the psychological factors of having to choose for the father or the mother's side can be very stressful for a child approaching adolescence.

Thus there is a real advantage in taking up such matters prior to the marriage and dealing with them in a sensitive, respectful and realistic manner. There is clearly an additional advantage when it is possible for the ministers of both churches of the couple to offer such counseling jointly or collaboratively. In such a setting further confidence is gained that the religious rights and obligations in conscience of both parties are being respected and that neither is subjected to one-sided pressure.

In the course of such preparation, the couple will have to explore the ways in which they will develop a life of shared prayer, devotion and service in their households while still being members of distinct religious communities. The possibilities will vary, depending on how divergent their religious backgrounds and communities are. Again, an approach that matches respect with realism is called for. Yet a family which cannot discover a common life of prayer in which all members can share equally is missing an important life sustaining element. Here, too, expert pastoral counseling can serve to point out possibilities the couple themselves may not have been aware of. Also, since personal religious discussion may not have been a prominent feature of their conversations while dating, they need to be alerted to the fact that many people sense their religious interests, commitment and fervor rising in the early years of marriage. Otherwise, when this phenomenon occurs, it may be misinterpreted as a distancing factor in the marriage, the attempt of each partner to assert a distinct identity over against the other in a competitive way.

The actual celebration of the marriage offers possibilities for Catholic ministers to join with or be joined by other ministers in ways that were not open before Vatican II. There can be little doubt that when the churches and religious communities through their representative ministers show themselves united in prayer and support for a couple entering a mixed marriage, that a strong and hope-filled message is conveyed to all, especially to the couple, their family and friends. It is an important teaching moment. The Catholic church in the United States stresses that there should be only one celebration of the marriage following an established public form, not double or successive wedding ceremonies. When the marriage is celebrated according to the canonical form of the Catholic church, the Catholic minister (deacon or priest) is the one who will witness the exchange of marital consent by the couple. If the marriage, with the requisite dispensation from the canonical form, is celebrated according to another religious rite, the Catholic minister may take an active part, but not the leading ministerial role or one on a par with the minister of the church whose marriage service is being followed. The ministers themselves arrange in advance for the proper distribution of their roles in keeping with the guidelines set down in 1968 by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Many concur that since Vatican II the Catholic church in collaboration with other churches has made genuine progress in developing new and more supportive ways to assist couples in their preparation for and celebration of mixed marriages. A number of Catholic dioceses have, in fact, issued joint guidelines to this end with other church judicatories. Where a need remains to be met is in offering support for ongoing married life. In spite of all that is done in preparation for their marriage, mixed couples can still feel themselves marginalized by the church communities after marriage. Their families can tend to fall in the gaps between the churches. When attending each other's churches, the one who is not a member of that church can subtly (sometimes not so subtly) be made to feel an outsider. The difficulties for the couple to remain active and in regular attendance at two different churches is undeniable. Here much more must be done to extend further and more effective pastoral care to the special needs of these couples. That is something few experienced observers would deny. While the field needs to be addressed, it is not entirely free of controversy among Catholics. As an example, one may witness the Catholic Marriage Encounter movement divided into two wings. One welcomes non-Catholic Christians. The other restricts itself exclusively to Catholics, suggesting that other Christians should maintain their own distinct counterpart movements.

Since Vatican II the Catholic church has not made any special provisions for mixed marriage couples in terms of joint worship or sacramental sharing. It has, however, adopted new policies in this field which it offers for all. It encourages Christians to participate to the extent possible in one another's worship. But it places some clear restrictions on sacramental sharing, for it regards such sharing as a sign of full communion or a very high degree of communion within the church. It provides for exceptions, but these are in response to individual need and not as a matter of regular practice. Catholic ministry may permit other Christians to share in the eucharist, in penance and reconciliation, and in the anointing of the sick as these sacraments are celebrated in the Catholic church. The conditions upon which such permissions may be extended are summarized in can. 844 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law. In brief there are three: another Christian in need may be admitted a) if they spontaneously request these sacraments, b) are unable under the circumstances to receive them from their own minister, and c) are properly disposed, approaching these sacraments as Christians should, in faith and with repentance for personal sins. Catholics in need may similarly request the sacraments from ministers in other churches whose sacraments the Catholic church regards as valid.

The first two conditions reveal the concern of the Catholic church that the sacraments not be used as inducements to draw a Christian from one church community into another. A counterpart sensitivity is shown in the matter of funeral services. Can. 1183 of the 1983 Code allows Catholic ministers to officiate at the funeral of other Christians under two provisions: a) that this would not be evidently against the will of the deceased, and b) that the proper minister of the deceased is unavailable to conduct the funeral.

Each of these measured steps by the Catholic church reflects the impact of Vatican II. That council remains a living force within the Catholic community. As experience is gained, pastoral practice may reveal the advisability of still further steps to be taken.

In the particular cases of Catholic-Orthodox mixed marriages such further steps have in fact already been taken by the Catholic church. In its Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches, n. 18, Vatican II established that when Eastern Catholics and Orthodox Christians marry, the canonical form would be required only for liceity. Should the couple marry without the requisite dispensation from the form, the marriage would still be considered valid by the Catholic church. A subsequent decree, Crescens Matrimonium, was issued by the Congregation for the Eastern church in 1967 stating that by the decision of Paul VI this same provision was extended to marriages between Latin rite Catholics and the Orthodox.

The Catholic church also provides for greater common worship, including sacramental sharing, between Catholics and Orthodox due to the close communion that exists between these churches. This applies to all Catholics and Orthodox, but naturally has particular relevance to Catholic-Orthodox couples. No restrictions are placed on the Orthodox who of their own accord and with proper dispositions wish to receive the sacraments of penance, the eucharist and anointing of the sick in the Catholic church. And no objection is made to Catholics receiving these sacraments from Orthodox priests when it is physically or morally impossible to receive them from a Catholic priest.

In opening up these possibilities the Catholic church has stressed the importance of consultation with Orthodox bishops. Since the Orthodox churches hold to the principle of restricting admission to the sacraments in their churches to the Orthodox faithful, one can see that the situation in fact is not as open as it would seem simply from the point of view of Catholic policy. Other questions are engendered by the fact that the Orthodox hold that any Orthodox who wishes to enter a sacramental marriage must do so before an Orthodox priest who is considered to be the minister of the sacrament. The Orthodox point out that Latin rite priests do not administer the sacrament since they have no intention of doing so, because they regard the couple themselves to be the ministers of it. In effect this has meant that should an Orthodox and Catholic marry in the presence of a Catholic priest, the status of the Orthodox partner becomes irregular in the eyes of the Orthodox church and there can be no further participation in the sacramental life of that church until the marriage is regularized through the sacramental blessing of an Orthodox priest. The search for an equitable solution to such difficulties continues to be sought by Catholic and Orthodox authorities.

MARRIAGE, LITURGY OF

Christ neither established the state of marriage nor provided us with a liturgy for matrimony. However, Jesus did display a sensitive regard for the joining of husband and wife, spoke several significant words about that union and elevated this natural relationship to the divine level of a sacrament.

The fact that his initial miracle took place at a wedding in Cana of Galilee and eliminated a potentially embarrassing situation for the bridal couple has been cited by many as a sign of Christ's special concern for marriage and his particular blessing upon this state.

Jesus likewise uttered apodictic, unqualified and straightforward comments about the unbreakability of the marital bond which quite sharply challenged the prevailing view of his time. His very words as he repudiated divorce recalled the original Genesis ideal of two becoming one and remaining faithful forever.

According to Roman Catholic belief, Christ finally lifted the natural union of spouses to the status of a supernatural sacrament. Nevertheless, it took the church many centuries, a millennium or more, to articulate a somewhat complete understanding of marriage's sacramental nature and an equally long or longer period to develop a standard rite of marriage.

Historical Development

For a thousand years after the Cana event, the secular state tended to handle most marriage and divorce details. The church was always present with prayer and blessing, but not until the civil society started to break down did it enter more fully into the legal and ceremonial aspects of marital relationships.

Church leaders began to view marriage as one of the seven official sacraments during the 12th and 13th centuries. The Second Council of Lyons (1274) listed marriage among the seven church sacraments; the Council of Florence (1439) formally proclaimed matrimony as a sacrament; the Council of Trent (1563) more explicitly defined this teaching; the Second Vatican Council reiterated these concepts (G.S., 47-52).

In the 11th century an obligatory church ceremony emerged and by the 12th century there was an established wedding ritual in different parts of Europe. However, numerous local variations prohibited the development of a standard nuptial rite.

The Council of Trent in the 16th century, reacting against the harmful effects of secret or clandestine marriages, declared: no Christian marriage would be valid or a sacrament unless contracted in the presence of a priest and two witnesses. Those who did not follow this step would be judged guilty of grave sin and treated as adulterers; moreover, the forthcoming marriage had to be announced publicly three weeks in advance and registered in the parish records immediately afterwards.

That teaching remained in effect for subsequent centuries and continues today with the adaptations and exceptions which will be touched upon below. The wedding liturgy in the Catholic church prior to Vatican II reflected those Tridentine directives. Nuptial celebrations had a fixed and clerical character. They were fixed in that the ritual, the readings, and other texts never varied. For example, the rite always included St. Paul's admonitions to the Ephesians in chap. 5 and Matthew's account of the exchange between Jesus and the Pharisees. They were clerical in that the priest did almost everything during the ceremony itself.

All of this changed radically in 1969 with the publication of the revised Rite of Marriage according to the dictates of the Second Vatican Council. The new ritual contains a rich variety of biblical readings, prayers, and blessings from which to choose and encourages the bride and groom to select those texts which best correspond to their hopes for the future. It provides other options for the celebration and urges the involvement of lay persons as leaders in the rite, such as lectors or readers. Finally, it stresses full congregational participation in the liturgy by word, song, and deed.

Frame work of the Liturgy

The renewed format understandably follows the standard pattern or framework employed for all the restored sacramental liturgies. It includes an entrance or gathering rite, a liturgy of the word, a rite of marriage, a liturgy of the eucharist or a prayer-blessing section, and a conclusion or dismissal rite. The ritual provides a "Rite for Celebrating Marriage During Mass," a "Rite for Celebrating Marriage Outside Mass," a "Rite for Celebrating Marriage Between a Catholic and an Unbaptized Person," and "Texts for Use in the Marriage Rite and in the Wedding Mass." Both the framework and the content will become clearer as one examines each part of the ritual in detail.

The entrance rite is intended to gather together the people present—clergy, wedding party, relatives and guests—and mold them swiftly, but gently into a community of believing worshippers. The ritual, in a typically general, flexible way, describes the rite with several possibilities, but urges the priest (or deacon or delegated presider) to meet the "bride and bridegroom in a friendly manner, showing that the Church shares their joy" (n. 19).

That permissible adaptability for the procession has been played out in the United States generally in one of these ways: a procession led by the presiding clergy and ministers; one including ushers, bridesmaids, maid or matron of honor, bride and father; another in similar order but with both parents accompanying the bride; still another arrangement with both bride and groom flanked by parents and preceded by ushers and bridesmaids.

This gathering rite concludes by an opening prayer with four alternatives provided in the ritual.

The liturgy of the word has been designed to stir up the faith of the participants, to communicate a biblical message about marriage to them, and to help them recognize the presence of Christ in the sacramental rite soon to follow.

The ritual cites many suitable OT/NT texts and the engaged couple is encouraged to select those which they find most appropriate for them. The rite lists eight OT passages, ten from the NT, specifically from the various letters or the book of Revelation, ten gospel excerpts and seven responsorial psalms. Moreover, the couple may choose other scriptural texts provided that they appear in an approved lectionary and may select as many as three readings in addition to the psalm.

The homily should be drawn from these sacred texts and speak about the "mystery of Christian marriage, the dignity of wedded love, the grace of the sacrament and the responsibilities of married people, keeping in mind the circumstances of this particular marriage" (n. 22).

A rubric in the "Introduction" to the Rite of Marriage contains this very pastoral advice: "Priests should show special consideration to those who take part in liturgical celebrations or hear the gospel only on the occasion of a wedding, either because they are not Catholics, or because they are Catholics who rarely, if ever, take part in the eucharist or seem to have abandoned the practice of their faith. Priests are ministers of Christ's gospel to everyone" (n. 9).

The Rite of Marriage begins with an introduction or invitation to the bride and groom and the posing of three questions about their freedom of choice, faithfulness to each other, and acceptance and upbringing of children. There follows the declaration of consent (two formulas are provided), the blessing of rings (three options are given) and the exchange of bands accompanied by "Take this ring as a sign of my love and fidelity. In the name of the Father, and of . . ."

What occurs after this section depends upon whether the celebration will take place during or outside of Mass. When marriage occurs during Mass, the blessing and exchange of rings is followed by the general intercessions and the liturgy of the eucharist which includes the nuptial blessing. When marriage occurs outside of Mass, the blessing and exchange of rings is followed by a combination of general intercessions with the nuptial blessing and the Our Father. As in other similar situations, several alternative formulas are given in the rite for the prayer over the gifts, the preface, nuptial blessing and the prayer after communion.

The conclusion or dismissal rite contains a blessing either with the simple trinitarian benediction or with a more solemn form of which four are provided, including one unique to the United States.

The "Rite for Celebrating Marriage Between a Catholic and an Unbaptized Person" observes the pattern outlined and described above with some obvious and necessary, but minor adaptations.

There are a number of other issues or concerns connected with the liturgy of marriage besides the official rite itself which should be touched on here.

Engagement

In the United States couples in the past often have requested a simple blessing upon the recently given or received engagement ring. Very few, however, ask for a formal betrothal or engagement ceremony. Nevertheless, couples from a Hispanic tradition frequently observe a series of ritualized customs connected with the prospective bride and groom's request for engagement.

While there are good reasons for encouraging an integration of the couple's religious practices and their nuptial engagement, the American bishops have emphasized that the freedom and even responsibility of either person or both to terminate the engagement and not proceed with the marriage must always be taught and fostered.

The Catholic Household Blessings and Prayers published in 1988 by the U.S. Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy contains a rite for the "Blessing of an Engaged Couple." The rubrics suggest that ordinarily this ritual is celebrated by both families, perhaps at a meal together. One of the parents serves as the prayer leader and both sets of parents place their hands on their children's heads in blessing.

Music

In 1972 the American Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy issued a pivotal document, Music in Catholic Worship, which was subsequently revised in 1983. It addressed the sometimes thorny question of wedding music with these words: "Great care should be taken, especially at marriages, that all the people are involved at the important moments of the celebration, that the same general principles of planning worship and judging music are employed as at other liturgies, and, above all, that the liturgy is a prayer for all present, not a theatrical production."

In 1982 the same group published a second document, Liturgical Music Today, which expanded upon its earlier recommendations for music at nuptial liturgies. Among other things, they said: "Weddings present particular challenges and opportunities to planners. It is helpful for a diocese or a parish to have a definite (but flexible) policy regarding wedding music. This policy should be communicated early to couples as a normal part of their preparation in order to avoid last minute crises and misunderstandings. Both musician and pastor should make every effort to assist couples to understand and share in the planning of their marriage liturgy. Sometimes the only music familiar to the couple is a song heard at a friend's ceremony and one not necessarily suitable to the sacrament. The pastoral musician will make an effort to demonstrate a wider range of possibilities to the couple, particularly in the choice of music to be sung by the entire assembly present for the liturgy."

Since publication of those documents, two developments have occurred in the United States. First, some dioceses have introduced the kind of flexible policies on wedding music urged by the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy in its directives. Secondly, more and more parish music directors personally meet with the engaged couple to demonstrate and discuss appropriate musical selections for their approaching wedding. These sessions both expand the artistic horizons of the bride and groom and at the same time reduce potential tensions caused by their insistence upon songs or styles which may be personal favorites, but would be liturgical liabilities.

Rehearsals

A confluence of factors makes the wedding rehearsal a great challenge for those in pastoral ministry. There is a gathering of strangers, a complexity of attitudes or feelings and a high level of nervous anxiety within the bride and groom. Those who conduct the rehearsal, either the person who will preside over the liturgy or, with greater frequency today, trained wedding coordinators, clearly in this situation need to possess patience, tact and a sense of humor.

Some have found that after assembling and settling down the groups, a brief informal period of prayer can quickly help create a relaxed, but serious and reverent atmosphere. This prayerful interlude includes a passage from scripture, some silence, the Our Father and a spontaneous prayer petition seeking God's blessing upon the rehearsal, the wedding and the marriage.

While couples are still urged to receive reconciliation or penance prior to their marriage, the custom of hearing confessions after the rehearsal has declined.

Place of Marriage

The 1983 Code of Canon Law indicates that marriage involving a Catholic should take place in the parish church. However, it also makes provision for the legitimate celebration of the nuptial liturgy in other churches and in other places.

Many dioceses in the United States have now issued norms that marriages, normally should take place in a church to emphasize the spiritual and sacramental nature of the event. Nevertheless, there are several occasions when the greater good of the couple and of the families involved will warrant the celebration of marriage in a place other than a church. The wedding of a Catholic person to a Jewish partner is a clear case in point.

Within or Outside of Mass

Various official church documents urge the celebration of matrimony within the context of a nuptial Mass. However, this ideal has in many instances become a pastoral difficulty in contemporary times. There are several reasons which have created that situation:

(1) The decline in the number of available priests has compelled many to offer multiple Masses each weekend. The need to celebrate additional nuptial eucharists compounds that burden for them.

(2) Deacons, with increasing frequency, are celebrating marriages.

(3) Engaged couples of a marginal religious nature may have sufficient faith for the reception of matrimony, but seemingly inadequate faith for the reception of the eucharist.

(4) It is often more pastorally suitable to celebrate an interreligious, interfaith, ecumenical or mixed marriage outside of, rather than within Mass.

(5) Delegated lay persons can today assist at marriages where priests or deacons are lacking.

Interreligious Weddings

The celebration of interreligious or mixed marriages, i.e., the wedding of a Catholic and one who is not a Catholic, has undergone significant modifications within the past half century. For example, in the 1940s, the exchange of vows took place in the rectory or outside the church; in the 1950s, such weddings might be celebrated in the church, but outside the sanctuary; in the 1960s, these moved inside the sanctuary; in the 1970s, they might include a previously prohibited nuptial Mass and blessing.

This gradual change represents the church's attempt to balance two pastoral concerns: the church wishes to encourage marital unions in which both share the same faith and religious practice, but it also wishes to show great solicitude for the many couples who will enter interfaith marriages.

On January 1, 1971, the U.S. Catholic bishops, following norms issued by Pope Paul VI, issued directives covering the celebration of interfaith or interreligious marriages. These guidelines contained the following practical points:

(a) The couple may have the banns or announcements of the forthcoming marriage published in advance.

(b) As noted above, they may celebrate their vows in the context of a nuptial Mass.

(c) The non-Catholic's minister is welcomed to participate in the ceremony.

(d) The person who is not Catholic signs no statement and makes no promises about the Catholic upbringing of the children.

(e) The Catholic signs or gives orally this promise: "I reaffirm my faith in Jesus Christ and, with God's help, intend to continue living that faith in the Catholic church. I promise to do all in my power to share the faith I have received with our children by having them baptized and reared as Catholics." The non-Catholic spouse needs to be aware of this promise.

(f) With the bishop's permission the marriage may take place in the church of the person who is not a Catholic and be witnessed by the clergy of that tradition.

The current Code of Canon Law in effect confirms these developments in the celebration of such interreligious marriages within the Catholic church.

Adaptations

There have been many informal adaptations of the official rite to individual celebrations of the Roman Catholic nuptial liturgy. These include, for example, use of a wedding or unity candle, comments from relatives or guests made to the couple as part of the homily or just before dismissal, blessing of the bride and groom by the parents, a symbolic gift for the poor, the exchange of vows made facing the assembly and other regional or ethnic variations.

However, in this country no substantive adaptations have traveled the full journey required for formal incorporation as part of the ritual. That path would involve study and proposal by the U.S. Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, endorsement by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and approbation or confirmation by the Holy See. Such possibilities are mentioned in church legislation and may occur in the future, but presently we do not possess these types of innovations.

What we do witness, nevertheless, is the active participation of the engaged couple in the preparation and celebration of the liturgy for marriage. A comparison of statistics on the sale of booklets needed for preparing the nuptial service and on the number of Catholic weddings, annually indicates that almost every bride and groom is at least offered the option of selecting their texts and planning a personal ceremony. In addition, there are signs of an accelerating trend for full congregational participation in song.

This growing active involvement of all in preparing and celebrating the liturgy of marriage is indeed welcome news, especially in the face of a 1989 report by sociological researchers which projects that two-thirds of contemporary first marriages will end in separation or divorce. Good nuptial liturgies may in fact help curb those bad cultural patterns.

JOSEPH M. CHAMPLIN

MARRIAGE, MINISTERS OF

In the tradition of the Latin church, the bride and groom are understood to be both the ministers and the recipients of the sacrament of marriage. As important as his role may be, the priest, deacon, or even designated lay person, is considered to be the assistant or principal and official witness of the Christian community, as well as the minister of the nuptial blessing.

The theological development during the past century has accentuated the ecclesial dimension of all sacraments. The community, gathered in faith, is the primary minister of the liturgy, and as such cannot give up its role or delegate its role to either the couple or to the priest. An overemphasis on the couple as ministers of the sacrament could lead to a diminution of this ecclesial dimension.

This understanding is reflected within the statements of Vatican II as well as in other documents. Christian marriages and all sacraments are celebrations of Christian faith and celebrations of the entire believing community. As such, the normal place for a marriage celebration is the parish church. It is recommended by some that since the wedding Mass is not a private or family affair, the entire parish be invited to come and participate fully in the liturgical celebration. In Canada, all are encouraged to receive the eucharist under both species. The families or members of the community may provide the bread and the wine for the eucharistic celebration. The choice of music should facilitate the active participation of the community.

What is important is that all are celebrants, no one is a spectator. The congregation, as well as the bride and groom, are invited to respond "Amen" to the reception of the vows by the priest and to the priest's prayer of blessing over the rings. During the nuptial blessing all are invited to pray for the couple and, again, all conclude the prayer by "Amen." In the general intercessions the community prays for the couple and for the needs of the church and the world.

Part of the basis for the position that spouses are the ministers of marriage was the understanding of marriage as a contract, a concept which dates back to Roman times. However, Vatican II did change the vocabulary of marriage as contract to a "community of love" (G.S., 47), an "intimate partnership of conjugal life and love" (G.S., 48), a "conjugal covenant of irrevocable personal consent" (G.S., 48). The understanding of marriage as covenant has significance, not only for the couple, but for the whole community, which has a vested interest in the symbolism of this covenant. When a marriage is celebrated and lived as a community of love, the relationship of Christ with the community is signified, realized, and deepened. As such, the community is a vital part of this reality, an involvement that is to be manifested in the celebration as well as in support for the married couple.

There is a long tradition in the Western church that valid and sacramental marriages may be celebrated without a priest being present. This tradition is reflected in current documents. Deacons may now assist at a marriage (C.I.C., 1108). In addition to the ancient norm that, in danger of death or even when a priest is absent for a month, a valid and lawful marriage may be contracted before witnesses alone (C.I.C., 1116), the new code goes on to state that the "diocesan bishop can delegate lay persons to assist at marriages where priests or deacons are lacking" (C.I.C., 1112, par. 1). It is also the opinion of some that a lay person could give the nuptial blessing or say the other presidential prayers (McManus, p. 101). To extend this position even further, with permission, an interfaith marriage between a Catholic and another Christian may be celebrated in the absence of an ordained minister (C.I.C., 1127). It has been argued by some that the shift from the active form as enunciated by the priest ("I join you in marriage, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit"), which seemed to specify a joining power, to the more nuanced form ("You have declared your consent before the Church. May the Lord in his goodness strengthen your consent and fill you both with his blessings. What God has joined, men must not divide") is also indicative of the central ministerial role of the couple.

The couple are invited to express their ministerial role in many ways: in the gathering of the community; in the choice of the opening prayers; in the preparation of the presidential introduction to the liturgy of the word; in the choice of the number and the selection of the readings; in the choice of the responsorial psalm and antiphon; in the choice between the statement or question format of consent (the statement form is more active without the formal interrogation by the priest); in the choice of different blessings of the rings or the possibility of composing another suitable formula; in the composition of the prayers of the faithful; in the choice of the preface; in the choice of the eucharistic prayer; in the choice of the nuptial blessing; in the choice of the solemn blessing; in the kiss of peace.

As well, the couple may bring the gifts—bread, wine and water—to the priest. Finally, the couple, as well as others present, may also receive communion from the cup.

Vatican II did balance the emphasis on the role of the couple with the new stipulation that the nuptial blessing was never to be omitted, and that the priest is to ask for and receive the consent of the couple (S.C., 77 and 78). The presidential prayers of the priest emphasize his liturgical ministry. He receives the couple's consent to a Christian marriage in the name of the church; he commissions them in the name of the church; he blesses them in the name of the church; he preaches the word of God; and he promises them the support of the community. As such, he represents the local church as well as the universal church. To that extent, he functions as a co-minister of this sacrament.

In conclusion, whatever the historical reasons in the West for the designation of the couple as the ministers of the sacrament of marriage, it is important to stress their active participation in this celebration of faith. Within the current atmosphere of divorce and anonymous relationships, it is crucial that the couple recognize their role in developing a covenantal relationship which will touch their entire lives. Passivity, whether in the liturgical celebration or in their societal lives, will lead to a deadening of their spirit and of their relationship. They are to be ministers of committed love to each other, they are to be ministers of embodied love within the community, on the day of their wedding and during their married lives.

However, it is also recognized that we do not live in isolation from each other. The community must minister to the couple, affirming its love, its support, its faith, its history, and its hope. The experience of isolation by many of our married couples may be symptomatic of a community that no longer experiences itself as a ministering community.

The role of the priest is situated within the facilitating function for both the couple and the larger community. As the liturgical presider, he functions as he does in all sacramental celebrations. One main area of concern is how the exceptions to the role of the priest will influence ecumenical discussions with the Orthodox church which emphasizes the essential role of the priest as the minister of this sacrament. These exceptions also leave the door open to the recognition of a civil marriage as the public form of celebration of a Christian and sacramental marriage.

When considered liturgically, as distinct from canonically, the ministers of marriage are the couple, as well as the larger community and the priest. All exercise an essential role.

MARRIAGE, PREPARATION FOR

This article begins with a description of marriage preparation as I remember it during my initial years as a priest in the mid-1950s just prior to the Second Vatican Council. It is essentially a comparison between two moments in Roman Catholic pastoral practice. The processes described will hopefully be of interest to other Christians as well.

The clergy in those days first met with the engaged couple, established the time and date for the wedding and explained the required church and civil documentation. He then either exhorted the pair to participate in one of the diocesan-sponsored pre-Cana programs or perhaps planned a few evenings for the three of them to discuss the sacrament of matrimony and other marital matters. Later, the priest would complete the necessary forms, conduct the rehearsal and carry out the ceremony.

The pre-Cana programs at that time usually emphasized the priest as the speaker-teacher, although there was a developing movement to include married couples for presentations on topics that were considered to be within their competence such as budgeting finances or purchasing furniture. The sessions might have included an audio-visual and a question box, but the uses of multiple media and process education were only in their infancy stages.

Vatican II and the subsequent renewal naturally changed marriage preparation in radical ways, just as its reforms brought about enormous transformations in almost every aspect of Catholic life and practice. Specifically, the church officially called lay persons to be involved in marriage preparation efforts. The Decree on the Apostolate of Lay People spoke about a "like to like" ministry and explicitly cited "assisting engaged couples to make a better preparation for marriage" as an example of works of the family apostolate (A.A., 13, 11).

Almost two decades later the 1983 Code of Canon Law stated that the total "ecclesial community," not merely the clergy, provide assistance for, among other things, the engaged couple's "personal preparation for marriage." It also suggested that the local ordinary consult

"men and women of proven experience and skill" to help organize marriage preparation and enrichment programs (cans. 1063-1064).

Couples, through official church encouragement and their individual inclination, began to prepare much more personal wedding liturgies. Pre-Vatican II nuptial services, on the other hand, were almost identically alike and mainly the work of the presiding priest.

The renewed marriage ritual followed the model of all revised rites and included a resource of many prayers, biblical readings and blessings from which to choose. Moreover, the church, directly with its general liturgical directives and indirectly with its introduction to the Rite of Marriage, urged active participation by the wedding party and the assembled community in the preparation and celebration of the wedding liturgy itself.

The explosion of creative religious education materials and processes understandably flowed over into marriage preparation efforts.

A 1982 study revealed that 88 U.S. dioceses, even then, used some form of instrument or inventory to facilitate pre-marriage dialogue between the couple and those guiding them in their preparatory steps. The most common ones employed today are F.O.C.C.U.S. (Facilitating Open Couple Communication, Understanding and Study), P.M.I. (Pre-Marital Inventory) and P.R.E.P.A.R.E. (Premarital Personal and Relationship Enrichment).

Films, filmstrips and videotapes are now an expected part of every marriage preparation program, as are various group processes based on the discoveries of adult education experts.

Engaged couples generally can select from a variety of preparation programs the type with which they are most comfortable. These include: an Engaged Encounter weekend; an all day or several evening diocesan or regional event; a similar activity offered instead on the parish level; a somewhat structured Evenings for the Engaged conducted in four or more sessions by local faith community of married couples; an informal one-to-one, couple-to-couple or sponsor-couple exchange ordinarily hosted in the home of the married persons.

A very delicate and frequently difficult issue facing church leaders at the present is the request for a nuptial liturgy by couples whose adherence to Catholic faith practices is minimal or seemingly non-existent and/or whose natural readiness for marriage appears highly questionable.

In his 1982 apostolic exhortation, Familiaris Consortio (On the Family), Pope John Paul II dealt with that particular challenge. His guidelines recognize the natural right of the couple to marry, but establish flexible norms to determine the existence of the minimal faith demanded for the sacrament of matrimony. These directives also express the hope that pastors will use the preparation and celebration of the nuptial liturgy as vehicles for the rediscovery, sustaining and deepening of the couple's religious belief and practice (par. 68).

His teaching echoes the words of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy which state that the sacraments are acts of faith and presuppose faith, but they also nourish, strengthen and express faith (S.C., 59).

Pope John Paul II in that apostolic exhortation likewise widens our understanding of marriage preparation. We customarily identify it with those activities which begin when the engaged couple approaches the clergy to arrange the wedding and conclude when the bridal pair march down the aisle and out of the church. The Holy Father, however, maintains that marriage preparation in truth starts at the womb and ends in the tomb. Children from their very first moments are, for better or for worse, being prepared to marry by the very life lived at home. Similarly, the later marriage is helped or hindered by the many environmental forces surrounding the husband and wife as they fulfill their marital vows over the years.

The pope, consequently, divides marriage preparation into remote (from birth until puberty), proximate (from puberty to the engagement), immediate (from the engagement through the wedding celebration) and aftercare (from the nuptial celebration onward).

How successful are contemporary marriage preparation efforts? For many reasons we do not possess solidly scientific statistics which prove that couples who complete marriage preparation programs are happier, enjoy more successful marital lives and experience a lower divorce rate. There are, nevertheless, surveys which indicate that such programs do make a constructive difference and promote growth in a couple's relationship.

Pope John Paul II provided this wise, even if simple, observation about marriage preparation: "Experience teaches that young people who have been well prepared for family life generally succeed better than others" (F.C., 66).

MARRIAGE, SACRAMENT OF

This article will deal with marriage as covenant, marriage as sacrament, and the special case of divorce and remarriage.

I. Christian Marriage As Covenant

Vatican II provides a contemporary Roman Catholic description of Christian marriage: "The intimate partnership of married life and love has been established by the Creator and qualified by his laws. It is rooted in the conjugal covenant of irrevocable personal consent. Hence, by that human act whereby spouses mutually bestow and accept each other, a relationship arises which by divine will and in the eyes of society, too is a lasting one. For the good of the spouses and their offspring as well as of society, the existence of this sacred bond no longer depends on human decisions alone" (G.S., 48).

Marriage is a community of life and love, founded in a mutual and irrevocable covenant, by which a Christian man and a Christian woman give and accept one another for the purpose of establishing an intimate partnership of their whole life. Reflection on this description will clarify our subject, the sacrament of marriage.

The word covenant is not idly chosen. It is an ancient theological word, conjuring up for Christian spouses biblical images of both the great covenant between God and God's people and the extension of that covenant in the new covenant between Jesus and his people. It is also a new canonical word, replacing in the 1983 Code of Canon Law the long-established legal word contract. Reflection on the distinctive nuances of contract and covenant will highlight crucial changes which have taken place in the Roman Catholic approach to the sacrament of marriage in the latter half of the 20th century.

Covenant is clearly a more biblical word than contract; it is also a more personal word. Contract bespeaks obligations; covenant, interpersonal gift. Paul Palmer has attempted to clarify the meanings of covenant by contrasting it with contract: "Contracts deal with things, covenants with people. Contracts engage the services of people; covenants engage persons. Contracts are made for a stipulated period of time; covenants are forever. Contracts can be broken, with material loss to the contracting parties; covenants cannot be broken, but if violated, they result in personal loss and broken hearts. Contracts are secular affairs and belong to the market place; covenants are sacral affairs and belong to the hearth, the temple or the church. Contracts are best understood by lawyers, civil and ecclesiastical; covenants are appreciated better by poets and theologians. Contracts are witnessed by people with the state as guarantor; covenants are witnessed by God with God as guarantor. Contracts can be made by children who know the value of a penny; covenants can be made only by adults who are mentally, emotionally and spiritually mature" (Theol. Studies 33 [1972]: 639).

These acute distinctions, which need not just to be read but also pondered, enable us to distinguish covenant from contract and also to name a significant change in the Roman Catholic approach to Christian marriage. It has become thoroughly personalist.

The description of marriage as covenant links it to the two model covenants in the Christian tradition, the Great Covenant between Yahweh and Yahweh's holy people and the New Covenant between Christ and his holy people called the church. There is, first, the Great Covenant; then there is the extension of this Great Covenant in the New Covenant; and, finally, there is the covenant of Christian marriage which is not only an extension of, but also a participation in, both. That final assertion needs some reflection.

The imaging of marriage as covenant has been traditionally a Protestant approach; the Catholic tradition has imaged it more as sacrament. The covenant approach emphasizes abiding interpersonal relationship founded in the abiding consent of the spouses. The sacramental approach emphasizes abiding and sacred bond which, though initiated by the consent of the spouses to be married, continues to exist even if that consent be withdrawn. That abiding bond continues to be a block to another marriage after a civil divorce. I hope to demonstrate that the two approaches are not as different as they might seem or as they have been made out to be. We must first ask, however, about the implications, both theoretical and practical, of saying that Christian marriage is a covenantal relationship?

To covenant is to commit oneself radically and solemnly. When a man and a woman covenant in Christian marriage, they commit themselves mutually to create a life of equal and intimate partnership in abiding love. They commit themselves mutually to create and sustain a climate of personal openness, acceptance, trust and honesty that will nurture such intimate community and abiding love. They commit themselves mutually to create rules of behavior which will respect, nurture and sustain intimate community and abiding love. They commit themselves mutually to explore together the religious depth of human existence, and therefore of marital existence, and to respond to that depth in the light of their Christian faith. They commit themselves mutually to abide in love and in covenant, and to withdraw from them only if the life of intimacy has ceased to exist and if all available means to restore it have been tried and have failed (See Yates, "The Protestant View of Marriage," Jour. of Ecumenical Studies 22 [1985]: 41-54). A brief commentary on these assertions will lead us from the Protestant image of marriage as covenant to the Catholic image of it as sacrament.

In Christian marriage, a man and a woman commit themselves to create a life of equal and intimate partnership in abiding love. When the Lord Yahweh made the heavens and the earth, when no plant had yet sprung up from the earth because the Lord Yahweh had not yet caused it to rain upon the earth, a mist went up from the earth and watered the ground. The mist, of course, turned the dry earth to mud, in Hebrew 'adamah, and from that 'adamah the Lord Yahweh formed 'adam and breathed into her and his nostrils the breath of life. And 'adam became a living being (Gen 2:4-7). "When the Lord Yahweh created 'adam, he made him in the likeness of Yahweh. Male and female he created them, and he blessed them and he named them 'adam" (Gen 5:1-2).

This myth, for it is a myth, provides those who accept it with an answer to a perennial question. Where did we come from? We, in English humankind, in Hebrew 'adam, came from God. Male and female as we are, we are from the Lord Yahweh, and together we make up humankind or 'adam. This fact alone, that Yahweh names man and woman together 'adam, founds the equality of man and woman as human beings. The further myth, which speaks of the creation of woman from the man's rib, intends in the original Hebrew to emphasize their equality, not their separate creation.

In their recent pastoral response to the concerns of women in the church, the Catholic bishops of the United States insist on this fact. Since "in the divine image . . . male and female (Yahweh) created them" (Gen 1:27), man and woman are equal in human dignity and favor in Yahweh's eyes. They are equal in everything that is human; they are "bone of bone and flesh of flesh" (Gen 2:23). It is because they are equal, says the myth, that woman and man may marry and "become one body" (Gen 2:24).

Western Christians have seriously misunderstood the Eastern myth about equal man and woman, 'adam. They have also misunderstood the Eastern myth about becoming one body. They have linked it too exclusively to a single facet of becoming one in marriage, namely the sexual. That facet is part of what is involved in becoming one body, but it is far from all that is involved. In the original biblical myth, body does not refer to the external, physical part of the human being, as it does in English. It refers rather to the whole person. In marriage, therefore, a man and a woman enter into not just a physical union, in which their physical bodies are made one, but into a personal union, in which their whole persons are made one. The union of their bodies in sexual intercourse is, at root, but the symbol of the union of their entire selves.

The covenant of marriage is a mutual commitment not only to create a life of equal partnership, but also to nurture and sustain it. When a man and a woman covenant in Christian marriage, therefore, they commit themselves mutually to create rules of behavior which will nurture and sustain the marriage resulting from their covenant. For committed Christians, those rules are found by paying careful attention to their tradition.

The letter to the Ephesians provides scriptural rules for the living out of the marriage covenant. Its writer, too late to be the apostle Paul, inherits a list of household duties traditional at the time and the place. He critiques the cultural assumption of inequality in this list, and instructs all Christians to "give way to one another because you stand in awe of Christ" (5:21). This critique challenges the absolute authority of any one Christian group over another, of husbands over wives for instance. It establishes as the basic attitude required of all Christians, even in marriage, an awe of Christ and a giving way to one another because of this.

As all Christians are to give way one another, it is hardly surprising that a wife is to give way to her husband, "as to the Lord" (5:22). There is a surprise, however, in the instruction given to husbands, at least for those husbands who see themselves as lord and master of their wives and who appeal to the letter to the Ephesians to support this perspective. The instruction is not that the husband is the head of the wife, which is the preferred male reading, but that "the husband is the head of the wife as (that is, in the same way as) Christ is head of the church" (5:23). An obvious question arises: how does Christ act as head of the church? The writer gives the equally obvious answer: "He gave himself up for her" (5:25). It is an echo of a self-description that Jesus offers in Mark's gospel: "The Son of Man came not to be served but to serve" (10:45).

The Christ-way to exercise authority is to serve. Jesus constantly pointed out to his power-hungry disciples that in his kingdom a leader is one who serves (Lk 22:26). A husband who wishes to be head over his wife, or a wife who wishes to be head over her husband, in the way that Christ is head over the church will be head by serving, by giving himself or herself up for the other.

Christlike headship is not absolute control of another human being. It is not making decisions and passing them on to another to carry out. It is not reducing another human being to the status of chattel. To be head as Christ is head is to serve. The Christian head is called always to be the servant of others. As Markus Barth puts it so beautifully, the Christian husband-head becomes "the first servant of his wife" (Barth, 618), and she becomes his first servant. One rule of behavior for the nurturing and sustaining of the covenant of Christian marriage is the rule of mutual service.

The letter to the Ephesians embraces another rule for behavior in Christian marriage, a great Jewish and Christian commandment: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev 19:18; Mk 12:31). Husbands are instructed that they "should love their wives as (that is, for they are) their own bodies" (5:28a), and that the husband "who loves his wife loves himself" (5:28b). We can assume the same instruction is intended also for a wife. The Torah and gospel injunction to love one's neighbor as oneself applies in Christian marriage. As all Christians are to give way to one another and to love one another, so also are the spouses in a Christian marriage. The rules of Christian behavior that will respect, nurture and sustain the covenant and the community of marriage are easy to articulate: love of one's neighbor-spouse as oneself, love which is giving way, love which is mutual service, love which is abiding.

A Christian marriage is not just a wedding ceremony to be celebrated. It is also a loving and equal partnership of life to be lived. When they covenant in marriage, Christian spouses commit themselves to explore together in their married life the religious depth of their existence, and to respond to that depth in the light of Christian faith.

One of the most central affirmations of Christian faith is the affirmation of discipleship. Disciple is an ever-present NT word, occurring some two hundred and fifty times throughout the gospels and the Acts, and always implying response to a call from the Lord. By definition disciples are learners, and the disciples of Christ are learners of mystery. They gather to explore together a triple mystery: the mystery of the one God who loves them and seeks to be loved by them; the mystery of the Christ in whom this God is revealed and whom God raised from the dead (1 Cor 15:4; Acts 2:24); the mystery of the church in which they gather and which is the body of Christ (Eph 1:22-23; Col 1:18, 24). Spouses in a covenant marriage are called to be disciples of these mysteries and of their implications for their married life together.

Christian marriage does not separate spouses from life. It immerses them in life and confronts them with the ultimate questions of life and of death that are the stuff of religion. There are questions of joy in love and loving and the birth of new life; of pain in illness and suffering and alienation; of grief and fear in loneliness and isolation and death; of happiness in friends and beauty and success. Marriage demands that sense be made out of these competing questions and a thousand others like them. Christian marriage demands that sense be made out of them in the light of the shared Christian faith of the spouses.

As they find together adequate responses to the demands their married life imposes on them, Christian spouses mutually nurture one another into Christian discipleship. They learn together and they grow together in Christian maturity. The more they mature, the more they come to realize the ongoing nature of becoming married and of becoming a covenant sign. They come to realize that, though their marriage is already a sign of the covenant between Christ and his church, it is not yet the best sign it can be and is called to be. In Christian marriage, which is a life of ongoing Christian discipleship, even more than in secular marriage, the answer to the question of when two people are married is simple: thirty, forty, even fifty years later.

II. Christian Marriage As Sacrament

Religions are always on the lookout for the images of God and of God's relationship to the human world. In the Jewish prophets, we find an action image, known as the prophetic symbol. Jeremiah, for instance, buys an earthen pot, dashes it to the ground before a puzzled crowd and explains to them what it is he is doing. "Thus says the Lord of Hosts: so will I break this people and this city, as one breaks a potter's vessel" (19:11). Ezekiel takes a sharp knife, shaves his hair with it and divides the hair into three bundles. He burns one bundle, scatters another to the wind and carries the third around the city and shreds it further with his knife. In prophetic explanation of his actions, he proclaims: "This is Jerusalem" (5:5).

Each prophet clarifies the radical meaning of his actions, which clarifies for us the radical meaning of a prophetic symbol. As Jeremiah shattered his pot, as Ezekiel cut and burned and scattered his hair, so God shatters and scatters and burns Jerusalem. The depth meaning and reality symbolized by Jeremiah is not the shattering of a cheap pot, but the shattering of Jerusalem and of the covenant relationship between Yahweh and Yahweh's people. The prophetic symbol is a representative action, that is, an action which proclaims, makes explicit and celebrates in representation some other, more fundamentally meaningful reality.

Since the idea of their special relationship to Yahweh arising out of their mutual covenant was so central to the self-understanding of the Israelites, it is easy to predict that they would search out a human reality to symbolize the covenant relationship. It is equally easy, perhaps, to predict that the reality they would choose is the mutual covenant that is marriage. The prophet Hosea was the first to act in and speak of marriage as the prophetic symbol of the covenant.

On the superficial level, the marriage of Hosea and Gomer is like many other marriages. But, on the depth level, Hosea interpreted it as a prophetic symbol, proclaiming, making humanly explicit and celebrating in representation the covenant union between Yahweh and Israel. As Gomer left Hosea for other lovers, it was proclaimed in representation, so also did Israel leave Yahweh for other gods. As Hosea waits for Gomer to return to him, and as he takes her back without recrimination when she does return, so also does Yahweh with Israel. Hosea's human action is prophetic symbol, representative image, of God's divine action, an abiding love in spite of every provocation. In both covenants, the human and the divine, the covenant relationship had been violated. But Hosea's action both mirrors and reveals Yahweh's abiding love. It proclaims, makes explicit and celebrates not only Hosea's faithfulness to his marriage covenant, but also Yahweh's faithfulness to Israel.

One basic meaning about Hosea and Yahweh is clear: each is steadfastly faithful. There is also a clear, if mysterious, meaning about marriage. Besides being a universal human institution, it is also a religious and prophetic symbol proclaiming, making explicit and celebrating in the human world the abiding union of Yahweh and Yahweh's people. Lived into from this perspective, lived into a faith as we might say today, marriage becomes a two-tiered reality. On one level, it bespeaks the mutual covenant love of this man and this woman; on another, it represents and symbolizes the covenant love of Yahweh and Yahweh's people. First articulated by the prophet Hosea, this two-tiered view of marriage becomes the Christian view of marriage that we have found in the letter to the Ephesians. Jewish prophetic symbol becomes ultimately Christian sacrament.

We noted in the preceding section that, while the classical Catholic teaching presents Christian marriage as a sacrament, the classical Protestant teaching presents it as a sign of the covenant but not as a sacrament. These different perspectives depend on different definitions. John Calvin defined sacrament as a sign instituted by Christ for the whole of the faithful. The Lutheran church defines it as an action of the church enjoined by Christ to be enjoyed by all Christians. Since only baptism and eucharist were so instituted and enjoined, the Reformation churches believe they are the only rituals acknowledged as sacraments.

The classical Roman Catholic definition of sacrament, an outward sign instituted by Christ to give grace, took a thousand years to become established, with all sorts of realities, including marriage, floating in and out of the sacramental picture until the definition became universally acceptable (See Lawler, Symbol and Sacrament, 29-34). We can now offer a more fully explicated version of that definition. A sacrament is a prophetic symbol in and through which the church, the body of Christ, proclaims, makes explicit and celebrates in representation that presence and action of God which is called grace.

To say that Christian marriage is a sacrament is to say that it is a prophetic symbol, a reality that has two tiers. On one tier, it proclaims and makes explicit and celebrates the intimate community of life and love between a Christian man and a Christian woman. On another, deeper tier, the religious and symbolic tier, it proclaims and makes explicit and celebrates the intimate community of life and love between Yahweh and Yahweh's people and between Christ and Christ's people, the church.

A couple entering into any marriage say to one another before the society in which they live: "I love you and I give myself to and for you." A Christian couple entering into a Christian marriage say that too, and more. They say also: "I love you as Christ loves his church."

From the first, therefore, a Christian marriage is more than just the union of this man and this woman; it is more than just human covenant. It is also religious covenant. God and God's Christ are present in it, gracing it, from the beginning. The presence of grace in its most ancient Christian sense, namely, the presence of the gracious God, is not something extrinsic to the covenant of Christian marriage. It is something essential to it, something without which it would not be Christian marriage at all. Of course, Christian marriage proclaims, makes explicit and celebrates the mutual and abiding love of this man and this woman. It also proclaims, makes explicit and celebrates their abiding love for their God and for the Christ they confess as Lord. It is in this sense that it is a sacrament, both a sign and an instrument, of the presence of Christ and of the God he reveals.

In every symbol there are two levels of meaning. There is a foundational level and, built on this foundation, a symbolic one. On the foundational level, for instance, water produces both death and life, which makes it wonderfully apt to express on the symbolic level meanings of death and resurrection to new life, as it does in the sacrament of baptism. Christian marriage has the same two levels of meaning.

The foundational level of Christian marriage is the community of life and love between a man and a woman who are disciples of Jesus. The symbolic or sacramental level is the reflection and representation in this community of the community of life and love between Christ and the church. On the one level, Christian marriage proclaims, makes explicit and celebrates the mutual love of the spouses; on another, symbolic level, it proclaims, makes explicit and celebrates the mutual love of Christ and the church. This two-tiered meaningfulness is what the Catholic church means when it says that Christian marriage is sacramental.

In Christian marriage, the symbolic meaning takes precedence over the foundational meaning, in the sense that the abiding love of Christ and the church is the model for the mutual love of the spouses. Christian spouses are not merely this wife and this husband covenanted to one another. They are the church in microcosm covenanted to their Lord; they are, in Vatican II's words, the "domestic church" (L.G., 11). Since a Christian family is a little domestic church, Christian marriage which founds that family participates in the covenant between Christ and Christ's universal church. Christian marriage, that is, is essentially graced from its beginning. God and God's Christ are present in it, gracing the spouses with their presence, offering them models of steadfast and abiding love.

To say that it is a sign of grace, even an effective sign of grace, is never to be equated with saying that Christian marriage automatically effects grace. That is a complaint that has been made against Roman Catholic sacramental teaching since the Reformation. But the Catholic church has never taught that any sacrament automatically effects grace. It has taught only that sacraments, including Christian marriage, are signs and instruments of grace, signs and instruments, that is, of the presence of God and of the Christ confessed as God's son.

Even the superficial reader of the NT has to be struck by the insistence on the necessity of personal faith for salvation. Jesus complained sorrowfully about the absence of personal faith; Paul passionately defended its necessity against the Judaizers. At the Reformation, both the Reformers and the Council of Trent agreed on the primacy of faith, a "comprehensive 'yes' to God revealing himself as savior in Christ" (Alfaro, Sacramentum Mundi, 2: 315). Luther made "faith alone" one of the foundations of his theological system. The council taught that "we may be said to be justified through faith," citing in its support the saying in the letter to the Hebrews "without faith it is impossible to please God" (D.S., 1532; cp. 1529). There can be no doubt that, despite the post-Reformation polemics which tended to obscure this common agreement, the primacy of personal faith is as much a Catholic as it is a Reformed doctrine.

The Council of Trent also taught that sacraments confer the grace they signify on those who present no obstacle (D.S., 1606). It opted for this minimalistic formula to cover in one umbrella statement the cases of both infants in baptism and adults in all sacraments, but it applies positively only to infants. In the prior Council of Florence, the Catholic tradition had already carefully specified that, for an adult, placing no obstacle meant having a positive intent. The sacraments, it taught, give grace only to those who receive them worthily (D.S., 1310). This doctrine demands a personal, positive, active disposition of self-surrendering faith on the part of one who wishes to be graced in sacrament. Such a teaching highlights the fact that a sacrament is a true sign of faith. It is a sign, that is, not only of the faith of the church which seeks to make explicit and to celebrate in sacrament the presence of God and of Christ, but also of the faith of Christians who seek to confess and to concelebrate that presence with the church.

The Second Vatican Council reaffirms the necessity of faith as the Catholic position. It teaches that sacraments "not only presuppose faith" but also "nourish, strengthen and express it," which is why "they are called 'sacraments of faith'" (S.C., 59). Catholic teaching is, and always has been, clear. Grace, the loving presence of God and God's Christ, is never automatic, not even in sacrament, not even in the sacrament of marriage. Grace is never effected by some external action alone without the matching internal disposition of believers, their faith, their love, their comprehensive "yes" to the presence of God and of God's Christ. It is only when the external action and the internal disposition come together that there is effective sacrament.

The most Catholic of theologians,

Thomas Aquinas, never doubted this. The saving action of God and Christ, he taught, "achieves its effect in those to whom it is applied through faith and love and the sacraments of faith" (S.Th., 3, 49, 3 ad 1). Personal faith, the internal disposition of a believer that he called opus operantis, is as essential to the reception of grace in and through sacrament as the most carefully crafted external action that he called opus operatum. Speaking of eucharist, Aquinas argues that it has effect "only in those who are united to the passion of Christ in faith." Even for them, "it is of more or less value according to their devotion" (S.Th., 3, 79, 7 ad 2). The same is true of Christian marriage.

The sacramental, marital intercourse between spouses takes place, Aquinas explains, on three levels, the animal level, the human level and the religious level (S.Th., 3 suppl, 65, 1 corp.). To become one body, prophetic symbol and sacrament of the one-body union between Christ and the church, Christian spouses must come to terms with their needs, feelings and desires on all three levels. Becoming one personal body includes not only union of spirits, not only union of minds but also union of bodies. Only because the physical and sexual level of marital intercourse has been much maligned in Christian history, and not because of some exalted significance of its own, we need to say a special word about the place of sexuality and sexual intercourse in the sacrament of marriage.

There are three kinds of love, in real life as well as in Greek language. There is agape, the love of the spouse for the spouse's sake; there is philia, the love of the spouse as a friend; there is eros, the love of the spouse for one's own sake. Married love is certainly agape, but also more than agape. It is certainly philia, but also more than philia. It is certainly also eros, but also more than eros. Lest there be any confusion about that last statement, let me hasten to put it another way. Marital love is loving your neighbor as yourself (Mt 22:39).

Since Augustine, the Christian commandment to love one's neighbor as oneself has been recognized in the wisdom of the Catholic tradition as the foundation for a wholly justifiable self-love. Such self-love is much in evidence when two people are well along the way to becoming one body, for in such a marriage both spouses have become mutually full and fully esteemed personal partners. In such a marriage, "I love you" matures into "I love me and you," and ultimately into "we love us," as Millhaven puts it so beautifully (Theol. Studies, 35 [1974]: 705). One of the most common reasons that many men and women have difficulty truly loving another human being is that they have difficulty ever truly loving themselves.

So back to eros, that rambunctious, non-rational, selfish component of human sexuality and human love. The spiritualizers always want to transform it into agape, though there is no alchemy to effect such a transformation. Eros is an essential, and therefore inescapable, quality of human and marital love. It participates in the sacramental nature of Christian marriage on the basis of the simple theological fact that it is from God. It is God's creation gift to adam; it is, so to speak, God's wedding gift, to a man and a woman. When used as a good gift in the process of becoming one in Christian marriage, it is used in a way that points to its origin in God. That is already to use it mysteriously and sacramentally, in a way that is not only physical and human and spiritual but also religious and grace-full.

Physical union is not all there is to a sacramental marriage, but it is an essential part of it. If such a marriage is, as it is said to be, a prophetic symbol and sacrament of the covenant between Christ and the church, then the physical and personal and spiritual union achieved in sexual intercourse is an integral part of that symbol. That means that sexual intercourse proclaims, makes explicit and celebrates the love and mutual presence not only of this man and this woman but also of the God who is Grace. It honors the Giver and the gift, as well as the man and the woman who use the gift to make not only human but also "divine" love.

III. Divorce and Remarriage

The liturgies of all the Christian churches witness to their common conviction that a man and a woman marry for as long as life lasts. I share this Christian conviction. I take it to be self-evident that the covenant of Christian marriage creates a moral obligation to be faithful to both the covenant and the commitment it implies. For that is what both covenant and love mean. Covenant creates a relationship in which I am bound morally to keep my word; love by its very nature tends to be life-long.

Some marriages, however, do not last as long as life; they cease to be; they die. The Christian churches are as divided about the proper pastoral approach to such failed marriages, and to the second marriages which frequently follow them, as they are united in their common theological conviction about the life-long nature of marriage. These divisions are serious for the lives of the churches; they are also an important corollary to all we have discussed. We need, therefore, to say a brief word here about how marriages end in the Roman Catholic church.

The Catholic church has long agreed with the vast majority of moralists that the obligation deriving from commitment is limited, not absolute, and can be withdrawn for a reason "higher" than the marriage obligation. This is what I intended to insinuate when I asserted earlier that, in the covenant that is Christian marriage, a man and a woman commit mutually to abide in love and in covenant, and to withdraw from them only if the life of intimacy has ceased to exist and if all available means to restore it have been tried and have failed. A consideration of Roman Catholic practice, will clarify this statement.

Though the Roman Catholic church's reading of Jesus' saying on divorce and remarriage leads it to consider all valid marriages as indissoluble, it does dissolve valid marriages. Or, in plainer language, it does grant divorces. The most ancient of these divorce procedures is one derived from Paul's letter to the Corinthians and called, therefore, the Pauline privilege. It applies to the question of divorce in the marriage in which one spouse has become Christian and the other remains non-Christian. Paul has two pieces of advice for the spouse in such a marriage, each of them hinging on the behavior of the unbaptized spouse.

If the unbaptized spouse is willing to continue to live peacefully with the now-baptized spouse, then the traditional Torah instruction holds: what God has joined together, let no man put asunder. But if the unbaptized spouse is unwilling to continue to live in peace, then she or he is to be allowed to withdraw from the marriage. There is no suggestion that Jesus' command does not apply in this case. There is only the suggestion that, in this specific case, Paul is making an exception to Jesus' command ("I say, not the Lord" [7:12]).

The reason given for the exception is interesting. "In such a case, the brother or sister is not bound. For God has called us to peace" (7:15). Peace, it would appear, is one of those higher reasons that make possible release from the marriage commitment. The Roman Catholic church sanctioned this approach to dissolving a valid marriage in the 12th century, still sanctions it today (cf. can. 1143), and names it the Pauline privilege. In the centuries that have elapsed since Paul, it has also extended the Pauline privilege into the so-called Petrine privilege, by which valid marriages are dissolved on the authority of the pope in favor of the higher good called faith (cf. cans. 1148-1150).

There is yet a third way to dissolve a valid marriage in the Roman Catholic church. The ancient Roman answer to the question as to when a marriage actually took place was that it took place when a couple freely consented to marry. The northern European answer was that it took place when the couple engaged in their first marital sexual intercourse. Unable, or unwilling, to discriminate between these two points of view, the medieval church combined them and taught that marriage was initiated by consent and consummated by sexual intercourse. If after the giving of consent, which initiates a valid marriage, there is no sexual intercourse, then the valid marriage may be dissolved (cf. can. 1142), or, in plainer English, a divorce may be granted.

These Roman Catholic divorce procedures have never caused any problems for Christians, because only the specialists ever knew about them. The case is quite different with the famous, perhaps now infamous, procedure known as annulment. Annulment is an entirely different procedure from the dissolution procedures. The latter dissolve marriages held to be valid, while annulment declares that, because of some deficiency in the beginning, there never was a valid marriage bond between these two people.

Ordinary people, of course, usually cannot comprehend the technical niceties of difference between annulment and the divorce procedures, and they lump them all together. They know that annulment is granted today in the United States more commonly than ever before, and they conclude that the Catholic church is talking out of one side of its mouth about being opposed to divorce and acting out of the other side by granting divorces called annulment. They need to know two things to understand the Catholic practice: first, despite its firm belief that marriage is intended to be life-long, the Catholic church does grant divorces; secondly, annulment is not one of those divorces but merely a declaration that, in a specific case, there never was a valid marriage.

The breakdown of marriage is always a human tragedy, causing hurt and harm to the spouses, their children, their families, their friends. When a marriage fails, and a brief glance at the concrete reality of human life shows that some marriages do fail, concrete people experience turmoil, anger and hatred in the very context in which they expected to experience security, peace and love. It is for this reason, for the hurt and the harm it causes, that divorce is an evil in the human community and, therefore, forbidden by God. Those who believe that divorce is evil because it is forbidden by God, and they are legion, miss this point entirely, putting the cart before the horse. Kevin Kelly points out, invoking the support of Aquinas, that "God is not offended by us except in so far as we harm ourselves and other people. Marriage breakdown and divorce is evil because of the human hurt and suffering caused by it. It offends God because people precious to him are being harmed and are hurting each other" (Kelly, 39).

Each time the Roman Catholic church dissolves a marriage, it is for a good judged to be greater than the good that is indissolubility. For Paul in 1st-century Corinth, it was the good called peace. For Pope Pius XII in 20th-century Rome it was the good called "the salvation of souls, in which both the common good of the religious society . . . and the good of individuals find due and proportionate consideration" (Acta Apost. Sedis, 33 [1941]: 425-6). Some contemporary Roman Catholic theologians are asking today if the good of concrete Catholic individuals can find due and proportionate consideration in the situation of divorce and remarriage. They are even suggesting some possibilities.

First there is the ancient practice of the Eastern church, going back to its most revered bishops, Basil and John Chrysostom. While holding as firmly as the Roman church to the belief that the gospel message presents a demand for indissoluble marriage, it acknowledges also that concrete men and women sometimes do not measure up to the gospel. It acknowledges that some marriages, even specifically Christian marriages, do end, and that when they end, it makes no sense to insist that spouses are still bound together by an indissoluble bond. It seeks to deal in a pastorally compassionate way with the former spouses, even to the extent of permitting and blessing the remarriage of an innocent spouse.

The practice of the Reformation churches is akin to this Orthodox practice. While holding firm to the belief that marriage is life-long, and while never resigning themselves to the inevitability of divorce, they acknowledge also that some marriages do cease to exist, a fact which is easily ascertainable. When a marriage does die, they feel free to bless a second marriage and to hope that it will achieve what was not achieved in the first marriage, namely, a greater conformity to the mutual servant love of Christ and the church and, therefore, a greater sign of the covenant union between them. The Final Report of the Roman Catholic-Lutheran-Reformed Study Commission on the theology of marriage calls attention to three gospel bases for such an approach: "1) the doctrine of the justification of the sinner; 2) a view of the gospel which, over and above all its requirements, sees the need for a spirit of mercy and forgiveness; 3) an interpretation of the passage in Matthew as indicating a Christian tolerance of divorce." It goes on to point out what we already know, namely, that "there is some support for this doctrine in certain facts in the history of the Catholic Church" (Growth in Agreement, ed. H. Meyer and L. Vischer, [New York: Paulist, 1984]: 288-9).

The Roman Catholic church, which remember has its own array of canonical processes to dissolve valid marriages, has never condemned the Orthodox practice. Even the hard-pressed Council of Trent, which had before it a proposal to condemn the Eastern practice as contrary to the gospel, explicitly refused to make such a statement. In 1980, among the propositions presented to the pope from the Synod of Bishops was one asking that the Eastern practice be considered carefully for the light that it might shed on Roman pastoral practice. Fidelity to Jesus' prohibition of remarriage does not exclude pastoral provision for the spiritual welfare of those who have entered second marriages which have become so stable that they cannot be broken without grave economic, emotional and spiritual harm to the parties involved.

All external forum solutions to the problem of divorce and remarriage in the Catholic church are offered on the basis of the lack of some reality canonically judged to be indispensable for a valid marriage. In the case of the Pauline privilege, that lack is the lack of baptism in one of the parties, along with the lack of will to live in peace. In non-consummation cases, the lack is of the physical consummation of the marital oneness. In annulment cases, the lack is of some reality canonically required for the marriage to be valid. All these lacks are of some reality required for the validity of marriage. Since it is clear that, in Roman Catholic history, only that marriage is absolutely indissoluble which is both sacramental and consummated, Catholic theologians are asking today about the effect of the lack of some reality integral to the nature of sacrament?

The present Code of Canon Law declares that "a valid marriage contract cannot exist between baptized persons without its being by that very fact a sacrament" (can. 1055, 2). It states that because it assumes that what is called in the theological tradition the gift of faith is given in baptism. That assumption appears to be quite false in our day, which has brought to our attention that anomalous group of so-called Christians known as baptized non-believers. These are Christians who, though having undergone a baptism rite (usually in infancy), have grown up non-believers. Their lack of faith raises serious questions about the sacramentality of any marriage into which they might enter.

The primacy of personal faith in the process of salvation was affirmed as the Catholic tradition by the Council of Trent. "We may be said to be justified through faith," it taught, "in the sense that 'faith is the beginning of man's salvation' ... 'without which it is impossible to please God' (Heb 11:6) and to be counted as his children" (D.S., 1532). The equally-ecumenical Council of Florence had already taught that sacraments give grace only to those who receive them worthily (D.S., 1310). This doctrine demands an active, positive disposition of self-surrendering faith on the part of one entering into a sacramental action. As Aquinas said: the saving action of God and Christ "achieves its effect in those to whom it is applied through faith and love and the sacraments of faith," and even for them "it is of more or less value according to their devotion" (S.Th. 3, 49, 3 ad 1, and 3, 79, 7 ad 2). Vatican II stood squarely in this same tradition, teaching that the sacraments of faith are so called because they "not only presuppose faith" but "also nourish, strengthen and express it" (S.C., 59).

The Catholic tradition is clear: personal sacramental fruitfulness presupposes active faith. A believer comes to sacrament personally sharing in the faith of the church, and with that personal faith transforms ordinary actions and words into prophetic symbols and sacraments. That personal faith, what the medievals called opus operantis, is as essential to sacramental fruitfulness as the most carefully crafted sacramental action, what they called opus operatum (See Lawler, Symbol and Sacrament, 36-45).

There is a serious doctrinal flaw, therefore, in the Code. To claim that consent makes marriage is true; there is no marriage, sacramental or otherwise, without it. To claim that marriage, created by mutual consent, is transformed into prophetic symbol is true as a statement of the faith of the church. The claim, however, that marriage is transformed into prophetic symbol by each and every person who has undergone a baptismal rite requires a major distinction: by those who have grown to share the faith of the church, "yes"; by those who have not grown to share the faith of the church, "no". No one is graced or justified or saved without faith, not even in sacraments, not even in the sacrament of Christian marriage.

A marriage entered into with free consent but no faith is still a marriage, for consent makes marriage (can. 1057). But it is not a sacrament, for it is personal faith, not consent that makes concrete sacrament. The universal tradition of the Catholic church teaches that, since it is not a sacrament, neither is it indissoluble. Personal faith is, of course, difficult to assess. But it is no more difficult to assess than free consent, which canonical procedures have claimed to assess for centuries.

As there are putative marriages which are clearly not valid marriages because the consent which was thought to initiate them was not adequately free, so also are there putative sacramental marriages which are not sacraments because those who entered them were not adequately faith-full. As marriages are annulled for lack of consent, so also can they be annulled for lack of faith. Since such is the case, the church requires that the pre-marriage preparation of those seeking sacramental marriages ascertain the status and the quality of their faith. For "without faith it is impossible to please God" (Heb 11:6), even in marriage.

MARY, FEASTS OF

In the liturgical traditions of both the Eastern and the Western churches, feasts in honor of Mary have a distinctive importance, midway between celebrations of the great events of the life of Jesus and commemorations of other saints and anniversaries. All Christian worship is christocentric, in that it unites the church, as Christ's body, with his eternal, incarnate worship of the Father, and so allows it to share, through the Spirit, in his risen life. The celebrations of the Christian week and the Christian year have always been centered on the paschal mystery, and on the human history of Jesus in which that mystery is imbedded. Yet, as Pope Paul VI remarked, "every authentic development of Christian worship is necessarily followed by a fitting increase of veneration for the Mother of the Lord" (Marialis Cultus [1974], introduction). The reason is Mary's unique place in the Christian story of salvation: as the one in whose humanity, and through whose graced but free consent, the incarnation of God the Word took place, she is singularly involved in the paschal mystery. Her closeness both to Jesus and to us, the concentration on Christ of her wholly human life, has led the church, throughout the centuries, to see in her both the chief guarantor of the Word's full humanity and the first instance of our full redemption. The fifteen feasts of Mary in the reformed calendar of the Roman church celebrate either her involvement in the birth and life of Jesus, the remarkable working of grace in her own history, or the importance she has had in the life of the Christian faithful as model and instrument of the grace we share.

History. Liturgical celebration of the birth and infancy of Jesus on Jan. 6 seems to have begun in Egypt in the 2nd century and to have spread throughout the Eastern churches during the next two hundred years. The pilgrim Egeria reports a further celebration of the presentation of Jesus in the Temple, forty days later, in late 4th-century Jerusalem, and the Roman commemoration of the birth of Christ on Dec. 25 was also celebrated in the Eastern churches outside Palestine before 400. Clearly there is a strong Marian dimension to all these feasts, and to the whole Advent and Christmas cycle as it developed. It is understandable that when the Syrian and Byzantine churches began, probably in the 6th century, to commemorate the Mother of God on a day of her own, they should choose Dec. 26 as the appropriate date. The Roman church celebrated a special feast in her honor (Natale S. Mariae) on Jan. 1, the octave-day of Christmas, from shortly before 600, and the churches of Spain observed a "solemnity of the Mother of the Lord" on Dec. 18, a week before Christmas from about the same time. The Gallic churches, too, celebrated a festivitas sanctae Mariae on Jan. 18, from the early 7th century—again, it seems, because of the closeness of this date to Christmas.

The first commemoration of Mary fully independent of the Christmas cycle was an institution of the Jerusalem church, probably begun in the 430s: a feast in honor of “Mary, Mother of God” on August 15, at the site three miles outside of Bethlehem where Mary and Joseph were said to have rested on their journey to the stable (Protevangelium of James 17). After Juvenal (bishop of Jerusalem 422-458) built a church on the Mount of Olives, near the place where Mary was thought to have lived and died, the feast was transferred there, and its theme came to be focussed on her death or “dormition”; the accounts of her “assumption” or resurrection, first attested in Syria and Palestine in the late 5th century, probably grew out of this Jerusalem celebration. In the 6th century, commemorations of Mary’s birth (on Sept. 8) and presentation in the Temple (Nov. 21)—two incidents likewise drawn from the apocryphal Protevangelium—were also instituted in Jerusalem, probably on the dedication days of two other churches built in her honor. Although the evidence is scanty, the celebration of the Annunciation on Mar. 25 seems to have had its origin in Jerusalem as well about the year 550.

By the early 7th century, the four main Jerusalem feasts of Mary—Feb. 2, Mar. 25, Aug. 15 and Sept. 8—were celebrated not only throughout the Byzantine Empire, but had been adopted in Rome as well. Pope Sergius I (687-701), a Sicilian of Syrian ancestry, ordered that each of these four feasts be marked with a solemn procession from the Forum to the basilica that had been dedicated in her honor by Sixtus III two and a half centuries earlier (St. Mary Major).

Carolingian liturgical reforms in the late 8th century, spurred on by Alcuin, not only canonized these Roman feasts for the Frankish Empire, but introduced—as part of the new genre of “votive” or devotional Mass texts—the custom of commemorating Mary liturgically, in eucharist and office, on Saturdays not otherwise specified as feasts.

In the Middle Ages, the Western church continued to adopt Eastern celebrations of Mary, sometimes altering their themes to express Western theological interests. The commemoration of the miraculous conception of Mary by an aged, childless couple (Protevangelium 4), observed in Jerusalem since the 7th century at the Church of St. Anne near the Sheepgate on Dec. 8, was introduced in 12th-century England and France under the influence of Anselm of Canterbury and his pupil Eadmer, as a celebration of her conception without original sin. Strongly promoted by the Franciscans, it was introduced into the Roman missal in 1476 by the Franciscan Pope Sixtus IV. The ancient Jerusalem commemoration of Mary’s presentation in the temple on Nov. 21, found in various Latin sacramentaries from the 12th century, was adopted by the Franciscan order and the papal curia at Avignon in 1371. The Byzantine custom of commemorating the deposition of Mary’s robe at the Church of the Blachernae in Constantinople on July 2, for which the account of Mary’s visit to Elizabeth (Lk 1:39-56) was the assigned gospel, became the Western feast of the Visitation, prescribed for the Latin church—also under Franciscan influence—by Urban VI in 1389.

Following the mandate given the Holy See by the last session of the Council of Trent (1563), Pope Pius V published a reformed breviary (1568) and missal (1570), intended to be normative for the entire Latin church. Taking as its model the Roman liturgy of the time of Gregory vii (1073-85), this new liturgical order included only seven prescribed Marian feasts: six of the ancient Eastern feasts (Feb. 2, Mar. 25, July 2, Aug. 15, Sept. 8, Dec. 8) plus the Roman commemoration of the dedication of the basilica of Mary Major, on Aug. 5. The Presentation of Mary (Nov. 21) was omitted, presumably because of its apocryphal roots, but was restored by the Franciscan Pope Sixtus V (1585-90).

A century later, however, new Marian feasts began to join the calendar, usually either in commemoration of some Catholic victory (e.g., the Holy Name of Mary, on the Sunday after Sept. 8 [from 1683]; Our Lady of the Rosary, on the first Sunday of October [1716]) or as a way of universalizing the celebration of a particular religious order (e.g., Our Lady of Ransom, on Sept. 24 [from 1696; a Mercedarian feast], Our Lady of Mt. Carmel, on July 16 [from 1726; a Carmelite feast], the Seven Sorrows of Mary, on the Friday before Palm Sunday [from 1727; a medieval German feast promoted by the Servites] and on the third Sunday of September [in 1814; also a Servite feast, promulgated to celebrate the return of Pope Pius VII from captivity]). The 20th century saw the addition of four new Marian feasts to the Western church's calendar: Our Lady of Lourdes, on Feb. 11 (1907, to commemorate the 50th anniversary of Mary's first apparition there); the Maternity of Mary, on Oct. 11 (1931, to commemorate the 15th centenary of the Council of Ephesus, at which her title "Mother of God" was affirmed); the Immaculate Heart of Mary, on Aug. 22 (1942, originally a feast of the Eudist congregation) and the Queenship of Mary, on May 31 (1954, to commemorate the centenary of the proclamation of the dogma of her immaculate conception). By 1960, the seven Latin Marian feasts of the missal of Pius V had grown to eighteen.

The Second Vatican Council, in its Constitution on the Liturgy, directed that the annual liturgical cycle be centered on the paschal mystery (S.C., 107) and give main emphasis to feasts of the Lord (ibid., 108). Feasts of Mary were to be seen as subordinate ways of celebrating the mysteries of Christ and of recognizing "the excellent fruit of the redemption" (ibid., 103). As a result, some post-Tridentine Marian feasts were dropped from the universal calendar in the reformed missal of 1969, while others were changed in rank or moved to more appropriate dates. The last week of Advent (Dec. 18-25), a time traditionally linked with Mary in most Western rites, again received a strong Marian emphasis in its prayers and its scriptural readings. The celebrations of the Presentation (Feb. 2) and the Annunciation (Mar. 25), both strongly Marian in theme, were listed now as feasts of the Lord; the ancient Roman celebration of Mary on Jan. 1, the octave of Christmas, was restored in place of the feast of the circumcision of Jesus. Despite the general trend towards simplification, however, 15 Marian celebrations (including Feb. 2 and Mar. 25) remain in the universal Roman calendar, and other local commemorations, such as the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe (Dec. 12) in North and South America, have been retained or added by the appropriate episcopal conferences.

Feasts and Their Themes

The particular characters and themes of the 16 feasts of Mary in the present liturgical calendar in the United States may be summarized as follows:

1) Mary, Mother of God (Jan. 1; solemnity). As both the octave of Christmas and the start of the new civil year, this day's prayer is appropriately focused on Mary as mother of the newly born Savior and as the graced one who has become a bearer of blessing for all humanity. So the OT reading (Num 6:22-27) is simply the formula by which the Aaronic priests were to bless the people, and the reading from Paul (Gal 4:4-7) reflects on the new blessings of maturity and freedom brought to humanity in "the fulness of time" by God's Son, "born of a woman." The gospel (Lk 2:16-21) tells the story of the circumcision and naming of Jesus eight days after his birth, but also shows Mary as "keeping in her heart" all the astonishing events surrounding her Son's birth and so as inviting the believer, at the start of a new year, to join in her grateful contemplation.

2) Presentation of the Lord (Feb. 2; feast). This ancient feast, called "the feast of meeting (Hypapante)" in the Greek church, commemorates the events recounted in the gospel (Lk 2:22-40): Jesus' being presented to God in the temple at Jerusalem by his parents, in accordance with the law, and the meeting of parents and child with the aged Simeon and Anna, who speak with the faith of Israel. Elements of the early Roman rite of purgation (perhaps pagan in origin) formerly performed on this day remain, both in the procession with candles and in the opening prayer. The main focus of the liturgy, however, is now on the encounter of Jesus, the compassionate high priest (NT reading: Heb 2:14-18), with the worshipping community, and the enlightenment and purification his presence brings to the people's expectant prayer (OT reading: Mal 3:1-4; gospel: Lk 2:22-40).

3) Our Lady of Lourdes (Feb. 11; optional memorial). This day commemorates the first of Mary's 18 apparitions to Bernadette Soubirous at Lourdes, on Feb. 11, 1858. It is the only celebration of a Marian apparition in the universal Roman calendar, and remains because of the continuing importance of Lourdes to the whole church as a place of pilgrimage and grace. Readings may be selected from the Common for Feasts of Mary; the suggested first reading is Isa 66:10-14, which speaks in maternal terms of a transformed Jerusalem—often linked with Mary, as the "place" of God's presence, in Christian liturgy and art—and promises peace and prosperity to Israel "like an overflowing stream," an image which suggests the healing springs at Lourdes.

4) Annunciation of the Lord (Mar. 25; solemnity). This celebration of the incarnation of the Word in Mary's womb, nine months before the celebration of Jesus' birth, is rightly described by Paul VI as "a joint feast of Christ and the Blessed Virgin" (Mar. Cult., 6). Following rabbinic tradition, many early Christian writers identified the dates of the creation and end of the world, and of the conception and crucifixion of the Savior, with the date of Passover (14 Nisan). Since this was often interpreted as Mar. 25 in the Julian calendar, the Roman dating of the birth of Christ may originally depend on the date of this feast, and not vice versa. The main scripture passage for the feast is of course the narrative of the annunciation (Lk 1:26-38), emphasizing both the overshadowing grace and power of God in the coming of Christ and Mary's free consent. The OT reading (Isa 7:10-14) underlines Christian belief that the child born to Mary is not only a "sign" of God's power, but is named "God-with-us"; the NT reading (Heb 10:4-10) reminds us that it is through his body, taken from Mary's flesh, that the Son fulfills his Father's will and offers God the sacrifice that makes us holy.

5) Visitation of the Blessed Virgin Mary (May 31; feast). Celebrated previously on July 2, this feast was transferred in the new missal to May 31 (replacing the Queenship of Mary), probably in order to place it between the celebrations of the Annunciation and the birth of John the Baptist. Commemorating the story of Mary's visit to the Baptist's mother Elizabeth, which follows the annunciation account in Luke's gospel (1:39-56), the liturgy emphasizes two aspects of that narrative: the exultation of both Israel (represented by Elizabeth and the unborn John) and the community of disciples (represented by Mary) at the coming of Christ, and the mutual, loving concern of these two kinswomen for each other. The OT reading (Zeph 3:14-18) echoes the first of these themes, the alternative NT reading from (Rom 12:9-16) calls us to imitate the second. Luke's narrative also seems to contain parallels to the story of the coming of the ark of God to Jerusalem in 2 Samuel 6, reminding us again of Mary's privileged role in the history of salvation.

6) Immaculate Heart of Mary (Saturday after the Second Sunday after Pentecost; optional memorial). Established by Pope Pius XII for the octave of the Assumption (Aug. 22) in 1942, when he consecrated the world, then at war, to the heart of Mary, this celebration directly follows the feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus in the reformed missal. The heart, traditionally thought of as the physical and affective center of the person, suggests life, remembrance, love and freedom. St. John Eudes, who first promoted devotion to the heart of Mary, saw in her heart "the exemplar and model of our hearts"; as people of faith, open to God's will and so fruitful in the works of love, we, like Mary, can "hear the word of God and keep it." The first reading may be chosen from the Common; the gospel is Lk 2:41-51, reflecting both the pain and the trust motherhood brought to Mary's heart.

7) Our Lady of Mt. Carmel (July 16; optional memorial). Since their origins in the 12th century, the Carmelite friars have cherished a special devotion to Mary, as protectress and as a model of the contemplative life; their promotion of the brown scapular has been an important influence on the spread of popular dedication to Mary. This feast, originally celebrated by the Carmelites to mark the end of the Second Council of Lyons (1272), which allowed the young order to continue, was extended to the whole Western church in 1726 and retained in the 1969 missal. Central to the celebration is the recognition of our sister Mary's total dedication to the love of God, and the call—symbolized in the scapular—to clothe ourselves in her attitude of quiet, receptive faith. Readings may be selected from the Common of the Blessed Virgin; particularly appropriate would be Sir 24:1-21 (OT no. 6: Mary as the Wisdom of God) or Zach 2:14-17 (OT no. 11: a call to silence at the coming of the Lord) and Lk 11:27-28 (gospel no. 9): "Blessed are they who hear the word of God and keep it".

8) Dedication of the Basilica of St. Mary Major (Aug. 5; optional memorial). This great Christian monument, on the Esquiline Hill in Rome, was built by Pope Liberius (352-66) and refurbished and dedicated to Mary by Pope Sixtus III (432-40), in the aftermath of the controversy over her title "Mother of God." Formerly called "Our Lady of the Snow" because of a 14th-century legend that the site of the basilica was originally marked out by a miraculous August snowfall, this feast commemorates the dedication of what is probably the first church directly associated with Mary in the West, and thus acknowledges both the unity of the Roman communion and its tradition of devotion to the Mother of God. Readings may be taken from the Common; Rev 21:1-5 (Easter reading no. 3: the new Jerusalem, where God dwells among his people) would be an appropriate first reading.

9) Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary (Aug. 15; solemnity). This feast, the oldest exclusively Marian celebration, remains her most important day in the year—her "Easter." In the Western church, it is the only remaining feast of Mary with a liturgical vigil, and in the Eastern churches it is preceded by a two-week period of fasting similar to Lent. The content of the celebration, since the late 5th century, is the belief—proclaimed as a dogma by Pius XII in 1950—that Mary, as the human person uniquely “full of grace,” already shares with her risen Son the eschatological fullness of the new creation, the transformation of both body and spirit that her brothers and sisters await at the end of history. Thus while the feast focuses on her “assumption into heaven” or resurrection as a special privilege of the Mother of God, it also celebrates, as grounds for hope, the Christian conviction that the divinization of the human is no longer simply reserved to the Lord, but is now also fully shared by a member of the believing church. The readings for the vigil underline Mary’s privilege, suggesting her entry into the presence of God (1 Chronicles 15:16: entry of the Ark of God into the tabernacle) and her share in Christ’s victory over death (1 Cor 15:54–57), both rooted in her readiness to “hear the word of God and keep it” (Lk 11:27–28). The readings for the day celebration, reflect the feast’s message of joyful hope for all Christians, pointing to the salvation of the woman in Revelation 11–12, the symbolic mother of the eschatological Israel, as a “great sign,” and repeating Paul’s promise of resurrection for all who “belong” to Christ (1 Cor 15:20–26), then inviting us to listen to the triumphant, humble Magnificat of her who is “blessed among women.”

10) Queenship of Mary (Aug. 22; memorial). Celebrated since 1954 on May 31, this feast marks the octave of the Assumption in the reformed missal, and reflects the theme of Mary’s share in the glory of the Lord, which is the main focus of that solemnity. Christian poetry has called Mary “queen” since the 4th century (Ephraem), and Christian art has portrayed her in royal attire, enthroned with her child, since shortly after that: presumably because of the conviction that the Kingdom of God has fully “come” in her, the believing woman, and that she enjoys the fulfilment of Jesus’ promise that his disciples will share in his reign (Mt 19:28 par; cf. 1 Tm 2:11f). Readings may be taken from the Common; Isa 9:1–6 (OT no. 8; the promise of a child-king) and Lk 1:26–38 (gospel no. 3: Mary’s royal child) or Lk 1:39–47 (gospel no. 4: Mary’s blessedness) seem particularly apt.

11) Birth of Mary (Sept. 8; feast).

Originally a Jerusalem feast celebrating the miraculous birth of Mary as narrated in the apocryphal Protevangelium, this day reflected the early church’s conviction that the holiness and the very life of Mary are completely God’s gifts to his people. The only births liturgically celebrated by the church are those of the three great figures of Luke’s infancy-narrative, whose persons mark the start of the New Covenant: John the Baptist, Mary and Jesus. The readings prescribed for this feast focus attention on God’s providential involvement in leading human history towards Christ: Mic 5:1–4 (naming Bethlehem as the birthplace of the future king) or Rom 8:28–30 (pointing to God’s plan to save his chosen ones through his Son), and Mt 1:1–23 (contrasting the human genealogy of Jesus with the God-given circumstances of his conception). It is Mary, born by God’s plan but simply one of us, who is the point where this hidden working of grace becomes historical, human reality.

12) Our Lady of Sorrows (Sept. 15; memorial). An outgrowth of medieval devotion to Mary at the foot of the Cross, this feast was originally peculiar to the Servite order, and was extended to the Latin church in 1814; another feast in honor of the Sorrows of Mary, German in origin, was celebrated on the Friday before Palm Sunday, from 1727 until it was suppressed in the reformed missal of 1969. Following directly the feast of the Triumph of the Cross, this day invites the church to enter contemplatively into Mary’s compassion, as she witnesses the faithful suffering of her son, and so to experience the mystery of communion between God and a vulnerable humanity that lies at the heart of salvation. The first reading, Heb 5:7-9, points to Jesus' share in our sufferings as our "source of eternal salvation"; the gospel may be either Lk 2:33-35 (Simeon's prediction that Mary's "soul will be pierced") or Jn 19:25-27 (Mary being named by the dying Jesus as mother of his disciples). The great medieval sequence, Stabat Mater, may be said or sung before the gospel.

13) Our Lady of the Rosary (Oct. 7; memorial). Although the practice of praying the rosary in the Western church is at least as old as the 12th century, this feast commemorates the defeat of the Turkish fleet at Lepanto on Oct. 7, 1571, which the Dominican Pope Pius V attributed to Mary's intercession; it was made a feast of the whole Latin church after another defeat of the Turks in Hungary in 1716. As a prayer to Mary which is attached to simple meditation on the "mysteries" of Christ, the rosary presents Mary as the model of both contemplative and intercessory prayer in the life of the church. Readings may be chosen from the Common; Lk 1:26-38 (gospel no. 3), from which much of the "Hail Mary" is taken, would be appropriate.

14) Presentation of Mary (Nov. 21; memorial). Originally commemorating the dedication to Mary of the "New Church" in Jerusalem, on the temple mount, by the Emperor Justinian on Nov. 21, 543, this feast soon became associated with the story of Mary's being brought to live in the temple at the age of three, recounted in Protevangelium of James 7:2-8:1—an incident closely modelled on the story of the child Samuel in 1 Sam 1:21-28. Although the apocryphal source of the narrative made the acceptance of this feast slow in the West, it has been celebrated by the whole Greek church since the 8th century, and is regarded as one of the twelve great feasts of the Eastern liturgical calendar. The main point is clearly Mary's lifelong holiness and purity, rooted in her total dedication to the service of God. It is rightly considered to be the Eastern church's equivalent to the Western celebration of Mary's immaculate conception. Readings may be chosen from the Common; appropriate would be 1 Chronicles 15-16 (OT no. 4: the ark comes to the tabernacle) or Zech 2:14-17 (OT no. 11: God dwelling on Zion), and Lk 11:27-28 (gospel no. 9: "blest are they who hear the word of God and keep it"). 15) The Immaculate Conception of Mary (Dec. 8; solemnity). Originally a Jerusalem celebration of the miraculous conception of Mary by her childless parents, Joachim and Anna (Protevangelium 4), this feast was transformed by the medieval Latin church into a celebration of her being conceived without sin. This belief about Mary was explained by the Franciscan theologian Duns Scotus (c. 1265-1308) as based on her unparalleled closeness to Christ: since God's redeeming grace could be expected to be uniquely effective in her, and since the highest form of redemption is undoubtedly not forgiveness but the preservation from all sin, Mary must have been kept sinless by the grace of Christ from the first instant of her human existence—from her conception in the womb. Proclaimed a dogma of the church by Pope Pius IX in 1854, the doctrine of this feast is really that of Mary's election, her providentially secured holiness as Mother of God. Yet like the dogma of her assumption, it also expresses the Christian conviction that all of us are called by God to sinlessness, and can look forward in faith to the healing of our wounded humanity by the unmerited grace of Christ, since that grace has already triumphed in her utterly sinless life. The readings are Gen 3:9-20 (recounting the origin of our "history of sin"), Eph 1:3-12 (proclaiming God's eternal choice of those who would be his children by grace), and Lk 1:26-38 (in which Mary, "full of grace," freely assents to her vocation as mother of Christ).

16) Our Lady of Guadalupe (Dec. 12; in the United States, feast). This feast, peculiar to the Americas, commemorates the apparition of Mary to Juan Diego, an elderly Mexican native, on the hill of Tepeyac near Mexico City in 1531; the picture of Mary now venerated at Guadalupe, in which Mary is represented with Aztec features, is said to have miraculously appeared on the inside of Juan Diego's cloak when he went before the bishop of report what he had seen. The object of great devotion in Mexico since the earliest years of Spanish and Christian presence there, Our Lady of Guadalupe was proclaimed patroness of New Spain in 1746, and patroness of Latin America in 1910. In 1979, the Latin American bishops, assembled at Puebla in Mexico, referred to her apparition at Guadalupe as "the great sign of the nearness of the Father and Christ" to the poor and faithful people of Latin America. For all Christians of the Americas, this feast is a reminder that Mary's importance as type and mother of the church crosses all cultural boundaries; she stands as a promise to every people that our God "puts down the mightily from their thrones, and raises the lowly." Readings may be chosen from the Common; particularly appropriate are Isa 61:9-11 (OT no. 9: "God will make justice and praise spring up before all the nations") and Lk 1:39-55 (gospel of Aug. 15, including full Magnificat).

MEDIA, USE OF, IN THE LITURGY

Electronic media (film, filmstrips, slide presentations, video and sound recordings) are part of everyday life—communicating information, selling products, and providing entertainment. In general, these media are polysensual, appealing to all the senses of the whole person and can be more engaging than the more traditional print medium. Audio visual media can enhance the "irrational" dimensions of the liturgy and underscore the sacramental and spiritual power within worship.

Media in worship can be a help, highlighting the participation of the assembly with non-verbal and symbolic elements; or a nemesis, encouraging passivity and overpowering the congregation. For the liturgist, the proper use of audio-visual material in worship, like other art forms, is linked to the nature of the worshipping community. The governing concern is that the audio visual elements enable the assembly to worship together and not be intrusions into the prayer life of the community.

The U.S. bishops examined the liturgical use of electronic media in their statement "Environment and Art in Catholic Worship." Even though the document's mention of audio-visuals is limited to three paragraphs, the content is clear and open for future development.

With such varied media usage in the American church, it is difficult to assess the present use made of media in parish churches. Some dioceses prepare audio cassettes or videotapes of the ordinary's homily or address on a certain topic for playback in parishes of the diocese, often in conjunction with diocesan appeals. In the past, these requests were read at the Sunday Mass by the presider, often in letter form. Some parishes use projections of song and prayer texts as an alternative to songbooks and missalettes. Sound recordings have been used effectively, especially in rural areas where access to trained musicians and instruments is often a problem.

There are four liturgical moments in which audio visual media might best be employed in worship: (1) the opening rites: to introduce the theme of the liturgy, bringing the sights, sounds, colors, smells and textures of the world into the worshipping community; (2) liturgy of word: to reflect on the scripture theme, as a response to the readings or as part of the homily; (3) the prayer of the faithful: to connect the needs of the world with the petitions of the community; (4) after communion: to meditate on the liturgical or scriptural theme as part of the communion reflection.

There can be technical and liturgical problems with using media in existing church spaces. Some older churches are inadequate for liturgical media because of poor sightlines and acoustics and the inability to darken the space. For new church buildings or renovation projects, the bishops wisely make provision for audio-visual projections, recommending good sightlines and the use of acoustical material for better sound reproduction.

The concerns around the use of electronic media in worship highlight the very experiential nature of the liturgy. The liturgy should be audible in all parts of the church and visible with the celebration space open and free of clutter so that the congregation can see the celebrant, the altar, the bread and wine; and the microphone should not visually overpower the altar.

Technical problems can abound in using liturgical media. Ill-produced images, an inaudible soundtrack or the improper placement of material within the liturgy can draw attention to the medium rather than the message. The result is that the audio visuals interrupt rather than heighten the liturgy. Images that fall away from the text, losing the integration of sight and sound, can create discomfort or distraction to the congregation.

The bishops mention two kinds of skills that are required in using audio-visuals in the liturgy: (1) the liturgical and pastoral skill of understanding the dynamics and rhythms of the liturgy, coupled with a sensitivity to the parish community; and (2) the artistic skill in putting an audio-visual presentation together or in selecting a "packaged" presentation, done by a media center or publishing house.

The following guidelines are suggested for creating or using audio visual materials in the liturgy.

The making of audio-visuals requires discipline. In everyday life, electronic media are the tools of the professional communicator. To put together an effective, coherent audio-visual presentation takes time and presupposes critical discipline. It entails developing a religious or gospel theme, selecting the media form, experimenting with various ways the message can be expressed, creating the flow and continuity of sight and sound, and rehearsing the final version until it has the proper sense of flow.

Audio-visuals require an understanding of aesthetic principles. Electronic media are art forms that follow certain design principles (unity, variety, balance and harmony) that can enhance or heighten the material. These principles are not always consciously applied, but are part of the artists' soul or intuition.

In designing a visual presentation, variety suggests using different kinds of images: close-ups, medium shots, and long shots. Unity might be the way this variety is held together: unity of theme, content or color. Each image has the potential of telling a story or eliciting a mood or feeling. The artistic skill is in the arrangement and continuity of the material.

Audio-visuals require clarity of expression and access to the content. Unlike art in a gallery or a film in a movie theater, a visual presentation in church is rarely seen more than once. The congregation often cannot go back for a second look and carefully examine the brush strokes. In liturgy, especially, visual presentations need to be direct and clear. This does not mean the presentation cannot work on several levels of meaning, nor does it reduce the communication to a puerile level.

Audio-visuals require professional production values. Because congregations have been exposed to professional productions (television, business meetings, and mass media), these same standards must be adopted in the liturgical use of media. This does not mean slickness or a show-business attitude. Rather, the visuals should be of highest quality, sharp and clear; the equipment should be in good running order; the projectionist should have a workable knowledge of the equipment; the screen should be visible to the congregation, be integrated into the worship space and have good light-reflective qualities. To use media in church means to use the best. Second-rate visuals or ill-timed sight and sound presentations detract from the liturgy and can interfere in the prayer of the community. Practice, discipline, and careful planning are crucial elements in using media-visual material.

Audio-visuals require a sensitive selection of images. Beware of the stereotyped or literal image. Image selection implies an understanding of how to read, interpret and use images for content, form and design. A common error in selecting images is to be completely literal: the word peace evokes a bird in flight; loneliness, an old person sitting on a bench; creation, an autumnal forest scene. Peace may be an image of someone exhibiting interior peace; not all old people are lonely; and creation needs people, not only pretty landscapes. Good art challenges us to see, to look beyond, to see in the familiar, new possibilities, and to see in the unfamiliar what we never suspected was there. This is the strength which audio-visuals can bring to our church worship.

Electronic media is still in the infant or adolescent stage of development in most churches. As video and laser technology develops and expands, there will be new possibilities for media-enhanced worship and for the envisioning of new technological ministries. The use of media in worship, when used effectively and in the proper liturgical spirit, offers the church community a powerful tool to communicate the gospel message, to evoke a meditative response within the assembly and to re-create the wonder and awe of God's creation, by refreshing our imaginations to love and serve.

MICHEL, VIRGIL (1890-1938)

Benedictine of St. John's Abbey in Collegeville, Minn., Dom Virgil was introduced to the Liturgical Movement in Europe during his studies in Rome and Louvain. Upon his return to the United States, he brought the movement to Collegeville where he established the two great organs of liturgical education, which continue their noble service to this day: The Liturgical Press and Orate Fratres (later renamed Worship). His own primary interests and contributions were in the relationship between liturgy and social issues, a legacy which continues to challenge liturgical theologians today. This relationship remains the unfinished business of the contemporary liturgical reform.

MINISTRY

Ministry in the life and experience of the church is a larger reality than the "ordained ministry" of the clergy. It consists of a broad spectrum of services in the church which have come into existence over the centuries. This article will survey the different kinds of ministries which have emerged in the historical experience of the church. It is written with the conviction that as the church continues to live in the world, new forms of service for nourishment and leadership in the church will continue to emerge under the guidance of the Spirit of Christ.

The New Testament Church

The traditions concerning ministries in the church contained in the NT are traditions formed in the context of the sacramental worship of the church. The Pauline and other epistolary traditions as well as the gospels and Acts of the Apostles are in a real sense liturgical traditions, developed for and handed on within the praying assemblies which were gathered for the preaching of the word and the "breaking of the bread."

The first uses of the expression "ministry" (Gk. diakonia) in the NT are Paul's uses of it to name his own service of the "saints," viz., the preaching of the "good news" of righteousness by faith and reconciliation through the cross of Christ. But the idea behind Paul's ministry, his service of the gospel of God (Rom 1:1) and of the church, includes a wider sense of the whole of Christian life as service. Paul's description of the life of faith is cast in a spiritualized cultic and civic language in which the community itself is called the "temple of the living God" (1 Cor 3:16,17; 6:19; 2 Cor 6:16) in which the life of faith is lived as "sacrifice and service" (2 Cor 9:12, thusia, leitourgeia) offered to God and to each other.

Throughout the Pauline corpus, Paul gives a variety of names to his own ministry and that of those who work with him establishing and maintaining the churches which he founded. Paul's own vocation is above all that of apostolos (apostle), one who has "seen the Lord" (1 Cor 9:1) and who has therefore received the ministry of preaching the gospel of God (Rom 1:1-6). Paul describes his calling as leitourgeia (public service) and speaks of his fellow-workers, co-apostles,—men and women who labor with him to establish and to maintain the churches.

In 1 Corinthians, Paul specifies other shapes in which the ministry of the life of faith is lived in the service of the community (chap. 12). The community is endowed with a variety of gifts, services and operations by the Spirit, by the Lord and by God (12:4-6). In all their diversity their common function is the building up (oikodome) of the whole community (14:26). One listing includes ministries of the word: word of wisdom and word of knowledge, prophecy, speaking in and interpreting tongues, and the distinguishing of spirits. Others involve charismatic powers: faith, the gift of cures and the operations of power. In the context of disputes over gifts in the community, he states a divine origin and order of leadership functions in the community: God has placed: first, apostles; second, prophets; third, teachers (12:28). After this, Paul lists other services placed by God in the community: "then powers; then gifts of healing, helps, administration and tongues."

In 1 Corinthians 14, in the context of a discussion of the meaning and value of glossalalia (speaking in tongues), Paul mentions a number of other gifts which are exercised in the service of the community which comes together for prayer, instruction and the Lord's Supper (cf. 11:17,33). Each member of the community contributes: a hymn, a teaching, a revelation, a tongue, the interpretation of tongues. The function of all these manifestations of the Spirit, however, is the building up (oikodome) of the whole gathering (ekklesia).

Through this variety of gifts and manifestations Paul shows that God is present in Christ's body (the living, praying, teaching community) through the gifts given by the Spirit of God as the Spirit wishes and distributes in works of leadership, power and edification.

In the greetings opening the letter to the Philippians, Paul makes use of names for community leadership taken over from the religious associations of the Roman world in which the church came into existence and operation: episcopoi (overseers) and diakonoi (public servants, ministers). Diakonos is a secular term designating a servant or functionary in public service as well as table servants. The NT uses the term to designate Christ, secular rulers, Paul's associates and so on. Episkopos is likewise an available secular term designating someone who holds the care or oversight (episkopé) of some organization or project (Acts 1:20; 20:28).

In the later "pastoral letters" (1 and 2 Timothy), written after Paul's lifetime, the author treats of several fixed statuses in the community. Widows, elders, older men (presbuteroi), overseers or superintendents (episcopoi) and servants or ministers (diakonoi). Widows must meet a set of criteria in order to be enrolled (1 Tim 5:9ff.) into the body of widows whose function in the community is portrayed as one of good deeds (5:10), care of the sick, hospitality, care of children and the saints. Older men (presbuteroi) are mentioned as those who rule (well) and labor in "the word and teaching," men whose functions are administration, preaching and teaching. Diakonos is mentioned as a status in the community with requirements for selection as in the case of the widows, requirements which correspond to those demanded of the episkopos (overseer, super-intendent): they must be sober, trustworthy, with a well-managed household, a dignified wife and obedient children. Timothy himself is called a "good diakonos" (4:6). Episkopé (overseeing) is mentioned as a "good work" and the requirements for the episkopos likewise indicate one who is a trustworthy teacher, a man of good sense, dignity and hospitality and father of a well-ordered household.

The Acts of the Apostles presents a Lucan perspective on the origins of the church and her ministries, especially in its portrayal of Paul's missionary travels and the communities which he is credited with establishing. Paul, Barnabas, as well as the churches established in their ministry, are portrayed as the ministers of the Spirit, the same Spirit which identifies Jesus and gives origin and shape to his ministry. The Jerusalem community to which Paul travels is described as "the apostles and the brethren in Judea" (11:1), the "apostles and elders" (15:22) and "the brethren and elders" (21:18). Outside Jerusalem, Acts tells how Paul and Barnabas were commissioned and sent by the "laying on of the hands" of the "prophets and teachers" of the "church of Antioch" (13:1-3). In his travels with Barnabas Paul is shown appointing and laying hands on elders in the churches of Asia. On his journey to Rome, he gives a final exhortation to the elders of the church of Ephesus whom he reminds that the Holy Spirit has made them the overseers (episcopoi) of the flock, the church (20:28).

The brief mention of "the seven" in chap. 6 describes men who are chosen by the community to care for the daily management of the community. Their service, however, goes beyond the care for material needs. Stephen is presented as a healer (6:8) who gives a powerful prophetic witness (6:8-7:53); and Philip is seen as an evangelist in Samaria (8:5-8), in Gaza with the Ethiopian eunuch and in Ashdod and the coast cities (8:26-40). Acts does not call these men diakonoi (deacons).

The gospels, narrative witnesses to the identity of Jesus and, in and through Jesus, to the identity of the church, came into being and were handed on from generation to generation of believers in the worshipping sacramental community. One focus for the image of Jesus (and of the church) is that of service, ministry. The life and especially the death of Jesus are interpreted as acts of service. In Mk 10:45, Jesus interprets his life and death as his service ministry: "The Son of Man came not to be served, but to serve (diakonesai) and to give his life as a ransom in the place of many" (10:45). This service of Jesus is given as the basis for the serving mission of the community: "... whoever would be great among you will be your servant, and whoever would be first among you will be the slave of all" (10:43,44). There is no mention in the gospels of the later forms for structured ministry in the church: episkopos (bishop), presbuteros (presbyter) or diakonos (deacon).

The manner in which this ministry is presented varies according to the agenda of each of the evangelists. For Mark, Jesus is the son of God whose sonship takes the form of being rejected by his people, misunderstood by his disciples in spite of all his teaching and healing and executed by the religious authorities of his people. His is to the end a ministry of faithful witness to the "good news" which he preaches. The strongest affirmations of his identity are voiced by demons (1:24, 3:11, 5:7) and by the pagan soldier "seeing how he died" (15:39). Jesus' service is the model for true service in the church; he warns his community of false Christs and false prophets (13:22) whose claims to power will lead them astray and insists that the greatest among the disciples are those who serve all the rest like slaves (10:43,44). On the eve of Jesus' death, Mark uses the liturgical tradition to present Jesus as one who offers his life as "blood of the covenant" (14:24), a liturgical service of reconciliation and covenant with God.

Although he uses much of Mark's tradition, Matthew expresses Jesus' ministry more as a ministry of teaching. Into Mark's framework, Matthew inserts five "books of teaching" (cc. 5-7, 10, 13, 18, 24-25), the sermons found only in Matthew's "book" (1:1). In Matthew's account, the disciples of Jesus are learners who, in their turn, are sent into the whole world as teachers (28:20) to "make disciples" of all the nations. Luke's narrative of Jesus' ministry is the story of Jesus as the minister of God's Spirit. Everyone connected with Jesus' origin is "filled with the Spirit" (Mary, Elizabeth, Zechariah, John the Baptist, etc.) and Jesus, returning from the desert "filled with the Spirit" begins his ministry as the one on whom the Spirit of the Lord rests (4:1,14,18). The disciples are charged to wait for the power from on high at whose coming they are sent to the ends of the earth as ministers of the Spirit to preach the forgiveness of sins (24:47-50). Acts narrates the church's ministry of the Spirit to the ends of the earth, especially in the missionary journeys of Paul.

In the fourth gospel, the narrative of Jesus' life culminates in the solemn meal in which Jesus gives his disciples (now friends rather than servants) a model for their behavior as friends in the community by washing their feet and instructing them to wash each other's feet. John describes Jesus' own ministry as the manifestation through the "signs" which he works (20:30) of the presence of God in all that he, the living image of God, says and does. His commission to his disciples is the same mission that he has from the Father: the ministry of the forgiveness of sins in the power of the Holy Spirit (20:21-23).

Chapters 4-10 of the letter to Hebrews interpret the life and death of Jesus as a "priestly" event, contrasting the "once-and-for-all" effectiveness of Jesus' self-offering to God to the annually repeated rituals of atonement in which the blood of the covenant was sprinkled in the mercy seat in the Holy of Holies. The priest-king Melchisedech serves as an illustration of the superiority of Jesus' priestly service of God to that of the hereditary priesthood in Israel. Whatever its origins and whoever its original addressees, the letter was known and used in the primitive church as early as Clement of Rome's letter to the Corinthians (c. 95 C.E.). Its extensive use of priestly imagery to interpret the meaning of Jesus has had pervasive effects both in Christology and in the theology of the priesthood and of ministry.

Two noteworthy conclusions emerge from the images of church life presented in the letters and narrative accounts of the NT. The first is that the church manifests diverse, flexible and evolving forms of organization together with a rich multiplicity of services animating the local communities and a fluid nomenclature for the structure and the variety of services in the Christian communities. In their organization and organizational nomenclature, the local churches show influences of their Jewish origins as well as the creative ways in which these origins were adapted to the forms, structures and nomenclature of religious associations in the Roman religious world of the 1st century.

In the Pauline communities the ministries originate in the "manifestation" of the Spirit of God. They are the ministry of Christ and the operation of God at work "building up" the community. In later traditions the prophetic prayer and the laying on of hands serve as rituals of blessing and election to the missionary and leadership services described in the pastorals and in Acts. The gospel narratives root the service of the community in the direct call of Jesus to be followers and imitators of his own life and death.

A second conclusion worthy of note is that the ministries mentioned in these sources of Christian experience are functional realities which serve the church in leadership, the preaching and teaching of "the word" and physical and spiritual "works of power." There is no mention of a permanent sacral power, later to be called "sacramental power," which is held and exercised by one stable group within the church, viz., the ordained. Paul himself states emphatically that his own ministry is rooted in his "vision of the Lord" (1 Cor 9:1), and that he has not baptized anyone (1 Cor 1:14). In his one treatment of the eucharist (1 Cor 11:17-34) there is no mention of a presider (although someone obviously served as leader at the church's gathering); the community eats the bread and drinks the cup and the community must understand what they do when they eat and drink. In the later account of Acts, Luke has the twelve clearly state their own function: prayer and the preaching of the word (Acts 6:2,4).

The Early Church (A.D. 100-1000)

The movement of the church into the world of the Roman Empire in the first centuries of its history is a complex reality geographically, culturally, politically and religiously. The church came to live in a number of different geographical settings, each with its own set of socio-political and religious patterns of thought, expression and practice: Greece, Italy, Egypt, Spain, Gaul (France),

Africa, and so on. The rich variety of these experiences found expression in a large body of literature: sermons, letters, biblical commentaries, philosophical and theological treatises, dogmatic and canonical legislation. Modern interpretation of this vast field of literature (its dating, content and interpretation) is filled with conflict and contradiction. However, some broad general developments in the practice and understanding of ministries in the life of the church can be indicated.

Administrative functions. The ministry of leadership of the community evolved in diverse ways in different parts of the growing church. The letters of Ignatius of Antioch (d. 125) stress vigorously the importance of the single episcopos (overseer) surrounded by his presbuteroi (elders) and diakonoï (ministers) as the guarantee of unity and solidity of church life: baptism, eucharist, marriage, doctrine, etc. The church in Egypt also seems to have been organized around the leadership of a single episcopos for the whole of Egypt. Other churches, such as that of Rome and Corinth, mention a plurality of presbuteroi who are episcopoï charged with the leadership of the community. One 3rd-century document mentions the existence of teachers and prophets still functioning in the church in Rome along with the elders and overseers. By the mid-3rd century, the tri-partite pattern of church leadership, bishop-presbyter-deacon, is attested to in the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus of Rome. By the 4th century, the role of the bishop as the leader of the community and also the "college" of bishops had become an established pattern. This is attested to by the practice of the koinonia (communion between churches) and of the councils which were convened by the emperors to deal with issues of church doctrine and order as these issues impacted on the public civil order.

Selection of church leaders. Just as the shape of church leadership evolved over the first four centuries, the manner of selecting church leaders evolved into an increasingly centralized procedure. The Didache (c. 90-100) simply states that the communities are to "select for yourselves overseers and ministers." Gradually the selection and installation of candidates for the episcopate became the function of the clergy and the participation of the people became increasingly formalized into a pro forma acclamation of the one chosen by the clergy. In the 4th and 5th centuries the emperor appointed the patriarchs of Constantinople and the bishops of the Eastern church looked more and more to the civil power as the guarantee of their status in the church.

The official ritual for the installation (ordinatio) of the chosen bishop was the imposition of hands by episcopal colleagues from other churches as a sign of their "communion" with the new bishop. Presbyters and deacons were chosen, assigned and installed by their bishop with the imposition of hands, by the bishop and other presbyters in the case of presbyters, by the bishop alone in the case of deacons.

By the 3rd century the application of Jewish biblical categories to the church and her ministries resulted in characterizing the eucharist as a "sacrifice" and those who presided at it as "priests." With the establishment of the church in the 4th century, the ordained priests constituted a legal social class in Roman society with the traditional civic rights and privileges of the "order" of priests in Roman social structure. With the application of the concept of the character to the "sacrament of order" in the 3rd- and 4th-century Donatist controversies, ordained ministry came to be understood as a permanent state in the church, an idea which was expanded and ontologized in the Gregorian reform of the 12th and 13th centuries.

However, the service of leadership and administration did not exhaust the ministries available to and functioning in the church. The charismatic offices of apostle, prophet and teacher continue to be found in Rome in the 3rd century. "Apostles" were still missioned by the church in the 4th century as, e.g., Wulfilas, who was ordained and missioned to the Gothic tribes by the Council of Ephesus in 341. The fluidity of the language dealing with ministerial functions (presbyters, overseers, ministers) as well as the evolving shape of ecclesiastical authority and administration showed considerable elasticity both in the understanding and the shape of ministries for the life of the church.

During the persecutions, the functions and ministry of confessors/martyrs came to be recognized. Their witness to the faith made them not only examples of courage and fidelity but also spiritual leaders whose intercession for sinners functioned as a kind of "indulgence" for reconciliation. In some churches, those who had been imprisoned for their faith needed no "ordination" to serve as leaders and presiders in the communities. Widows and deaconesses performed a number of ministries of instruction, care of the sick and poor, and assistance of women in baptism and interviews with male clergy.

The monastic communities (largely lay communities) functioned as a rich resource of men and women who ministered to the churches' spiritual needs by example, exhortation and spiritual direction.

A variety of forms of service within the church emerged during the formative years of the church as it adapted itself to the culture within which it lived and served the needs which arose within it for nourishment, encouragement and leadership. The function of leadership gradually coalesced into the form of a specific class within the church and secular society: the kleros or "clergy."

However these functions did not exhaust the forms in which the life of the church was built up and furthered.

The Medieval Western Church (1000-1500)

By the year 1000 the church had been thoroughly feudalized. After the collapse of Roman culture in the 5th-8th centuries, the lay lords of northern Europe subjugated and united the disparate tribal cultures of the area into what came to be called "feudal culture." The life of the church was a part of this process. The "secular" and "religious" spheres were not seen as separate. Royalty itself was considered a "sacrament" and sacred ministry was conferred by God in the sacred anointing of the king. The appointment of bishops and the management of church affairs was controlled by the lay lords and the religious leaders who functioned in their courts. Liturgy, architecture and art all functioned within the relatively unified experience of church and society. What came to be called "Roman liturgy" was a blend of Roman traditions and Franco-Germanic usages incorporating the spirit of this culture into the unified religious and secular world of the Early Middle Ages: the "Romanesque." Clergy, like other functionaries in the social-cum-religious culture, were inducted into their offices by means of "investiture" with the symbols of their position (keys, books, chalices, patens, etc.). This ritual was considered to be of the "essence of sacramental orders" until its change by Pius XII in 1947.

During the 8th and 9th centuries monks from the British Isles who were brought into Europe by kings to christianize the local populations exercised the apostolic ministry in a new guise. Ministry took the shape of missionary preaching and the foundation of monastic/missionary centers with their rich variety of ministries: preaching and evangelization; the ministries of liturgical prayer (Mass and canonical hours); education, libraries, scholarship; pastoral care in the mode of the "familial" monastic community, i.e., spiritual direction and exhortation. The ministry of the monastic church existed along with and sometimes in tension with the episcopal church. The ministry of reconciliation as well as the ordination of monks to sacred orders (subdeacon, deacon and priest) was a source of tension between the abbots and the local bishops well into the Gregorian reform (1045-1215).

With the development of urban society in the 11th and 12th centuries, a new stratum of social and ecclesiastical life emerged: the bourgeoisie who formed a new social reality situated between the secular nobility and religious establishments (monasticism and the local church). A variety of ministries emerged out of this new culture. The merchants, artists, and other guilds organized forms for works of mercy: nursing the sick, burying the dead (especially during the plagues which occurred soon after emergence of urban life) and a more systematic care for the now unavoidable urban poor. Pious lay associations also organized "spiritual treasures," the fruits of prayers, indulgences and other good works, which treasure was placed at the disposal of the members, their families and other beneficiaries.

The experiences of the Crusades as well as the growing religious reaction among clergy and laity to the "capitalism" of medieval urban culture form part of the background for the emergence, especially in the 12th and 13th centuries, of the evangelical ministry of mendicant preachers: laity and clergy, men and women, devoted to the reading of scripture, the imitation of the poor Christ, the service of the poor and the proclamation of evangelical reform in the head and members of the church. These movements formed a matrix for a new flowering of the ministry of the word whose demise was the topic of frequent complaint in the medieval calls for reform. The popes of the Gregorian reform considered the mendicants a valuable tool for their own visions of reform, granting them papal approval and privileges and clericalizing many of the lay movements. The independence (exemption) of these groups from the local bishops occasioned intense discussions of the proper locus for the preaching ministry within the church.

The first formal theological treatises on the church appeared in the beginning of the 14th century mirroring the concerns of the Gregorian reform and the struggles over control of the life of the church. The church was depicted in terms of competences to function officially and sacramentally as a divinely instituted structure in which the power to function "officially" was conferred by sacramental ordination. Thus an ontological and essential distinction between the ordained and the non-ordained came to be seen as the basis for the restriction of the power of official sacramental ministry to the ordained, usually understood as the priest or bishop. The ministry of the word eventually came to be seen as the exercise of this sacramental power by delegation of the power to preach by the bishop. These and other factors created an ecclesiastical, liturgical/sacramental and theological tension between the traditional clerical ministry of the sacraments and the evangelical ministry of the word, a tension which reached a climax in the Protestant Reformation of the 16th century.

Reformation and the Council of Trent

Medieval evangelical reform movements appealed to a number of biblical images to express their visions of a renewal of life and ministry in the church: the unique priesthood of Christ alone, the priesthood of all believers through baptism into Christ, the word of scripture as the warrant for the life and ministry of the church, the preaching and hearing of the word as the heart of the eucharistic assembly. The radical Protestant reformers built an understanding of the church on these images and used them to open the reality of ministry in the church to the whole Christian people. The Reformers insisted on the radical evangelical equality of all believers. This involved the elimination of a specific ordained class in the church who alone was empowered for sacramental ministry and preaching. Martin Luther (1483-1546) insisted on an office of ministry in the church in opposition to the radical Reformers, but maintained with them that ministry in the church consists essentially in the proclamation of the word of God. Priests were seen as men chosen by the faithful to proclaim the word. It is this ministry which constitutes the community in faith and mediates the true invisible mystery of the church to the visible historical communities gathered in faith around the gospel.

The Council of Trent (1545-1563) responded to the Reformation views of ministry by insisting on the essential necessity of the ministry of the word for bishops and pastors (Sess. V, 1546). It also defended the traditions of the seven sacraments instituted by Christ (Sess. VII, 1547), including the sacrament of order, and of the proper ministers for the sacraments. It specifically condemned the claim that "all Christians have the power to administer the word and the sacraments" maintaining the Gregorian image of the church as structured by sacramental and jurisdictional power conferred in valid ordination. The teaching of the manuals of dogmatic theology which formed the core curriculum of the seminaries established by the council (Sess. XXIII, 1563) focused the theology of ministry and sacraments on these issues. The result is that the vision of the ministry of the church taught and learned in the seminaries and preached to the faithful since the 17th century has centered almost exclusively on the sacramental ministry of those ordained to "sacred orders." But in spite of this clerical focus for the understanding of ministry, the care of the sick and of the poor, the care and education of children, religious and secular secondary and university education, the works of spiritual direction, counselling and other physical, mental and spiritual works of mercy, the missionary work of the church—all these continued to flourish in the many religious orders and lay organizations which had come into existence during the Middle Ages, the Renaissance, and post-Reformation periods.

The 19th Century and Vatican I

The 18th and 19th centuries witnessed the emergence of the critical spirit of the "enlightenment," with its intellectual and political rejection of traditions and dogma in the name of human maturity and liberation. The official church responded to the new democratic and economic liberalisms with condemnation. One effect of the liberal movements was a desire on the part of some segments of the church for the assertion of papal independence from the secular power and papal primacy and infallibility in the church (ultramontanism). The First Vatican Council (1869-1870) decreed the dogmas of papal primacy and infallibility leading to an increasing centralization of authority in the church and a renewed "Gregorian" view of the separation of the church from the world. The first Code of Canon Law (1917) mirrored these views and the ecclesiology of the Roman schools which prevailed throughout the world in the early 20th century imaged a highly centralized church along the lines envisioned in the Gregorian reform. The view of ministry is basically clerical, with the ministries of the religious orders under clerical control.

Beyond the "official" ministries recognized in the Code of Canon Law, however, forms of ministry continued to emerge as Christians living in the world confronted the concerns of their own times. In the 20th century, the Young Christian Workers and Young Christian Students, the Catholic Interracial Council, the Catholic Worker Movement in the U.S. and Catholic labor unions; Scout organizations and press, radio and television in the U.S. and Europe arose to serve the needs of Catholics in an increasingly secularized society. Catholic education, largely under the care of religious orders of women and men, has since flourished all over the world.

Vatican II

The Second Vatican Council (1962-1965) attempted to formulate and implement an image of the life of the church in terms which incorporated many aspects of the spirit, the problems and concerns of the 20th century. The council treated issues concerned with ministries in a number of its decrees. Its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963) emphasized that the whole congregation is the agent of the liturgical life of the church in its gathering, prayer and song. It decreed that all members of the worshipping congregation take an active part in liturgical celebrations and outlined the proper roles for all members of the congregation in the proper performance of the prayer-life of the church. The result of this insistence has been expansion of the forms of ministry exercised in the celebration of the eucharist. Functions formerly restricted to the seminary preparation for priesthood or exercised by the ordained priest in the ordinary parish Masses, have been opened to laity: the roles of acolyte, lector, minister of communion in the liturgy of the eucharist and the bringing of communion to those unable to attend the parish eucharist.

The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (1964) balanced the image of the church as a hierarchy of sacred power with other images of the church. The entire church is the sacrament or mystery of Christ in which all the members are endowed by the Spirit with functions for the service of the church (n. 7). The entire church as the "people of God" shares in Christ's prophetic, priestly and royal ministry. The constitution stresses that these gifts and their exercise are the function of the local church, clergy, religious and laity gathered around their bishop, a life and energy expressed in their eucharist.

Thus, along with decrees on the pastoral office of bishops in the church (1965) and on the life and ministry of priests (1965) reiterating much of the traditional understandings of the functions of bishops and priests, the council devoted a decree to the apostolate of the laity (1965) in which the laity's function in the ministry of the church is called their "apostolate." This apostolic ministry is exercised in the lives of the laity as they fulfill their own prophetic calling to bring the message of salvation to the whole world (n. 3). Because of their baptism, the laity have been gifted with the prophetic, priestly and royal dignity of Christ and have the right and the duty to exercise the gifts of the Spirit, which each has received, in the church and the world. This decree explicates quite clearly the vision of the whole church as a "servant church" a church created for ministry and enlivened by its ministries both in the world and in the church.

The years since Vatican II have witnessed a significant decrease in the numbers of men and women entering the priesthood and religious life in the church. This has entailed a crisis in many of the traditional forms of ministry which have been carried out by the religious and the clergy: parishes, schools, hospitals and nursing facilities. In some cases this decrease has been matched by an increase in lay involvement in some of these ministries. Laity have assumed larger roles in the administration of parishes, taking full charge of parish administration in an increasing number of cases. Hospitals and schools have been forced to open themselves to lay cooperation, and some laity have adopted the visions of religious orders which continue to sponsor these ministries. Of course, this is an ambiguous phenomenon. Some parishes have effectively ceased being able to celebrate the eucharist regularly, relying on communion services instead or on the occasional, sometimes annual, presence of an ordained priest for eucharist, reconciliation and marriages. As yet the official church refuses to ordain women or married men to assume full pastoral sacramental leadership in the churches. The situation will apparently intensify as the years go on and the remaining clergy and religious become older and fewer in number.

However, the lived experience of the ministries which believers have performed for each other throughout the history of the church shows a continuous spontaneity and a rich variety in forms of service. Faith in the church (we believe in one, holy, catholic, apostolic church) involves a continued trust that the Spirit will continue to raise up and energize people in the church to meet the needs which arise as the church lives out its faith from one generation to the next. Our faith also implies that we believe that the church will always grow to be a credible witness to the power of the mystery of Christ within her in her service of those who continually need to hear "good news" in the world. As Paul said to his church in Corinth in the 1st century, "There are varieties of gifts but the same Spirit, and there are varieties of service (ministries) but the same Lord, and there are varieties of working, but it is the same God who inspires them all in every one" (1 Cor 12:4-6). The same Spirit, the same Lord, the same God are still at work serving the church through the abundant gifts with which its members are gifted for the building up of the body of Christ and the Kingdom of God.

MINISTRY SCHOOL, LITURGY IN

Good liturgical celebrations in a ministry school are both more important, and more difficult to achieve than we thought them to be in the recent past.

Importance

Today nearly everyone realizes the importance of the creative integration of the teaching of worship in a ministry school and the actual prayer life of the seminary community: the integration of the theoretical and the practical, the pedagogical and the mystagogical, the classroom and the chapel. The directives for ministry schools of the various churches stress this integration and recent studies of liturgy in seminaries try to determine if this integration is being achieved.

For example, in the Roman Catholic church, the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education issued an Instruction on Liturgical Formation in Seminaries (1979) which treats not only how liturgy is to be taught in Catholic seminaries, but how the liturgy is to be lived and celebrated. The instruction states (art. 2):

"All genuine liturgical formation involves not only doctrine but also practice. This practice, as a mystical formation, is obtained first and mainly through the very liturgical life of the students into which they are daily more deeply initiated though liturgical actions celebrated in common."

Those who research the teaching of worship in seminaries (e.g., the studies of CARA and James White) are concerned not only with the teaching of worship but also its celebration in the ministry school. The studies show that while nearly everyone realizes the importance of quality worship in the seminary community, there is now a painful awareness of how very difficult this is to achieve. Some of these difficulties are obvious, others are more subtle.

Difficulties

(1) Liturgy Makes the Church Visible. A basic liturgical principle states that liturgy makes the church visible. At worship we "draw a picture" of the church. The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (art. 2) puts it in these words: the liturgy "is the outstanding means whereby the faithful may express in their lives and manifest to others the mystery of Christ and the real nature of the true Church." The same constitution (art. 41) states that the "best" picture is achieved when the bishop of the local church presides in the cathedral, assisted by presbyters and deacons, and surrounded by the entire community of the local church. As this is not always possible, the Sunday parish liturgy provides the usual liturgical context for making the church visible.

No matter how "good" liturgy in the seminary might be, the seminary community is too limited to provide an adequate picture of church. The group is too homogeneous to adequately image the body of Christ. In proportion to the church at large, the seminary community is too clerical, too male, too young, too educated, too rich, too healthy. In most seminary communities black Christians and Hispanic Christians are under-represented.

In those seminaries in which women cannot exercise certain ministries, their very presence at the community worship provides a picture of a church under strain. For example, in a Roman Catholic seminary which might employ women as professors of scripture, liturgy, homiletics, or pastoral ministry, and not allow these same professors to "take their turn" with the male professors and administrators preaching or presiding at liturgy, the liturgy can become the very place where discrimination is made painfully evident. Frustration never makes for good liturgy.

It is difficult to provide "model liturgy" in a seminary for those denominations and churches which are experiencing a diminishing number of available ministers, when the seminary community itself has an high proportion of ordained clergy. An "ideal" liturgy for a minister who has already presided at eucharist twelve to eighteen times during a given week is different from that of a minister who presides only two or three times a month, alternating with the other professors and students in the ministry school.

The practice of "concelebration" of the eucharist, in those denominations with this custom, brings its own problems. Concelebration, as indeed any liturgical symbol, is polyvalent: what it might symbolize in a parish on Holy Thursday, or on the occasion of the pastor's jubilee, it might not symbolize when it is employed daily in a context in which it highlights the differences between students and faculty and between the ordained faculty and the non-ordained faculty.

While we want every worship service of the seminary community to be "good liturgy" there are many considerations which influence the liturgical planning and celebration. The best presider or best preacher is not always selected; nor do we always use the best vestment or sing the best song. There is an important value exercised when various members of the faculty and staff preside and preach at community worship.

Scholarship, teaching ability, administrative skills, presiding at worship, the ability to preach—these are distinct skills which are not necessarily found in the same individual. A professor may be a genius when it comes to parish administration and an inspiring teacher of that subject; this does not necessarily mean that this same professor has a facility for symbolic expression and poetic speech. It is important that students exercise various ministries in the seminary worship services; the preaching of the students can serve an important spiritual value in the community. This is real ministry, not just “practice” or “student preaching.” At the same time it is not expected that the student homily be delivered with the same professional skill or confidence as would be exercised by the professor of homiletics. Quality liturgy in a seminary always involves the creative integration of a number of positive values.

(2) Sunday and the Church Year. Quality liturgy cannot be achieved independently of the rhythms and seasons of the church year. While Sunday is the ordinary focus of Christian worship, in many seminaries and ministry schools Sunday finds the chapel dark because the professors and student ministers have returned to their primary prayer communities to preside over and participate in the liturgies in their parishes. Even in Roman Catholic seminaries, where students are not allowed to preside at Sunday worship until after they are ordained, many students are “doing ministry” in parishes on the Lord’s Day. In these schools the principle liturgy for the seminary community is of necessity on a day of lesser liturgical importance.

In seminaries where eucharist is celebrated seven days a week, a different problem emerges: how to keep every day from becoming Sunday. Some believe that until a special eucharistic rite for weekdays is developed, this problem cannot be solved.

The seasons of the church calendar present their own special difficulties for the seminary community. Many seminaries are closed for the principal feasts of the year. Students often want some sort of “Christmas” liturgy before leaving their classmates for Christmas vacation and ministry. While the rest of the church shouts the Advent “Come, Lord Jesus,” the seminarians sing “Silent Night.” When the liturgy in the ministerial school is more influenced by the school year than by the church year, quality liturgy becomes difficult.

In those churches in which Christian initiation takes place during the Easter vigil, the awareness is growing that it is Christian initiation which is at the very heart of that holy night’s liturgy, and a vigil without baptisms is lacking something essential. Yet, the vigil in a ministry school is ordinarily celebrated without the active presence of catechumens—not a “model” situation.

This does not mean that it cannot be prayerful or fruitful. Most Roman Catholic priests over fifty years of age were formed in a seminary context where each Sunday began with a silent communion Mass and then, later Sunday morning, they celebrated the climax of the liturgical week with the solemn Sunday liturgy at which none of the seminarians received holy communion. If Mass without communion can nourish a church, so can the vigil without baptisms.

(3) The Needs of the Praying Community. While everyone would recognize that the needs of a community gathered for a funeral are different from the needs of a community gathered for a wedding, and that at a “good” liturgy, pastoral sensitivity would be exercised to adapt the liturgy to the needs of the participants, it is more difficult to see the difference between the needs of a parish community and those of a ministerial school. In a parish, Christians may come to the Sunday service hungry for the word of God, eager to hear a sermon which will put their lives in a Christian perspective and help them with their daily living. Indeed, this may be the only time of the week when they have such an opportunity. In a ministry school, on the other hand, the participants may come to a service fresh from several hours of scripture study and reflection on the word of God and they may want a "quiet" liturgy, without homily and without much interaction with their teachers and peers. Without commenting on whether these "needs" and "wants" are good or bad, the fact is that a liturgy that "fits" a community in a ministry school and is "good liturgy" for them is probably not good liturgy in a parish. The seminary chapel is not a classroom where one learns "neat things" which can be imitated in a parish. The "teaching" that goes on in the seminary chapel concerns the formation of liturgical spirituality and the general liturgical principles which constitute good worship. The difficulty is that these are the very things which are the most difficult to teach. Imitation is easier to learn than common sense or pastoral sensitivity.

(4) Collective Responsibility. Perhaps the greatest difficulty in assuring quality liturgical celebrations in a ministerial school is determining who is responsible for this judgment. Who is "in charge" of the seminary liturgy? An assignment which was a coveted position in the 1960s (chapel director, worship coordinator, etc.) has become a terrible responsibility and often a burden in the 1990s.

No matter who is placed "in charge" of the worship of the school, the entire faculty and administration have a vested interest in its celebration. The seminary liturgy is not merely the concern of the professors of worship. The homiletics professors are concerned that the preaching reflects the quality of their classrooms. The professors of scripture are concerned with the way the word of God is proclaimed and interpreted. Professors of systematic and sacramental theology know that what they teach in the classroom can be undone in the chapel. Administrators are concerned when chapel services alarm the sensitivities of the sponsoring denominations or the bishops who send students to the school. The one responsible for the seminary liturgy has a lot of people to please!

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (art. 16) states that liturgy is to be taught "under its theological, historical, spiritual, pastoral, and canonical aspects. Moreover, the other professors, while striving to expound the mystery of Christ and the history of salvation from the angle proper to each of their own subjects, must nevertheless do so in a way that will clearly bring out the connection between their subjects and the liturgy, as also the underlying unity of all priestly training. This consideration is especially important for professors of dogmatic, spiritual, and pastoral theology and for professors of holy Scripture."

The institutional structures and the personal cooperation and expertise necessary for this type of cooperation and integration in the classroom are often lacking, and even when the structures are present the integration is very difficult to achieve. And if this is true of the classroom, it is even more true of the chapel. The chapel is not a classroom, yet the teaching that goes on in the chapel is often more powerful than that of the classroom. Legem credendi lex statuat supplicandi.

As the liturgy forms the future ministers of the churches, those responsible for these liturgies are forming not only the future ministers but the future churches—an awesome responsibility and a most difficult task. The following lines from the study of James White indicate an example of this dimension of seminary worship: “Of great potential significance is the move to a weekly Eucharist in Protestant seminaries of liturgically central denominations. . . . Moves to a weekly eucharist are important when a strong eucharistic piety is not present in the churches of the denomination. It may mean a generation of frustrated graduates or a generation of active change agents. The personal development of eucharistic piety among students over their three or four years in seminary may be far more important than what is taught about worship in the classroom. At the same time, exposure to well-prepared and skillfully delivered homilies may spark a change for future Roman Catholic priests from the parish life they have known. Seminary worship formation is a crucial part of the seminary experience. Unfortunately, this is rarely recognized by many students until long after they graduate and never perceived by some faculty. . . . One of the most frequent frustrations expressed was the integration of the teaching of worship into the curriculum as a whole” (White, 310-311).

(5) Creativity and Legislation. If the entire faculty and staff is to be responsible for the quality of the liturgy in the ministerial school, another difficulty is encountered: “too many cooks spoil the broth.” The creative action of any artist can be stifled when the artist is required to please too many different critics. While “the absence of limitation is the enemy of art” often presides in a seminary context feel so limited by the expectations of the seminary worshipping community, faculty, students, administration, and by the larger concerns of their denominations/bishops, that the artistic and the beautiful is stifled and we are left with a mere observance of the rubrics and the denominational laws. This can result in liturgies that have been compared to a “paint by numbers” landscape. It takes a truly great artist to produce a work of beauty with a “paint by numbers” kit.

Not everyone realizes the amount of compromise and human understanding necessary to preside at a worship service, whether as a faculty or as a student minister, while trying to engage in prayer the professor of sacramental theology, the director of the liturgical practicum, the professor of homiletics and the scripture professors, all of whom have criteria for what makes “good worship.”

“Spontaneity” and “creativity” are not leftovers from the 1960s but, rightly understood, are essential elements of every worship service. Every liturgical tradition must be creatively adapted to the here-and-now worshipping community. There must always be a creative balance between preserving the liturgical tradition and adapting it to the present liturgical needs. To quote again James White: “There is always danger in making seminary worship too clinical, too self-conscious in looking over one’s shoulder to see what one is doing. On the other hand, many possibilities will never be encountered unless students experience them first in seminary worship” (White, 309-310).

(6) High Expectations. The very fact that everyone realizes that the prayer life of the seminary community is so important places a certain strain on the worshipping community. Everyone—students, administrators, and faculty—comes to the service with the expectation that it will be “good” and indeed exemplary. Funds are budgeted for quality liturgical furnishings; experts in scripture, music and homiletics are all present. However, a basic liturgical principle reminds us that quality worship is not achieved merely by the quality of the symbols and metaphors employed but by the quality of the realities to which they point. A wedding ring may be simple or elaborate in itself but its function as a symbol is directly related to the quality of the love in the relationship it signifies. A beautiful ring does not make a beautiful marriage. Good liturgy is a free gift of God, most often bestowed on holy (those who know in the Spirit that they are poor) participants.

It is easy to expect that the liturgy in a ministry school can be "perfect" simply because it is possible to provide quality materials: exquisite vestments, a congregation both versed in scripture and capable of singing in parts, the absence of crying infants and non-communicants who leave before the service is over—all those things a pastor might wish for and dream of during a parish Sunday worship service! However, it is by the bread of our daily lives being broken that we can recognize the divine presence in the breaking of the eucharistic bread. Holy participants make quality worship. The unfounded presumption of some members of the worshipping seminary community is that ministry students are, by the very fact of being ministry students, somehow automatically holy. Those experienced in seminary life and formation know that is not always the case. Christ often chooses the less than holy, the less than brilliant, the weaker voice, to be his minister.

Those concerned with liturgy in a ministry school agree on the importance of the quality of the community worship. At the same time, they are becoming more aware of the difficulties involved in achieving quality worship and hopefully more tolerant and appreciative of those whose task it is to assure this quality.

MINISTRY, LAY

This article addresses three questions. How did the lay ministries that emerged in many local church settings following Vatican II affect the subsequent "explosion of lay ministries" cited by Thomas O'Meara, O.P. (Theology of Ministry, 1983)? What impact on liturgy did lay participation engender? What connections between lay ministry and liturgy await further attention?

Emergent Liturgical Lay Ministries. In the minds of countless lay adults following Vatican II, leadership in a liturgical role, e.g., as lector or as eucharistic distributor, was first and foremost official. The origination came from the institutional church, from hierarchical figures, official documents and the local pastor. This movement did not originate in the impulse of the laity. Liturgical involvement was often designated by ordained leaders as ministry, including the somewhat cumbersome early title "extraordinary minister of the eucharist."

For decades lay adults had participated in church work—teaching in Catholic colleges and schools and in leadership roles within associations such as the Knights of Columbus and the Daughters of Isabella. But as Bishop John Cummins pointed out at the N.C.C.B.—sponsored Learning to Share Ministry Responsibly Conference in February 1980, these roles were not considered ministry until Vatican II. The movement into ministerializing church work accomplished by lay adults had its origin in the invitation from the church to the laity regarding liturgical functions identified as ministries.

For many lay women and lay men, who are today engaged in a professional ministerial leadership position (as a pastoral associate or hospital chaplain or diocesan director or campus minister), the initial step in that faith journey started when the lay minister held the cup or proclaimed the word as a liturgical minister in a local church setting and perceived self in a new ecclesial role, that of minister.

Liturgical Impact of Lay Participation

The use of Latin and the singular role of the priest and his "back-to-the-people" placement prior to the council encouraged a focus on a transcendent remote God. After the council, the use of the vernacular and the participatory role (individual and corporate) of lay adults, as well as the new placement of the priest, pointed to the assembly, and was, for the most part affirmed by the assembly (See: Notre Dame Study of Catholic Parish Life). Two outcomes of this more inclusive approach were the experience of the community during liturgy and the emergence of collaboration between laity and priests. The assembled people, some of them at least, began to perceive themselves as a participative people rather than a regulated people. Within the worship experience God became immanent within a community that was collaborative.

This communal, liturgical participation eventually unfolded into outreach in two directions. One was a liturgical outreach to those not present. Parishioners who were sick and hospitalized, or elderly and too feeble to attend Mass, began to be perceived as the responsibility of the parish and not only of its priestly leadership. Gradually the needs of those no longer present, including their liturgical needs, were served by lay ministers who were trained and prepared for this new ministerial role within the parish.

Lay participation within eucharistic leadership also became in time outreach toward other sacramental functions. Today it is not uncommon to find significant leadership in baptismal, first eucharist, and confirmation preparatory programs within any inventory of lay ministries. Eulogies at funerals are given by family members. Weddings are planned by the engaged couple. Peer ministry within R.C.I.A. programs is lay. The initial and modest steps taken to include lay adults from the assembly in the leadership of the assembly, gathered for the Sunday eucharistic celebration, has permeated the entire life of the parish including its sacramental life.

In some settings this intertwining of community and collaboration has culminated in lay and clerical collaboration in planning as well as facilitating the central eucharistic celebrations of the week.

The above movements influenced the symbolic meaning of liturgy in a way analogous to the description of spiritual direction cited by Janet Ruffing, S.M., in Uncovering Stories of Faith (N.Y.: Paulist, 1989, p. 50): "The influence of this tradition (spiritual direction) is even more profound than simply a continuity of pastoral praxis. The Christian tradition itself is characteristically narrative in its scriptures, worship, and catechesis. The story-telling that takes place within the spiritual direction conversation is already contextualized within a 'storied' tradition which forms the consciousness of the contemporary storyteller through the shared story of Jesus and salvation history which reaches back into the narratives of the Hebrew scriptures and strains forward through the age of the church to the end times themselves."

The Mass, no longer perceived only as a transcendent opportunity for grace, has rooted many lay believers in their "storied" tradition. The particular story of this particular people gathered to participate in worship in this place has become one with the story embodied in the story of tradition ... from the believing people who far into the past first gathered to worship their one God to the believing people who will in the future witness the apocalypse.

Areas Needing Further Attention

Spirituality. Surprisingly little consideration on local levels has been directed to the relationship between needs of a personal spiritual nature and the communal experience of liturgy. Prior to Vatican II distinctions between popular piety, exercised through devotionals, and the sacramental life of the parish, were understood and acknowledged. Since the council there appears to be a tendency to collapse all lay spiritual needs into the liturgical experience. However, as the 1984 and 1989 National Association for Lay Ministry studies of the spiritual experiences of lay believers reveal, for many lay adults, active in liturgical lay ministries, the spiritual experiences remembered and cited take place beyond the sacramental life of the parish.

One reason for this may be that despite the enormity of liturgical change opportunities are few and far between for lay adults to articulate what is happening to them interiorly during the liturgical experience. In addition, the initial instruction given to lay liturgical ministers has tended to focus on functions (a "how-to-do-it" approach). Without a like focus on meaning and spirituality, an integration of function with the faith life of the lay minister has been neglected.

Lay Preaching. Excluding the issue of the ordination of women and married men, which is beyond the limits of this article, two conflictual issues regarding the laity and liturgy pertain to private confession and lay preaching. The shunning of private confessional practice by the laity continues in a now-regularized fashion.

The issue of lay preaching had champions on both sides within the American hierarchy at the 1989 N.C.C.B. November meeting. Availability of priest personnel determined somewhat the parameters of the argument. By a close vote the American bishops decided against all practice of lay preaching within liturgical celebrations for adults, adhering to distinctions based on gender and ecclesial status rather than on preparation and qualifications.

Interestingly, the shunning of private confession by lay believers and the shunning of lay preaching during liturgy by the American hierarchy represent the only two areas regarding liturgy and lay ministry which have eluded the development of community and limited the collaboration which has increasingly characterized the church in the United States. In all other areas, twenty years of engagement in gradual process has integrated lay believers within the liturgical life and leadership of the local church community.

MINISTRY, TEAM

Team ministry uses the circular, rather than the pyramid model for the sharing of people and their gifts in the service of the church and community. The goal of such a model is the healing and reconciliation of persons and institutions working for change through a process of honest relationships, theological and pastoral training, and openness to being changed by that very process, therefore conversion. It is a mirror of Jesus' own ministry with his apostles.

As Paul looks at Jesus' ministry, he proposes that all Christian serving be grounded in the gifts (charisms) given in baptism for the building up of the body of Christ (1 Cor 3:16; Rom 12:4). Some of these gifts would lead to public ministries gradually producing the bishop-presbyter-deacon model, and the full membership of women in these churches was a cultural breakthrough, both in their positions and their prestige.

The source of ministry, then, was God's living Spirit, but that Spirit as given to all, to the entire church as ambassadors for Christ (2 Corinthians 5). This tradition of ministry as a function of the whole church meeting human need waxed and waned across the centuries, e.g., the 19th century, where the church hid from politico-cultural involvement, and the 20th, when for the first time since Paul we seem ready for a laity-centered church made up of more theologically trained laity than priests or religious. Yet much of the credit for this lay explosion of competence is due to the work of said priests and religious.

Vatican II did the formal spadework for this development in turning away from the scholastic approach to the meaning of priesthood, forging a new definition based on Christ's own ministry as teacher, sanctifier, and leader. So, the priest's presiding at the eucharist, then, becomes not the most important of a priest's activities, but just the chief act of his role as sanctifier. Here the council moved to a theology of ordained ministry basing all ministries on that of Jesus' three-fold role. We are all sent; some hold office, but, yet to be fully developed theologically, is the question of what "holding office" or being ordained means today. Nor was the connection of Jesus as the primordial sacrament and the church as basic sacrament developed fully so that we could see clearly that the fundamental priesthood in the church is that of the church itself. Ordained priesthood, then, is a part of this total priesthood of God's people, a theology of ministry now developing through praxis (as the number of priests diminishes), though incomplete and only partially accepted.

Vatican II's Lumen Gentium (34-36) had stated that the laity "share in the mission of the whole Christian People with respect to the Church and the world." Baptism and confirmation provide the basis for an apostolate of all Christians ordained or not, sharing in Christ's three-fold ministry, with the source of this ministry God/Jesus, and not delegation by pastor, bishop, or pope. But Vatican II named an "essential difference" between ordained and lay ministries; again, however, they gave no theological definition of what this difference consisted in. Again, work for an evolving pastoral practice and theological reflection.

The uneven nature of the theological accomplishment of Vatican II appears, also, in its three-fold approach to Jesus' ministry as "teacher, sanctifier, and leader." It is not scriptural, nor from the early church, nor even the Scholastic period; it is a piece of contemporary theology in its application to present pastoral questions, and like all theologies, culturally conditioned and somewhat adequate for now.

In regard to the present developing models of team ministry, this cultural approach to theologies permits us to ask, as we must (if we adopt the three-fold ministry theory), should we not (to be consistent) ask why the voices of priest, deacon, or lay are not collegially consulted in the exercise of the "teaching" (magisterium) functions of the people of God, a task assigned them by said church?

What, too, does "ordination" or the lack of it actually mean in today's crisis of massive transition in church and society, let alone in theology? If 10% of the parishes in the U.S. today have no resident ordained priest (43% worldwide) how theological, let alone rational, is it to continue a denial game of "substituting," of holding "services" instead of Masses, of consecrating thousands of hosts for distribution to unknown masses in a semi-magical use of the sacrament? Certainly the needs of today's parishes for healing and reconciliation, for ministry, should not be denied them because of an inadequate theology of eucharist or ordination or ministry. God is hardly impotent because we cling to outmoded theories of what God is about.

Facing the facts of a predominantly lay church membership may push us to consider the principles we find operative in team ministry when it is grounded in a theology of the gifts, because it fits the present need to evoke, train, and call out these gifts for the needs of the world.

Looking at one model (Donnelly, 79) we see the recent developments in theology sketched above coming to bear on a theory and practice of said team ministry. The starting point for such a model is that of sharing (koinonia) which implies the community of believers engaged in giving and receiving both their God-given gifts and their human services. This common theology of the gifts calls for a process of building a common understanding or meaning of what such shared serving means: Christians with gifts and limitations pledged to give and receive their presence and gifts for the common good. This theological-spiritual approach to team as the place of conversion is quite different from line and staff organization job descriptions. It implies committing self to learning the art of communication, the life-blood of the team, so that assumptions are exposed and prayerfully dealt with so that all can agree that the Spirit is "chair" of the team; then living out this common theology in practice, supported by weekly team meetings and daily prayer for and with team members for the solidarity that promotes whatever conversion is called for in each life.

Team also implies a shared sociology, learning the dynamics of the entity they strive to be, a group, motivated at this crucial moment of Christian history to be the small base community trying to live out the values of Jesus, empowered by his love. Such an endeavour implies a growing spirituality, empowered by prayerful listening to the Spirit in their own hearts and in the lives of others. This individual spiritual growth then fuels the team spirituality when the group comes together for liturgy, meetings, social life, modeling the apostolic life of Jesus' own team.

For such a team to operate efficiently, some six factors are operative: 1. Consultation: people learn to ASK for advice, help, opinions both within and without the team; 2. Coalition: they ally themselves with like-goaled groups in their pastoral ministry, especially in ecumenical and inter-religious issues; 3. Organization: they study and practice sound structural group techniques; 4. Referral: they learn to limit their scope according to their gifts and goals, avoiding over-extension and Messiah complexes; 5. Representation: of the team, by and for the team (and of those they serve) on the team; 6. Participation: sharing in responsibility for roles and resources; in decision-making on decided levels; in rewards and sufferings.

These six marks of team spell out the meaning of a theology of sharing; the shape of service is circular because it disperses power and concentrates on human development; it demands daily listening to the Spirit. Certain elements are needed for such sharing to happen, some measuring rods for membership: a shared sense of belonging; all are taken seriously, even women members! Shared achievement as contributing to the ministry of all, along with deep respect for human difference as God's way to break through the isolation and the sharing of ideas and feelings openly fueled by theological reflection and prayer. Lastly, what ensures the circular, equal functioning of the team and prevents it from becoming a patriarchal pyramid: the element of accountability. Members feel committed to the team and freely accept responsibilities for the team. No one is unaccountable; chairpersons are elected by the team for a fixed period of time; no one has life-tenure in any office or position. Conflict-resolution and consensus are constantly employed. The team works at the fulfillment of Lumen Gentium's two aspects of ministry here: teaching and sanctifying.

The third area the council highlighted for priestly (and Christian) spirituality and ministry was that of leadership. The team can act as corporate pastor, a role seemingly dictated by the present crisis in priestly vocations, but its leadership is also corporate; no individual is encouraged to shape the team into a pyramid of sole control, decision-making, or unaccountability. The movement is from a purely sociological definition of leadership: "exercising influence in a group in a given situation through communication"—to: leadership (as sharing) is "exercising influence multiplied incredibly by the Spirit in the community through presence and ministry." This is mutual leadership; it takes turns moving around the group through corporate listening and the individual listening of members through prayer.

Contemporary team ministry is often labeled "collaborative ministry," stressing both the lay-clergy and the man-woman aspects of such sharing. If this means re-emphasizing "laity" as some distinct theological or canonical entity, it may reverse the achievement of the corporate leadership team demands as does the gospel model we find in Jesus' values of justice and love. As we have seen above, if the church has one ministry with people functioning in various ways and times, then the distinction between clergy and laity needs careful re-examination; it is not scriptural nor is it viable theological theory for today's historical moment. The role called "priest" is moving to the periphery of both church and society; historically, the Spirit, faithful to the church, helps us supply and develop persons and means to replace whatever functions that role fulfilled in the body of Christ. So, also, the term/role "laity." It no longer carries a valid theological charge, and throws no light on the contemporary situation of Christian community. All baptized Christians are the church and as church need to fulfill its mission. Collegiality and subsidiarity fostered by the council can help today's ordained and unordained to work together to shape an appropriate theology and pastoral practice to fit contemporary needs. Team ministry is one such suggested form.

Another distinction that needs addressing for collaborative/team ministry is that of sexual difference. The team model of equality in access to the use and sharing of one's gifts, to offices, decision-making and accountability is a fine example to society of how men and women could function in corporate endeavors where the gifts are the criterion of operation and position, not one's sex, as Paul so heartily wished: "...neither male nor female for you are all one in Christ Jesus (Gal 3:28). The team model might be a way of stopping the great draining away of female church members, especially the younger women, who find themselves accepted and valued more adequately in the culture than in their Christian churches.

Even more delightful is the modeling the team unit can do for the total church, for the Vatican itself. As the team strives to carry out teaching, sanctifying, and leading in the light of Vatican II, it provides what sound theological theory always demands: working pastoral models that exemplify and incorporate gospel principles in meaningful ways. Whether teams work as social change agents or as targets of their own need for conversion, they supply a social form in which the gospel can be lived, spirituality can be nourished, and the neighbor served in a theology-praxis of sharing.

MINISTRY, WOMEN IN

Preliminary Observations

It is appropriate that an essay on women in ministry begin with a reflection on its inclusion in a dictionary of sacramental worship. In earlier decades, the strict definitional boundaries of both "sacrament" and "ministry" would have precluded even the consideration of such a topic. Therefore, its inclusion here speaks to the distance journeyed in the understandings of women, of ministry, and of worship.

The specificity of its inclusion at the same time identifies the distance yet to be travelled, insofar as it reveals fundamental attitudes toward and the status and acceptance of women at this point in history.

"Women in ministry," offered as a special topic implies that the concept is somehow novel or atypical. "Men in ministry," a topic not included in this volume, is, by implication, normative. Other categories for ministry in this volume (lay ministries and team ministries) also point to evolution as regards the notion of ministry in the church. Rather than be taken as a criticism, these observations are meant to move the reader in the direction of understanding some of the complexities that mark a contemporary consideration of this issue.

Recognizing that other scholars have devoted volumes to tracing the impact of women in a variety of ministerial positions over the centuries and to considering their place in history (see Hellwig, 1985), it is the intent of this essay to address the issues that underlie our contemporary understandings and struggles with the concept of "women in ministry."

Historical Considerations

From the time of Jesus, the participation of women in the public life of Jesus and his church has been documented. The gospel accounts are replete with references to those women who ministered to Jesus, who were delegated to announce the "good news," and who gave silent witness to his agonies.

Paul in his letters and Luke in the Acts also note the activity of the women in the early Christian community. Both the influence they exerted and the respect they received attest to the unquestioned role accorded to the women who ministered to the early community.

Since that time, and up to the present, the role of women in public ministry has waxed and waned. Little has appeared in our traditional histories and accounts, and this may be seen as mirroring the larger culture where the activities, contributions and accomplishments of women have tended to be ignored or, at the very least, downplayed. The focus of religious histories has commonly been upon affairs of the institutional churches precisely as institutions. The systematic exclusion of women from ordination and from positions of institutional authority guarantees that in these histories we read little or nothing about women.

The Face of Women in Ministry: Structural Implications

While neither ignoring the pain women have experienced as a result of their exclusion from many church structures nor affirming nor condoning the blatant sexism and sometimes subtle misogyny that have marked our church practices and structures, reflection on the consequences of that reality leads to some interesting observations. Having experienced exclusion from ministry in a hierarchical structure, gifted women have shaped alternative means to minister to the body of Christ and once again to be Christ on this earth. Horizontal leadership based on mutual support, inspiration, and the convening of community marked the public ministry of many. Given their exclusion from institutional politics, other women were free to opt for a more prophetic style of public ministry than is usually possible for those who must accept the limits of conventional roles and institutional approbation. Finally, for reasons already mentioned, and often precisely because of their position, women were often better able to notice and to attend to that which was left undone and to those who were overlooked, omitted, or excluded in the pastoral practice of the institutional church. Monika Hellwig observed that, in such instances, the impact of women in public ministry has tended to be prophetic, radical in its implications for the social structures of society in the long run, and, in terms of the social dynamics, a movement from below.

The Face of Women in Ministry: Psychological Issues

A key factor influencing the concept of women in ministry is to be found in the reality that the authentic involvement of women in ministry brings to ministry a potentially counter-cultural aspect. To better understand this, Anne Wilson-Schaefer's identification of two operative "systems" in our culture is helpful. The first of these is the "dominant" system, typically characterized by current male-oriented values. The second is an "emerging" system, marked by what has been traditionally characterized as a feminine style. The shift that is currently occurring is in the increased identification and acceptance of the emerging system. In this process, women and men are experiencing an enhancement of many previously non-valued styles of thinking and interacting and are exploring the implications of these shifts in both their personal and professional lives.

This transformation has major implications for an understanding of ministry. To begin, it affects how the notion of ministry itself is defined and integrated into the life of the minister. Traditionally reflective of the dominant system, ministry and work were seen as fairly synonymous. John Futrell, for example, in writing on The Challenge of Ministry, describes ministries as "human services performed in response to the human needs of people." In the emerging system, relationships rather than work are seen as core or focal, and everything must go through, relate to, and be defined by relationships. Hence, ministry is construed in terms of relationship. It becomes that which one does with one's life in order to make sense of other aspects of one's life. Neither profit- nor power-oriented, ministry takes its meaning from creativity, from bonding, from its inherent humanness touched by the reality of the incarnation, and from a keen sense of service. Ministry is, in the emerging system, an expression of one's relationship with God, with others, and with oneself.

Other aspects to be considered in light of this shift in world view and in terms of their impact on the notion of ministry include structure, power, healing and various understandings of God and spirituality.

The structure of the dominant system is hierarchical, with no ambiguity as regards accountability or control. God is superior to man is superior to woman is superior to child is superior to animal is superior to plant is superior to things inanimate. Boundaries are clear, and dichotomous (either/or) thinking abounds. Ministry is something "done to" others, with the minister clearly in a superior stance as the one who imparts (grace, benefits, etc.).

The emerging system has a less clearly defined structure. Boundaries are fairly permeable, categories are less clear, and structures are more easily flexed to address the needs of all. "Neatness" is not a hallmark of such a system. Ministry in this context is a shared experience, which reverences varied needs of individuals. While roles are defined, there is a giving/receiving dynamic that is consonant with the emphasis on relationship mentioned above.

Power is another critical concept. Jean Baker Miller defines power as "the capacity to implement." As such, power has two components: power for oneself, and power over others. With this in mind, the dominant system has traditionally seen the power of another person or group of persons to be dangerous: you control them, or they control you. This is based, in part, on the assumption that power is a "zero-sum" entity; there is just so much power available. (If, for example, the amount of available power is 20 units, one's having 12 leaves only 8 units available to others.) The dominant system, therefore, jealously guards power and sets deliberate limits as regards its use.

The emerging system provides another consideration of power. Here, power, like love, is assumed to be limitless. When shared, it regenerates and expands. Women and men need power to grow and develop, but the greater the development of each individual, the more able, more effective, and less in need of limiting or restricting others she or he will be.

Because of their place in the structure of the dominant system, many women have marked difficulty in coping with and appropriating power. Given their limited understandings, many have used power in the style of the dominant system.

Others, fearful of such an outcome or distrustful of their own giftedness, have abrogated any power that is even rightfully theirs. Distortions of spirituality, where humility has become equated with actively avoiding the recognition of one's or others' gifts and talents, also has discouraged individuals from appropriating that which is their God-given heritage. Interestingly, references to the Spirit of God often reflect a gender difference that may be an indication of this even deeper power issue as women refer to the "Spirit of love" and men invoke the "power of the Spirit."

There is another aspect to be considered in terms of power and the role of women in ministry. It comes in terms of weakness, or powerlessness. For women, weaknesses are typically seen in terms of vulnerability, helplessness, and neediness. The dominant system encourages men to abhor these feelings in themselves while it has encouraged women to cultivate this state of being. In reality, however, these feelings are common to all. Those who are typically better able consciously to admit to and tolerate these feelings have a ministerial "edge" in this regard as this ability puts them more closely in touch with basic life experiences. Having to defend less and deny less, they are in a position to understand and minister to weakness. As persons more comfortable with their own weakness, they are more readily able to illumine the path to wholeness for others.

As might be expected, "healing" in the dominant system is something done by the healer, who is "certified" by the system. Failure in the treatment is most typically construed in terms of some deficit of the patient. Linear logic marks the thought construction of this system. In contrast, the emerging system views "healing" as a process that occurs within a person with the facilitation and help from the healer. The relationship between healer and patient is a key factor. Translating this understanding to the terms of ministry, it is easy to understand the existence of tensions in the church as regards the determination of who, for example, is "legitimately" minister to a community and how that role/relationship is expressed.

In the dominant system, understandings of God and spirituality parallel the schema already outlined. The structure of most theological assumptions is a dominance-submission scheme. With the perpetuation of the belief that the suffering servant is the holiest of all, women and others found "lower" in the order of things have been encouraged to be suffering servants, thus achieving absolution for their status. God, the "prototype" of perfection of this system, is perfect, all-knowing, and unchanging. The role of the minister is to mediate between God and those lower in the hierarchy so that salvation might be accomplished.

The emerging system's view of God also parallels that system. Here, God is viewed primarily in terms of relationship and, therefore, as is true with relationship, subject to growth and change. Coming to know God is imaged as a deepening and broadening process rather than one of climbing a ladder. Boundaries between the "sacred" and the "secular," between what is "holy" and what is "profane," are less rigid and apt to be informed by the lived experience of those who come to worship. The role of minister, here, is to facilitate that identification process and to enable the community to encounter the holy in this way.

New/Old Directions

What is it that marks the movement that is publicly acknowledging and incorporating women in ministry? While some might describe it as "tokenism," or a long overdue acknowledgement of the real contribution made by women, there also seems to be a subtle yet discernible shift in the understanding of what ministry involves. The affirmation of the emerging (female) system described in the previous section attests to this. The shift might also be interpreted as the acknowledgement that the "works" or activities of women in public ministry, different as they have been from traditional or formally "sanctioned" works, are not only true expressions of ministry, but by the accompanying acceptance of this reality, are activities that are to be embraced by all in the church.

The image that best expresses one of the greatest contributions that women have to offer to the emerging understanding of what it means to be a public minister in the church may be found in that of pregnancy. For centuries, the male model of potency, impact, and discharge has dominated the cultural image of ministry. Filling empty churches, establishing flourishing programs, and erecting tangible structures were frequently the measures of effective ministry. The emergence of the "women's movement," particularly in the United States, has brought with it some alternative approaches to these familiar activities of ministry. In contrast to the male style, the image of pregnancy depicts attitudes of trust, surrender, and receptivity. The pregnant one is intimately connected to the new life within, yet is not in total control of either the ultimate outcome or many aspects of the process. She does not, for example, determine that on this day "we will work on the nervous system" and that at another time "we will develop fingers and toes." Yet, the one who is pregnant cannot help but be mindful of the new life within and must direct a significant portion of consciousness toward its nurturance. She continues in the faith that development is proceeding as it should and is in keeping with a thrust toward health and wholeness. While often finding herself in a stance of reverent reflection, she is an active participant in the process of forming this new life. At no point is the pregnant one a passive observer.

The shift in the culture's attitude toward pregnancy also provides a fitting metaphor for the new understandings of the role and influence of women in ministry. It is not long ago that pregnancy and all it entails was marked by embarrassment, seclusion, and disfavor. Euphemistically referred to as being "in seclusion," women were typically excluded from the public eye. Only in recent years have pregnant women been "allowed" to continue and experience acceptance in "public" roles. The condition of pregnancy no longer needs to be hidden. Hence, there appears an increasing readiness to acknowledge the value of the lessons of pregnancy: that experience of actively waiting, in hope and in faith, with participation in the process, surrender to the mystery, and commitment to its product. Such might be wholesome attitudes to inform those who are committed to ministry in this age of transformation.

MUSIC MINISTRIES

Musicians play an essential role in the work of God within the assembled people that is the liturgy. Many great composers like Franz Josef Haydn and Franz Schubert received their primary musical training as members of a church choir or ensemble. The creations of musicians within worship situations have stirred the human psyche to prayer since the dawn of history. Music, evanescent as wind, touches the heart like few other arts. The church since Vatican II has viewed music as so much a part of the fabric of worship that if it is bad or inappropriate, it tears at the very soul of the rite, interrupts prayerful communication, and diverts attention from the mysteries being celebrated. Bad music distracts from worship as much as a torn, garish chasuble might.

Thus the term music ministry has validity in that it denotes a service publicly designated by the church to assist in the fulfillment of the active participation of the people and presider within the ritual act. The ministry of music, even in its general understanding as a ministry of the non-ordained, proclaims the gospel, celebrates the sacraments, stirs the faithful to witness and serve Christ within his people (see Catholicism, by Richard P. McBrien, [Winston Press, Minneapolis, 1981], p. 808).

Liturgical scholars have declared that "musical liturgy is normative" (John Gallen, S.J., National Association of Pastoral Musicians, Spring, 1978). A Mass without music, indeed any liturgy of the word without sung psalms and acclamations, lacks something intrinsic to the very idea of ritual celebration. Music is a cultural expression of a given community, with all its identifiable characteristics. It goes to the heart of what liturgy accomplishes—that the worshippers express their own style of singing praise to God.

Musical ministry began with the psalm-singing in the synagogues of the first Christians. Much later, after the conversion of western Europe, largely through the efforts of traveling Irish monks like St. Columban and his disciple, St. Gall (A.D. 900), music appeared in the form we now call "Gregorian chant." After the invention of the musical staff and notation, the newly built cathedrals of France echoed with the splendid variation of melody over the chant bass, that we now term "polyphony." By the time Netherlander masters came to compose their brilliant and complex Masses in the late 15th century for presentation in Italian Renaissance court chapels, liturgical singing became the realm of clerical experts. The unlettered people were left to roam in silence through the sacred spaces. The vernacular languages they spoke removed them further from the increasingly mysterious world of ritual music (even in pure Latin).

This gave way to insistent demands of the Protestant Reformers like Luther, and later Wesley in England, to re-incorporate popular styles of singing and vernacular hymns into liturgy. It remained for Pope St. Pius X to make the breakthrough for Roman Catholics in his motu proprio on the feast of St. Cecilia (1903). He called for singing within liturgy to be restored to the use of the worshipping people "so that they may take a more active part in the offices, as they did in former times." Sixty years later, almost to the day, the Second Vatican Council restored vernacular song to the liturgy (S.C., 112-121).

The common thread in the history of service to worship by musicians is to support the people in prayer. The primary role of all those involved, from composers and publishers to the parish music director, choir member, cantors and celebrant centers on getting the assembly to respond with one voice in proclaiming God's word and work.

The roles of the music ministry vary as widely as the talents of the musicians called to pray with song and music within the assembly. Thus one could list: composers, without whom there could be no sung prayer; performing musicians would include the choir of men, women, and young people, whose voices are united by the parish music director, organist and instrumentalists; closer to the altar one finds the cantor and the celebrant; but the greatest performing music ministry is found right within the congregation itself!

The parish music director usually is a paid professional who has the experience as well as the knowledge of the reformed Catholic rites. Usually this person conducts the choir of parishioners of differing abilities, perhaps supplemented with professional singers. The task of the director is to instill in the choir a knowledge of the repertory of church music—some classical, even Latin chant and polyphony. Certainly newer material that befits the vernacularized liturgy is selected as well. This person of competence will exercise good judgment in selecting music and hymns that are good artistically, suited to the rite being celebrated, and fitting in with the pastoral needs of the assembly that gathers to worship.

The cantor with the choir play the most important role in animating the music for liturgy. The French word used for the ministry of cantor is animateur. The role is filled by a trained solo voice of any range who will lead the singing of responsorial psalms and acclamations. The cantor may also guide the congregation in the singing of hymns, though many places prefer to have a "leader of song" do this. The primary role of choir in aiding and encouraging people to sing cannot be emphasized enough. A trained organist, with an adequate choir, can produce vibrant hymn singing within worship.

Likewise, the organist and other instrumentalists also play an important, though subordinate role in music ministry. With the reformed Order of Mass there is simply less time for instrumental interludes and solo pieces within the liturgy. Virtuoso playing may be done before and after the liturgy, but generally speaking, talented instrumentalists are called on to be humble servants of choral and congregation singing.

The liturgical decrees of Vatican II make it clear that both the celebrant (presider) and the congregation have roles to fill in the ministry of music. Some priests conveniently forget that they are not freed of the duty of singing "ministerial chants," such as the prayers, prefaces, lead-ins to eucharistic acclamations, as well as the occasional singing of the eucharistic prayer itself. People who come to worship understand today that their song is an inherent right of baptized members that enables them to enter into the paschal mystery. "You are a royal priesthood," the first letter of Peter tells God's people, and therefore their united voice is a vital part of all worship. Thus the only way to get a real feeling of joy into the Sunday assembly is through the linking up of the various solo, choral and congregational voices, supported in full-throated singing by gloriously played musical instruments. This is music ministry in its fullness.

To insure that every parish has musical liturgy, it is important to see that the music director have a hand in all groups and persons that sing at the Mass, whether the repertory is folk-oriented, popular or more traditional music. The pastor and his council ought to insure that they have the right person as music director for their parish. But while they are to consult him or her in a pastoral way regarding the direction of the individual season liturgies, there must be an element of trust given to the ministers of music by the pastoral council. Choirs of any type can become too independent, providing music that is more listened to than joined in with. The parish music minister ought to have a degree in music from a college or conservatory, so that the requisite esthetic judgment will prevail in the matter of repertory and quality of performance. Music ought to be beautiful in the rites.

There should be a balance of music within the reformed rite. With the differentiation of roles within the liturgical action, a kind of symphonic movement is achieved between and among the various soloists, the choir, the assembly and the instrumentalists. "Symphonic" here is used in its root meaning of "consonance of sound," or a gathering of varying voices and sounds into a unified whole. Liturgical aptness is an important judgment to be made by the parish music director. Music that ties one part of the Mass to the other, with proclamations, acclamations, psalms, hymns and prayers, has to be carefully chosen by the competent music minister.

The pastoral judgment of what kind or quality of music works best in a particular congregation falls to the music minister. Obviously this will have a consultative function among all the music ministers. It falls to the professional music minister, however, to see that preference is not generally given to what is popular over what is good art in the unfortunate least-common-denominator approach that all too often infects liturgical music in our times.

In the 1982 statement of the American Bishops' Committee on Liturgy, "Music in Catholic Worship," it is stated: "Each Christian must keep in mind that to live and worship in community often demands a personal sacrifice. Everyone must be willing to share likes and dislikes with those whose ideas and experiences may be quite unlike his or her own" (M.C.W., 17). As long as each minister of music keeps that desire to attain a beautiful and moving experience of liturgy, all can work together to make "a joyful noise unto the Lord!" This is after all the fundamental motive for being involved with music ministry. That achievement of creating beautiful sounds within the communal celebration is at the heart of what it means to "make music" within celebration.

EDWARD J. MCKENNA

MUSIC, LITURGICAL

Clarification of Terms

Various terms have emerged over the centuries for designating the music employed in the church's worship. The most common of these are: church music, liturgical music, religious music and sacred music. Though often used interchangeably these terms are not synonymous. The ancient designation church music (musica ecclesiastica) has come to denote virtually any music employed within worship during the history of the Christian churches. Thus it is a phrase which frequently appears in titles of general introductions to the topic or historical works such as K. Fellerer's The History of Catholic Church Music (Baltimore, 1961). Liturgical music (musica liturgica) is a more recent formulation, infrequently employed in the literature before this century, which came to prominence in the 1960s as a specific term for music integral to the reformed liturgy of the Roman Catholic church after the Second Vatican Council. As the preferred term in the United States today it was incorporated into the title of the most recent episcopal document on the topic, Liturgical Music Today (1982). Religious music (musica religiosa) currently serves as a popular label for any music that is perceived to have an explicit or implicit religious theme, be that Christian rock, Hindu chants or Afro-American spirituals. Sacred music (musica sacra) is at once the preferred term in universal documents of the Roman Catholic church for music composed for "the celebration of divine worship" (Musica sacra [1967], n. 4a) yet in common usage is a generic term for religious music, especially that which is considered art music such as J.S. Bach's St. John Passion (1724).

Gelineau (1964) attempted to develop a taxonomy of definitions largely based upon distinctions found in existing ecclesiastical legislation, especially in the instruction De musica sacra (1958). He considered religious music the broadest term, denoting "all music which expresses religious sentiment but which is not designated for use in the liturgy." More narrowly defined is sacred music which "by its inspiration, purpose and destination, or manner of use has a connection with faith." Liturgical music is more specifically that "which the Church admits, both in law and in practice, to the celebration of her official and public worship." It is Gelineau's emphasis on liturgical music as music of the liturgy and not merely occurring in the liturgy which is pivotal for an adequate understanding of this term today. In view of this emphasis liturgical music can be defined as that music which weds itself to the liturgical action, serves to reveal the full significance of the rite and, in turn, derives its full meaning from the liturgy. The ability of this term to emphasize the fundamental link between music and the liturgy recommends its usage and highlights the ambiguity of the more generic term, sacred music.

Historical Perspective

Though a significant number of historical works have been published they are for the most part histories of church music, i.e., chronologies of the music itself. The history of liturgical music, however, is the story of the interplay of the music with the rites. It requires not only an accurate chronology of musical composition but also attentiveness to: 1) the shape and implied theology of the worship which was the context for such music; 2) the physical setting for this worship; and 3) the role of the specialized musicians, ministers and assembly who enacted this worship. Corbin's work (1960) continues to be one of the best examples of such writing.

Ancient Jewish Worship. Since Judaism, like many ancient civilizations, did not make a clear distinction between singing and speaking, it is not possible to discuss music as an isolated element in their worship. The proclamatory nature of public reading, praying and preaching presumed rhythmic and melodic features which migrated toward song. Though clearly designated musicians existed in the worship of the temple, it would be misleading to limit a consideration of ancient Jewish liturgical music to a discussion of their performance. To the extent that there was audible ritual in Judaism so did that ritual possess a distinguishable lyricism.

Jewish cult was enacted in three important centers at the time of Jesus: the temple in Jerusalem, the various synagogues which arose in virtually every place that there was a Jewish community and the homes of the believers. The temple had a large staff of professional musicians drawn from the tribe of Levi. It was the musician-king David who is remembered as having appointed some of the Levites as temple musicians (1 Chr 25:1). A Levitical choir of at least twelve adult male singers and an orchestra composed of a similar number of instrumentalists served in the temple built by Herod. The psalms as well as various other poetic texts from the Bible were sung during the sacrifices which characterized this worship. The official musicians were the dominant musical force in temple worship and the people's musical participation was normally limited to the repetition of refrains. In this hierarchical institution there was a marked degree of professionalism in the worship music which tended toward art music (Werner, p. 149).

The great difference between the rituals of the temple and those of the synagogue made for similar differences in their ritual music. As a lay organization without sacrifice, the synagogue was a place where the word was studied and proclaimed and prayers were offered. The performance of this word-centered worship continuously migrated back and forth between what we would call heightened speech and song. Central in this worship at the time of Jesus was the proclamation of the Shema, probably by the whole assembly, and the chanting of the Amidah or Eighteen Benedictions by a prayer leader with responses by the assembly. Readings from the law and the prophets were also cantillated as part of this worship. There was no preappointed presider for this worship and the music-prayer leadership was taken up by various members of the congregation at the invitation of the president(s) (archisynagogos/oi) of the synagogue as in Acts 13:15. After the destruction of the temple professional's assumed a larger leadership role in synagogue worship. It was through their influence that the art music of Jewish cantors eventually developed. Initially, however, the musical elements of this worship were word-centered, a cappella, tending toward folk-song (Werner, p. 150). A similar musical style marked the various home rituals that were a central part of the Jewish worship life.

Emerging Christianity. Although early followers of Jesus continued to frequent the temple (Acts 3:1) and synagogues (Acts 13:14), it was especially in the homes of believers that a distinctive Christian cult emerged. Despite the pluralism of worship forms in emerging Christianity some elements were common. These included meal rituals, public narrations of the Jesus story, preaching, readings from letters, prayers and songs. The idealized image of an early community in Acts 2:42 presumes some of these elements. As with Jewish worship of the period it is both difficult and anachronistic to attempt hard and fast distinctions between musical and non-musical elements in early Christian worship. To the extent that any worship element included public vocalization so to the same extent did it presume what we would consider a certain degree of musicality.

Aside from the general lyricism of this emerging cult, there are some specific elements in which a marked degree of musicality is identifiable. The NT, for example, contains many remnants of what Deichgräber (1967) calls short praise-passages (Rom 16:27), God-hymns (1 Pet 1:3-5), and christological hymns (Phil 2:6-11). Furthermore, a variety of lyric fragments ("Marana tha"), ejaculations ("Hosanna") and other musical allusions (e.g., Revelation 4) punctuate the NT.

It is clear that the music-prayer style of the synagogue more than that of the temple influenced emerging Christian worship. Given what we know about music-prayer leadership in the synagogue at the time of Jesus (see J. Heinemann, Prayer in the Talmud [Berlin, 1977], 104-111), as well as Paul's instruction on public prayer for the Gentile community (e.g., 1 Cor 14:13-19), it is possible to suggest that early Christian "music" was prone to support and serve the word in its proclamation or elaboration and engage the community in what we might consider a relatively democratic form of lyric worship. Musical elements were vocal not instrumental, amateur not professional, and integrated not separate parts of the worship. Though some solo and even professional musical contributions occurred within the worship, they did not dominate the musical language of primitive Christian prayer. Lyricism like the other aspects of the Christian life was shaped for the common good. The integration of music and liturgy is similar to the integration of liturgy and life in this era (see F. Hahn, The Worship of the Early Church [Philadelphia, 1973], 32-39).

2nd-3rd Centuries. There was unmistakable continuity between these centuries and the previous period and it is not possible to distinguish music as a separate liturgical component in the Christian worship of this time. The influence of synagogal worship persisted with an emphasis on unaccompanied vocalization. This vocal lyricism pervaded the proclamation of readings, the articulation of improvised prayers and the communal responses which marked the relatively intimate worship of Christians in the house churches of this period. Parallel to this vocal emphasis was a growing objection to the employment of instruments in any part of the Christian life including worship. The virtually unanimous objection to instrumental music seems to have been more a matter of morality than liturgy (McKinnon, p. 260). The writers of this period considered instruments to be associated with sexual immorality, evil in themselves and, therefore, inappropriate for any use by Christians.

Besides continuity with the sounds and spirit of synagogue worship, Christians in this period also began to develop distinctive and distinguishable musical texts and forms. As there is general agreement that the Pauline admonition to sing psalms (Col 3:16) cannot be accepted as proof that biblical psalms were an ordinary part of Christian prayer, it is not until the late 2nd and early 3rd centuries that we have the first clear evidence that such were actually employed in Christian worship (Acta Pauli 7.10; Tertullian, De Anima 9.4). Some suggest that the psalter became a book of liturgical song in the Christian community only when the church returned to the Bible at the end of the 2nd century as a way of rejecting freely composed, heterodox hymns (B. Fischer, "Le Christ dans les psaumes," La Maison-Dieu 27 [1951]:88). Besides biblical psalms, newly composed non-biblical psalms or psalmi idiotēci began to appear, such as the Odes of Solomon. Christian hymns in the more narrowly defined sense of newly composed works of poetry not in imitation of biblical prose, shaped into symmetrical stanzas of two or more lines, also arose at this time (e.g., Clement of Alexandria, Ante-Nicene Fathers 2.296). The earliest Christian hymn with music, Oxyrhynchus papyrus 1786, dates from this period (c. A.D. 300).

Despite evidence for the existence of many ministries there is no specific mention of a cantor, psalmist or singer in the Christian literature of this period. Although solo singing did exist in early Christian worship (Tertullian, Apologeticum 39.18), it does not appear to have yet been institutionalized and was certainly not the norm. Musical-liturgical leadership was more probably focused on engaging the community in sung prayer. Generally speaking, the whole of worship seems to have been lyrical and to the extent that this worship belonged to the entire assembly so did the music belong to them.

4th-7th Centuries. With the political triumph of Constantine in A.D. 312, the subsequent legalization and imperial adoption of Christianity, its worship and music underwent a significant transformation. Because of Constantine's conversion, Christianity rapidly changed from a church of the martyrs to an imperial church. Christian worship dramatically changed as well. No longer the prayer of an illegal, extended family gathered in house churches, Christian liturgy became the public prayer of Roman society, enacted in large basilicas, richly appointed, and performed by a growing class of professional clerics. The music underwent comparable changes.

It is from the 4th century that we have the first evidence of specially designated and commissioned cantors (Canons of Laodicea, c. A.D., 343/381 n. 15). In the following centuries the forerunner of a special school for liturgical singers (schola cantorum), traditionally associated with Gregory the Great (d. 604), seems to have developed in Rome, though the origins of this school are very obscure and Gregory's role in the same is dubious. This period also offers the first clear evidence of choirs of boys (Itinerarium Egeriae, c. A.D. 383, n. 24.5) and women (Quasten, pp. 75-87) in orthodox worship. Originally such musical specialists engaged the community in sung praise and embellished the liturgy with their art. With the decline in adult baptism and baptismal fervor which marked the worship of an earlier age, the physical and spiritual distancing of the people from the center of the cult, and the spread of Latin worship in the West to people who no longer understood the language, the specialists who led the music eventually became the specialists who performed all of the music. As specialists took over the music, women were excluded from it (e.g., Council of Auxerre, A.D. 561/605 can. 9) and by the early Middle Ages women singers disappeared from public worship in the West, while the singing of boys continued to be cultivated in the monasteries. Throughout these developments the music continued to be a vocal, word-centered art.

The growth of distinctive Christian music which began in the 2nd and 3rd centuries flourished along with Christianity in the 4th century. Christian hymnody as a specific musical genre received new impetus especially through the work of Hilary (d. 367) and Ambrose (d. 397) in the West and Ephraim (d. 373) in the East. Despite various prohibitions against employing non-biblical texts in worship (e.g. First Council of Braga, A.D. 563, can. 12), hymnody grew in popularity and found a special place in the liturgy of the hours.

The establishment of important ecclesiastical centers during this period such as Benevento, Constantinople, Milan, Metz, Rome, and Toledo influenced the shaping of new families of liturgical plainsong. From these there developed Ambrosian, Beneventan, Gallican, Greco-Byzantine, Gregorian, Mozarabic, and Old Roman chant. Though the sources for studying such plainsong date from a latter era and a consensus on the origins and relationship of these various families of chant does not exist (see the overview in G. Cattin, Music of the Middle Ages I [Cambridge, 1984], 21-47), this chant does testify to an expanding body of identifiable Christian music throughout the East and the West. The development of such music points to the growing complexity of Christian worship, the developing alliance between Christian liturgy and what a later age will call the fine arts, and the increased demand for professional performance. Liturgical chant, performed by liturgical specialists, is virtually the only Western music to survive from this era.

Although the beginning of this period shared the same auditory environment as the ancient world in which there was no clear distinction between music and speech, such had changed by the end of this period. Not only was there a new body of professional liturgical music, but there was a clear distinction between sung and spoken worship. The ability to make this distinction allowed for the eventual development of music-less worship in which prayer and song texts were inaudibly recited by the presider. The silent recitation of the canon appeared in the 8th century and became a fixed practice in the North by the 9th century (Ordo Romanus 5.58). Hereafter music could clearly be considered a separate element of the rite.

8th-11th Centuries. Constantine's establishment of a new capital at Constantinople in A.D. 330 and the subsequent shift of power to the East foreshadowed the political decline of Rome in the Early Middle Ages. Weakened by internal corruption and the barbarian invasions, Roman civil government collapsed at the end of the 5th century. Though the ecclesiastical government remained strong, its influential ties with the emperor dissolved. The dissolution of this union which had produced the Roman liturgy prepared the way for a new political and liturgical partnership with the Frankish kingdoms. Under the leadership of Pepin III (d. 768) and his son Charlemagne (d. 814), the Roman liturgy and its chants were mandated throughout the Frankish kingdoms (Admonitio Generalis, A.D. 789, n. 80). This necessitated both the importation of liturgical books as well as cantors from Rome who could teach the chants in this pre-notation period. As a result both the Roman liturgy and its chants underwent significant transformation. Musically this meant the fusion of imported Roman plainsong with local Gallican chants. According to one well-accepted theory, Gregorian chant is the result of this encounter (H. Huckle, "Toward a new historical view of Gregorian Chant," JAMS 33 [1980]: 437-467).

Though important cathedral centers existed in the Frankish regions, this musical-liturgical transformation was especially centered in the monasteries. These were likewise instrumental in the development of a new architecture (Romanesque) whose tunnel vaulting was ideal for plainchant (K. Conant, Carolingian and Romanesque Architecture, 2nd ed. [Middlesex, 1978], p. 148). It was also in these monastic centers of professional liturgists and musicians that means for recording and notating music developed. Until this time memorization was the only way to learn a chant, for "Unless sounds are remembered by man they perish because they cannot be written down" (Isidore of Seville, Etymologiae effective system of signs (neumes) was developed to aid the singer in recalling a chant and by the mid-11th century the system was so accurate that music could be learned from a page and not from another person. In some respects this development was antithetical to the auditory environment of primitive Christianity, for now this singular act of orality (music) became wedded to a visual symbol system.

With the codification and gradual standardization of the chant repertoire in the West the professionals who dominated the liturgy and its music sought new outlets for their creativity. Novel forms such as the sequence and the trope developed in the 9th and 10th centuries as textual and/or musical elaborations of existing chants. The flowering of these two forms epitomized the growing tendency of worship music to develop independently from the worship and to take on a life of its own. Rather than integrating themselves into the liturgical action these innovations served as poetic commentaries and accretions to the rites, contributing to the tendency to elaborate secondary elements of the liturgy.

Parallel to this need for creative outlets among the professionals was the need for new religious songs among the people. These had been a part of Christian worship since its inception. Previously, however, the people's religious songs, performed in the same language as the liturgy, easily found a place in the church's worship which itself was more fluidly defined. With the increasing standardization of the Roman liturgy and its chants, however, especially in countries where Latin was a foreign language, there developed for the first time in Christianity what can be considered non-liturgical, religious song. Such vernacular songs were sometimes employed during Mass (e.g., after the sermon), but were not integral to the rites as were the official chants or recent accretions such as the sequence. More commonly they accompanied pilgrimages and other popular devotions and were sometimes used for religious instruction. Bede (d. 735) reported the existence of vernacular "devotional and religious songs" (Historia Ecclesiastica 4.24) in England where missionaries had established the Roman liturgy (H.E. 1.27) and introduced Roman chant (H.E. 2.20, 4.2). After the imposition of the Roman liturgy and chants under Charlemagne, vernacular religious song developed in the Frankish kingdoms. The Ruf (Germ. "call") and Leise (from "Kyrie eleison") are two early forms of such song dating from at least the 9th century. It is noteworthy that evidence for such vernacular, non-liturgical, religious song comes from those times and places in which the Roman liturgy was imposed on a non-Roman culture.

Finally this era witnessed the birth of polyphony in which two lines of music sound simultaneously. In its earliest form, known as organum, a second line was matched note against note to an original chant line. Though the earliest forms of polyphony presumed simultaneous singing of the same text on parallel pitches, this innovation which dominated Western music in the next period eventually led to a dramatic obscuring of the text. It thus contributed to an ever widening gap between music and the ritual texts. It further reinforced the tendency to surrender Christian worship music to the professionals who were keen to explore musical possibilities that obscured the true nature of the liturgy.

The musical elaboration of some worship during this period was matched by the total disappearance of music from other worship of the time. Mass books which included chant texts as an appendix began to appear. Such books, which developed into the full missal by the 13th century, attested to the growing practice of private Mass during which the priest assumed all the ministries, reducing the chants to silent recitation, (e.g. Udalrici Consuet. Clun., c. A.D. 1083, 2:30). There is evidence that Masses for the dead in the 9th century had no chant texts and apparently originated without music. It is from this period, therefore, that one can first distinguish between a sung Mass (missa cantata) and a read Mass (missa lecta).

12th-15th Centuries. T. Klauser refers to this era as the period of "Dissolution, Elaboration, Reinterpretation, Misinterpretation" (Short History of the Western Liturgy [New York, 1979], p. 94). This unflattering assessment underscores the basic liturgical tendencies of this period and the growing estrangement between the liturgy and its music. From the end of the 11th century, Rome did enact a series of reforms aimed at reasserting its control over the "Romano-Frankish Mass" and imposing its liturgical practice on all of Latin Christianity. During this period, as well, John XXII (d. 1334) issued one of the first authentic papal documents specifically dealing with music, Docta sanctorum patrum (A.D. 1324/5), which challenged the introduction of many contemporary compositional practices into the liturgical music of the day.

Despite any such reforming efforts the new musical directions announced in the previous period developed unimpeded. Most dramatic were the advances in polyphony. Two-part works (organum duplum) gave way to three-part (organum triplum) and four-part (organum quadruplum) works at great centers like Notre Dame. Besides the addition of further musical lines the organa became more florid with the chant performed very slowly in the lower voice while ornate passages were sung in the upper voice(s). What had begun as a simple ornamentation of the plainsong thus came to supercede and obscure the chant which was often reduced to an underlying drone performed on the primitive organs of the period. These melodic developments were matched by rhythmic advances such as the introduction of a repeated rhythmic pattern or mode which served as an important organizing element in 13th-century music. Such composition, marked by a new verticality and rhythmic coherence, found an architectural parallel in the Gothic buildings of the day whose characteristic luminosity was achieved by higher vaulting and undulating buttressing in rhythmic precision. Though much sacred chant was written after 1200, it faded from the musical forefront as did the monasteries which produced it. The musical leadership in polyphonic composition was taken over by the urban cathedrals (R. Crocker, A History of Musical Style [New York, 1986], p. 73) where Gothic architecture also developed and flourished (see. O. Von Simson, The Gothic Cathedral, 3rd ed. [Princeton, 1988]).

Besides organum other musical advancements attested to the growing independence of music from its liturgical origins. The clausula was a polyphonic work based on a chant fragment whose text was usually a single, drawn out word sustained in the lower voice, such as DOMINE from a setting of "Benedicamus Domine." The conductus, a note against note polyphonic work largely based on newly invented melodies with an original text, was the first polyphonic work employed in worship without a melodic or textual link to chant. The motet originated in the 13th century through the addition of a Latin text to the upper voice(s) of the clausula. Eventually a second text (Latin or French) was added. The resulting polytextuality dramatically obscured the text. Originally motet writing was used for the gradual and alleluia in the Mass and in the office responsories. The growing preference for Marian texts soon led to the motet's strong association with vespers. Like the hymns of the past, this new compositional form found a place in the more fluid liturgy of the hours rather than in the Mass.

Early polyphonic composition was confined to the changeable or proper parts of the Mass. Renewed interest in liturgical compositions in the 14th century shifted polyphonic attention to the ordinary (Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus and Agnus Dei). One reason for this new focus on the ordinary was the awareness that a setting of the ordinary could be more useful than a proper which occurred only once a year. It is also possible that the textually stable ordinary appeared to be a more venerable part of the ritual and less open to musical manipulation or expansion. It was only with the growing independence of music from the rite and the need for newer compositional territories that composers felt bold enough to tamper with these most central of chants. This is especially true of the Sanctus which was considered a chant of the people even as late as the 12th century (Hildebert of Lavardin, d. 1133, P.L. 171.1182). The first complete Mass setting by a single composer was La Messe de Notre Dame by Machaut (d. 1377). Machaut and his musical contemporaries became the first composers to achieve fame for their individual achievements: a further indication that music and its creators were assuming a life of their own independent of worship.

Ordinary people continued to develop their own devotional songs and hymns. Vernacular forms such as cantigas in Spain and Portugal, cantiques in France, carols in England, Gleisslerlieder in Germany and laude in Italy flourished. They also moved farther and farther away from the heart of the church's worship. Dwarfed by the Gothic cathedrals, separated by enormous distances from the sanctuary, excluded by worship in a foreign language, relegated to a second class position by the professionals who dominated the liturgy, ordinary people were essentially spectators to the sights and sounds of medieval worship. Their popular musical efforts often found a place in the flourishing devotions of the period and not in official worship.

16th-19th Centuries. Though the various reforms which erupted in the 16th century were not liturgical-musical at their root, the liturgy and music of the period effectively reflected the state of the church and became focal in the ensuing reforms. Convinced of the priesthood of all believers, for example, Martin Luther (d. 1546) shifted musical emphasis away from professional musicians to the congregation by using vernacular hymns and chants. Through his reforms, Luther transformed non-liturgical, religious song into liturgical music, integrating vernacular hymnody once more into the worship. Convinced that "next to the word of God ... music is the greatest gift" (Preface to Rhau's Symphoniae iucundae [Wittenberg, 1538]), Luther believed that returning the music to the people was a way of returning the word of God to the people. In contrast, the Swiss reformer Ulrich Zwingli (d. 1531) considered music to be an essentially secular reality with no place in worship. Though he was the most gifted musically of the Reformers, Zwingli eliminated all music from the churches in Zurich during his lifetime. John Calvin (d. 1564) held the middle ground between Luther and Zwingli. He believed that music could serve the word of God and encourage one to prayer. Though he banned polyphony from worship because it obscured the word and disliked instrumental music because it distracted one from God, Calvin did allow for monophonic singing, especially of the psalms.

Aware of the musical-liturgical abuses which to a large extent had spawned the reform (Concilium Tridentinum [Freiburg, 1901ff] 8:916-924), the Council of Trent emphasized the need for intelligibility and restraint in music (discussion of 10 Sept. 1562). In language reminiscent of John XXII, the 22nd session of the Council (17 Sept. 1562) issued a supplemental decree which banished from church all vocal or instrumental music which contained things "lascivious or impure." This insistence on intelligibility, however, was framed in view of the clergy who understood Latin and not the assembly. A major musical consequence of Trent was an implicit affirmation of a style of composition embodied in the work of Palestrina (d. 1594) who believed that music was to serve the text.

Though Trent did not offer support for vernacular singing during worship, the ancient tradition of popular devotional song fueled by the example of various Reformers contributed to the development of such music within the Catholic church. The first vernacular Catholic hymnal was Michael Vehe's Ein new Gesangbuechlin geystlicher Lieder (1537). Numerous others appeared in various German dioceses of the 16th century. Though these were largely devotional or catechetical hymns, some were integrated into the worship of the day (e.g., after the sermon). The Cantual of Mainz (1605) allowed the substitution of German hymns in place of the proper of the Mass and by the 18th century such hymns were permitted in place of the ordinary of the Mass. This phenomenon, known as the Singmesse, gave the people a new sense of participation though such participation was never fully integrated into the worship and was more music in worship than music of the worship. This musical mixed message was similar to the architectural emergence of the baroque church (e.g., Il Gesù in Rome) which eliminated the choir as an obstacle to the congregation's worship by moving it from the front to the back of the church. Though these buildings were very effective places for preaching and brought the community closer to the altar the people remained spectators and peripheral to the worship. So in the Singmesse did the community come closer to the worship while remaining musically dispensable.

Though the Reformers had emphasized vernacular, monophonic singing, they did not rule out polyphonic or Latin works which flourished in some segments of the reform. Under the influence of baroque secular composition, especially the opera, sacred music of the various traditions underwent a distinctive process of elaboration. Calvinists turned to part settings for the psalter, composers of the English reform wrote polyphonic anthems and settings of the "Service" (i.e., morning prayer, evening prayer and Holy Communion), and Lutherans composed chorale motets, chorale concerti and chorale or church cantatas culminating in the compositions of J.S. Bach (d. 1750). In the Catholic church the compositional restraint of Palestrina was abandoned. Massive choral works such as the 53 part Missa salisburgensis by O. Benevoli (d. 1672), instrumental church music such as the sonata da chiesa of A. Corelli (d. 1713), and the composition of operatic vocal works such as the Stabat Mater by G. Pergolesi (d. 1736) so overwhelmed the worship that "the liturgy was not only submerged under this ever-growing art but actually suppressed" (Jungmann, Mass of the Roman Rite, 1:149).

By the mid-18th century the churches were losing their role as musical centers in western society. Aside from the composition of organ works, music for the church declined. Though a few great religious works were written for the church (e.g., the Masses of Mozart, d. 1796), most were written for the concert hall like Beethoven's (d. 1827) Missa Solemnis or Brahms' (d. 1897) Ein deutsches Requiem. Parallel to this development of non-liturgical, sacred art-music was a new reform in the Catholic church. The Catholic "restoration" sought a return to Gregorian chant and polyphony in the style of Palestrina. One of the most celebrated proponents of this reform was the Society of St. Cecilia, whose work was sanctioned by Pius IX (Multum ad commovendos animos, A.D. 1870). Though effective in rejecting the elaborating effects of the Baroque and Romantic periods, this reform virtually eliminated all vernacular music from worship.

20th Century. Although there is much in the early part of this century to suggest that the musical-liturgical spirit of the 20th century was in continuity with the previous era, such continuity was challenged by new thinking early on. Shortly after the turn of the century, Pius X (d. 1914) issued a series of documents which helped to promote the active participation of the assembly and contribute to the popularity of the liturgical movement begun in the previous century. The first of these, Tra le sollecitudini (1903), called for the participation of the people in the worship and song of the church. Though such participation was considered only in terms of Gregorian chant, Pius X was nonetheless determinative for reaffirming the centrality of the community in worship and recognizing music as the hand aid of the liturgy. He further asserted that music was "an integral part of the solemn liturgy" (n. 1). Believing that music's principal role is to serve the liturgical text (n. 1), Pius X delineated three criteria for "sacred music": it must be holy, it must be true art, and it must be universal (n. 2). The musical result of his work was not only a revival in Gregorian chant but the first step toward reintegrating the song of the assembly into the liturgy. In 1928 Pius XI reaffirmed the intentions of his predecessor in the apostolic constitution Divini cultus and emphasized that the faithful should not appear "as outsiders or as silent spectators."

Though these papal declarations forbade the use of vernacular music in worship, the long tradition for the same eventually led to Rome's reinstatement of this permission. During this century there existed in Germany, France and other countries various liturgical forms which called for sung participation in the vernacular and which, contrary to Tra le sollecitudini, Rome allowed. The dialogue Mass (missa recitata), for example, was a form of low Mass in which the people recited some of those parts taken over by the choir, first in Latin and then in the vernacular. In Germany the Betsingmesse was another kind of low Mass at which the people assisted with prayers and songs in the vernacular. In various places the high Mass (missa cantata) was also sung by the congregation both in Latin and in the vernacular. Germany received permission for a vernacular setting of the high Mass (deutches Hochamt) in 1943.

In 1955 Pius XII issued Musicae sacrae disciplina which, in many respects, reiterated the principles of Pius X. More so than any previous document, however, this work began to distinguish between sacred music which is part of the liturgy and religious music which does not properly belong to the liturgy (n. 36). While this instruction also affirmed the traditional belief that sacred music was to serve the text, it also made great strides in emphasizing music's overall contribution to the liturgical action. During the pontificate of Pius XII the Sacred Congregation of Rites issued an additional instruction in 1958, De musica sacra. This work further clarified the nature of sacred music (n. 4), popular religious song (n. 9) and religious music (n. 10), a clarification which eventually shaped the taxonomy developed by Gelineau. It also offered distinctions between the read Mass (Missa lecta) and the sung Mass (Massa in cantu), the latter being divisible into the solemn Mass (Missa solennis) and the sung Mass (Missa cantata) (n. 3). Directions about the inclusion of vernacular hymns in the read Mass led to the popular four-hymn pattern of entrance, offertory, communion and dismissal hymns.

In 1963 the Fathers of the Second Vatican Council approved Sacrosanctum concilium. Chapter 6 of S.C., entitled "Musica sacra," outlined the basic principles for music in the liturgy whose reform this same constitution mandated. S.C. reiterated Pius X's position that music was to serve the liturgy and form a necessary or integral part of the liturgy (n. 112). The basic reason for music's integral role in worship is the oft cited ability of music to unite with and serve the liturgical text. S.C. further recognized music's power to serve not only the word but also the ritual action (n. 112). While affirming the priority of Latin in the liturgy, S.C. allowed the use of vernacular in worship and its music.

In 1967 the Sacred Congregation of Rites issued the instruction Musicae sacram. Though maintaining the distinctions between the solemn, high and low Mass of De musica sacra, this instruction did not treat all elements of the ordinary or proper as equal and distinguished between three degrees of solemnity for the sung Mass. The first degree included singing such elements as the opening prayer, gospel acclamations and the preface (n. 29); to the second degree belonged the Kyrie, Gloria and Agnus Dei (n. 30); the third degree included the chants after the epistle, alleluia, and songs for the presentation of the gifts (n. 31). This instruction further forbade entrusting to the choir alone the entire singing of the whole ordinary and proper of the Mass to the complete exclusion of the people's participation (n. 16c). Although S.C. had noted that it was desirable that religious of both sexes be schooled in the church's music (n. 115) it was not until De musica sacra that women were explicitly allowed to sing in the choir. When they did so, the choir had to be located outside of the sanctuary (n. 23c).

The distinction between solemn, high and low Mass finally disappeared in the first edition of the G.I.R.M. (General Instruction on the Roman Missal, 1969) and the 1972 document of the United States bishops, Music in Catholic Worship, noted the outdated nature of this formulation (n. 54). M.C.W. further eliminated the distinction between the ordinary and the proper parts of the Mass (n. 51) and outlined a new priority for singing the various elements at Mass: first acclamations (nn. 53-59), processional songs (nn. 60-62), responsorial psalms (n. 63), ordinary chants (nn. 64-69), and supplementary songs (nn. 71-74). This document also moved away from the criteria articulated by Pius X (holy, good art, universal), stressing that evaluation of liturgical music required a threefold judgement: musical, liturgical and pastoral (nn. 25-41). In the process of explaining the nature of the musical judgement, M.C.W. broke with past documents by not asserting the musical priority of chant and polyphony. Rather M.C.W. noted that style and value are two distinct judgements and one must judge value within each style (n. 28). Since M.C.W. was largely focused on music in the eucharist, the United States bishops issued a companion document, Liturgical Music Today (1982), which more specifically addressed the place of music within sacramental rites and the liturgy of the hours.

The Role of Music in Worship

The developments in liturgical music throughout this century, especially since the Second Vatican Council, are more than contemporary adaptations of traditional views about music in worship. Rather, they indicate a fundamental shift in understanding the meaning and purpose of music in worship. This shift is well symbolized in the growing preference for the term "liturgical" rather than "sacred" music.

From the time of the ancient Greeks there has persisted the belief that music embodies a significance or meaning apart from its usage and is capable of having a moral effect on the listener. This belief, called the doctrine of ethos, was shared among many ancient civilizations but found its most influential articulation in Greek philosophy. Pythagoras (d. c. 479 B.C.) is said to have discovered the numerical basis of the musical scale and thought that this numerical structure was a key to the universe which also had an arithmetic basis. In this view music was not only a means to interpret the universe but a way to affect it as well. Plato (d. 347 B.C.) elaborated this belief, teaching that music could permanently affect an individual's character. Each musical system or mode produced a specific and consistent result in the listener. The Mixolydian mode could move people to lament, the Ionian mode made one soft and lax and only the Dorian and Phrygian modes were to be employed since they were temperate and brave (Republic 3:398c-399d).

Although many specifics of this doctrine were rejected, even by other Greek philosophers of the day, the residue of this viewpoint persisted in the Hellenistic world. Strongly influenced by the continuation of Plato's thought in Middle and Neoplatonism, early Christian writers perpetuated the belief that music was an image of a higher order, that it had an objective and definable significance apart from its usage and that this significance had moral consequences. Thus musical forms and sounds were accepted or rejected, at least in part, because of what was perceived to be their ontological and moral significance (see R. Skeris, Chroma Theou [Altötting, 1976], 157-160). This is certainly part of the reason why early Christian writers rejected all instrumental music. It was not the use of the instrument but the instrument itself which was considered immoral and incapable of uniting with the harmony of all creation redeemed by Christ.

An explicit affirmation of this perspective is found in the work of the Roman philosopher Boethius (d. 524) who became the most influential authority on music in the Christian West during the Middle Ages. His De institutione musica libri quinque was a compilation of selections from various ancient Greek writers, many of whom held to the doctrine of ethos. Heavily influenced by the writing of Pythagoras and Plato, Boethius noted in the introduction to the first book of this work, "music is related not only to speculation but to morality as well." Through the work of Boethius, and to a lesser extent the monk Cassiodorus (d.

583), the belief that music embodied the essence of virtue or vice was perpetuated in the church. John XXII quoted Boethius in his Docta sanctorum patrum and in the spirit of Boethius condemned those musicians who did not promote devotion with their art but instead created "a sensuous atmosphere."

One effect of this implicit acceptance of the doctrine of ethos by the church was a tendency to legislate music as though it were an objective reality which in itself could be virtuous or immoral. For John XXII this meant banning certain dissonant intervals which were thought to be capable of weakening the soul. More recently Pius X required that music must be holy and "exclude all profanity not only in itself but also in the manner in which it is presented" (T.L.S. n. 2). Though this norm recognized the possibility of a profane performance, it also admits that music, apart from any usage, had the potential for profanity in and of itself. From this view-point the most appropriate music for worship was considered to be "sacred" (=holy) music.

A significant departure from this approach, foreshadowed in Musicae sacrae disciplina (nn. 34-35), was made explicit in S.C. which did not rely heavily upon abstract philosophical or theological criteria for evaluating worship music but emphasized the function of such music. Thus S.C. notes that it is in the wedding of music to words that music forms an integral part of the liturgy (n. 112). Even more significant is the statement that sacred music will be the more holy the more closely it is joined to the liturgical rite (n. 112). While employing the language of holiness reminiscent of Pius X, S.C. clearly moved towards a functional definition of sacred music, stressing that its holiness is not only or essentially a matter of ontology or ethics but, instead, is related to music's ability to wed itself to text and rite. This shift is akin to a change which has taken place in sacramental and liturgical theology in this century which attempts to understand sacraments not only from a philosophy of nature but also from anthropology (E. Schillebeeckx, Eucharist [New York, 1968], 97-101).

This tendency to balance the philosophical/aesthetical approach with an anthropological/functional approach is partly the result of recent interactions between music and the behavioral sciences. In the early part of this century a series of empirical studies on the effect of music on the human body demonstrated that most messages about music's meaning (e.g., major=happy, minor=sad) are learned (C. Heinlein, "The affective characters of the major and minor modes in music," Journal of Comparative Psychology 8 [1928]: 101-142). Such studies did much to challenge the belief that certain effects were inseparably wedded to certain kinds of music. Next came sociological and anthropological studies which attempted to discover how music operated in the thought and social life of a community. These studies demonstrated that music is not valued for its own sake but serves a variety of functions in human society (A. Merriam, Anthropology of Music [Evanston, 1964], 209-277). The encounter between anthropology and music gave rise to a new science called ethnomusicology which is concerned with the relationship between living music and culture. This science rehabilitated the concept of "folk music" and to a certain extent demonstrated that "all music is structurally as well as functionally folk music" (J. Blacking, How Musical is Man? [Seattle, 1973], p. xi).

This interaction between music and the behavioral sciences, like the parallel interaction between sacramental/liturgical theology and the behavioral sciences, has dramatically shifted our understanding of the nature and purpose of liturgical music. Worship music is not an independent reality only to be evaluated according to objective musical and aesthetic standards apart from particular usage. Rather, the significance of worship music is directly tied to its ministerial function (S.C., 112). M.C.W. acknowledges this reality by suggesting that liturgical music needs to be evaluated not only according to musical but also liturgical and pastoral standards (nn. 25-41).

This reintegration of the functional with the aesthetical perspective is not a repudiation of the Hellenistic influences which shaped emerging Christianity but is, instead, a recovery of our Jewish heritage. It was Judaism's influence on emerging Christian worship which stressed music's service to the word. Logogenic or "word-born" music (K. Sachs, The Rise of Music in the Ancient World [New York, 1943], p. 52) was an essential part of the Judaeo-Christian tradition, perpetuated through the centuries by the continued insistence on intelligibility in music and music's need to serve the word. One of the reasons Gregorian chant has been so highly prized by the church is precisely its ability to support and nuance the text. This reintegration of the functional (Jewish) with the aesthetical (Greek) results in the double requirement that liturgical music must be quality composition that effectively serves the rite.

Emphasis on music's function in ritual has led some to suggest that the most accurate term for such music is "Christian ritual music" ("The Music of Christian Ritual: Universa Laus Guidelines 1980, Bulletin of Universa Laus 30 [1980]: 5). Huijbers defines ritual music as "music whose quality is determined by, and subordinated to its integration into the liturgical action" (p. 113). While in some ways "ritual music" and "liturgical music" can be considered synonymous, the former more clearly accents the total subordination of music to the rite. It also underscores the relationship of the music to the whole of the rite and not merely to the liturgical texts. One result of this emphasis is the search for new ways to categorize and prioritize musical elements in worship. Rather than simply emphasizing sung texts and prioritizing them according to the liturgical importance of the text, a ritual-music approach suggests that there are four types of ritual music: 1) music alone, 2) music wedded to a ritual action, 3) music united to a text, and 4) music wedded to a text accompanying a ritual action (E. Foley and M. McGann, Music and the Eucharistic Prayer [Washington, D.C., 1988], 7-15). Selecting appropriate music for worship from this perspective requires more than an understanding of what texts are considered primary and worthy of song. Instead it requires an understanding of the macro- and micro-structures of the rite in order to discern what is at the heart of the rite and, therefore, to discover how music can contribute to the fulfillment of this ritual center.

The Theological Significance of Music in Worship

As one of the "languages" of the rite, liturgical music is considered integral or necessary to worship according to the official teaching of the church. As the Universa Laus guidelines explain this teaching, "In Christian liturgy music is not indispensable but its contribution is irreplaceable." The irreplaceable nature of music's contribution to worship is a function of its special acoustic properties. These enable music to engage the assembly, reveal the divine and enable the communion between the assembly and God in ways unique to this art form. Four acoustic properties which allow music to accomplish these things are as follows.

Music Is Time Bound. Music is a temporal art which "makes time audible" (S. Langer, Feeling and Form [New York, 1953], p. 110). Whereas a painting or building can exist throughout the centuries and appear almost impervious to the passage of time, music requires performance in historical time in order to exist. W. Ong contends that sound as one of the basic building blocks of music is more real or existential than any other sense object and situates us in the midst of actuality and simultaneity (The Presence of the Word [New Haven, 1967], pp. 111, 128). Because of this existential quality, music is able to image a God who in the Judaeo-Christian tradition intervened in time and reveals Self in human history. Furthermore, this time bound art has the ability to engage the community in the present reality of worship and signal that union with God in Christ is an existential possibility.

Music Is an Indicator of Personal Presence. Though we sometimes speak as though various animals are capable of song, music properly speaking is a human achievement and is one of the universal symbols of human civilization. Since it is a human creation, music is itself a symbol of human presence. As W. Ong asserts, an experience of "acoustic space" is an experience of inhabited space (p. 164). God in the Judaeo-Christian tradition is not only believed to be an abstract power intervening in history but a personal God who intervenes on behalf of a beloved. More often than not, this intervention in the OT took an auditory form and a preeminent image of God's presence was the Word (dabar). Though there are many visual images in the NT, even here there continues to be a strong emphasis on the auditory. Thus Jesus as the definitive revelation of this personal God is proclaimed to be the Word (Jn 1:1). In view of this auditory bias in God's self revelation as recorded in OT and NT, music as the most sophisticated form of sound has the capacity to symbolize the personal nature of God's self revelation (J. Wilkey, "Prolegomena to a Theology of Music," Review and Expositor 69 [1972]: n. 513) especially as it unites to the word.

Music Is Dynamic. Sound in general and music in specific have the ability not only to announce presence but to engage another in dialogue and communion. Because of sound's ability to resonate inside two individuals at the same time it has the capacity to strike a common chord and elicit sympathetic vibrations from those who hear. It, therefore, is dynamic in its ability to enter the world of the other and elicit a response. Thus music effectively reflects the dialogic impulse of God in the Judaeo-Christian tradition who continuously initiates dialogue with believers. This characteristic emphasizes not only God's historical intervention or personal nature but further embodies the belief that God has been and continues to be engaged in the individual and corporate life of humankind.

Music Is Intangible. The paradox of all sound phenomena including music is that sound/music is perceivable but elusive, recognizable but uncontainable. The apparently insubstantial nature of music is one of the reasons why it has symbolized the mysterious and wholly other since the dawn of creation. Music as a nondiscursive symbol is not only perceived as an insubstantial but itself seems to have an "ambivalence of content" (S. Langer, Philosophy in a New Key, 3rd ed. [Cambridge, 1976], p. 243). This elusiveness in form and content is part of the reason why music is so often used for communicating with the spirit world. In the Judaeo-Christian tradition music is an effective means for communicating with a God who is both present and hidden (S. Terrien, The Elusive Presence [San Francisco, 1978], p. 470). Furthermore, music offers itself as a powerful symbol for the Divine Self who is recognizable while remaining the unnameable "I am who I am" (Ex 3:14). Music thus enables us to encounter and know God without presuming to capture or contain the divine Self.

Summarily, music as the most refined of all sound events, reflects the characteristics of all sound phenomena to the highest degree. Music's temporality, human genesis, dynamism and apparent insubstantial nature enable it to serve as a unique symbol of God, suggesting presence without confinement, eliciting wonder without distance and enabling union which is both personal and corporate. More critical than any other characteristic for liturgy is music's capacity to wed itself to word (dabar) and share in its power, for music like word is both event and utterance. Music can, therefore, be understood as necessary or integral to liturgy because it has the capacity to reveal images of God and the community as well as to realize the implications of those images in a unique and irreplaceable way. Thus music has rightly been called "a sounding image of the Wisdom of God" (O. Söhngen, "Music and Theology," Sacred Sound, ed. J. Irwin [Chico, 1983], p. 14).

MUSIC, STYLES OF LITURGICAL

There probably has been more disagreement about the appropriateness of various styles of music for worship than any other aspect of the musical life of Christianity. Paul appears to have criticized the charismatic improvisation of songs in Corinth (1 Cor 14:13-19). Augustine vacillated on the question of music in worship before grudgingly giving his approval. Charlemagne suppressed the liturgical music of his time, replacing it with what is now called Gregorian chant. Luther made music central to worship, Zwingli forbade it, and Trent seriously debated banning all music but the chant.

With the reform of the Roman Catholic liturgy mandated by Vatican II, there has been a tremendous increase in the types and styles of music employed in worship. Musicam sacram (1967) addressed the question of musical style: "No kind of sacred music is prohibited from liturgical actions by the Church as long as it corresponds to the spirit of the liturgical celebration itself and the nature of its individual parts, and does not hinder the active participation of the people" (M.S., 9). This seemingly simple statement, however, raises a number of questions: 1) what is sacred music? 2) how does music correspond to the spirit of a liturgical celebration? 3) how should music respect the individual parts of worship? 4) what is the appropriate active musical participation of the people?

Liturgical Music

The term sacred music has generally been replaced in contemporary discussion by the term liturgical music. This shift in terminology helps to focus attention on the function of a musical piece rather than simply on its content. Just because a song text mentions God or a Christian event, that does not mean it is proper liturgical music. Liturgical music is functional music; through it the liturgical action is advanced. It is not a break in the action or a filler of dead space. It is integral to the very nature of the liturgy and must be rooted in the nature of the ritual itself. It finds its inspiration in the experience of liturgical prayer. It is always communal in nature, although not always in performance. The image of the believing community as a choir united in song stems from the earliest of the Church Fathers.

Often the form of liturgical music is dictated by the context in which it is to be employed. Yet it is often of a style that unites it with human cultures outside of the church, styles that have been molded and shaped into liturgical prayer. Many of the early Lutheran hymns were based on Renaissance dance tunes. The well-known American hymn, "Mother Dear, O Pray for Me," was originally a popular, secular song of the same title. Liturgical music does not exist in a cultural vacuum, but within specific times and cultures. Just as the early Christians gradually christianized the music of the ancient world, so too should each generation add to the treasury of liturgical music the best of its own time and place.

The history of musical style in the Christian churches records a fluctuation between the cultivation of diversity and the cultivation of universality. While early medieval times saw the coexistence of various styles of chant (e.g., Ambrosian, Roman, Gallic, Mozarabique), a slightly later period emphasized the symbolic unity of all churches employing Gregorian chant. In a time of great missionary expansion for the Roman church, Alexander VII instructed missionaries not to bring European styles and customs to a foreign land, but to respect the traditions of these cultures. Two hundred years later the Gregorian revival sparked by the Benedictines of Solesmes sought to introduce both uniform repertoire and uniform performance style to the Catholic church. Contemporary times emphasize the diversity of musical styles and national idioms.

Spirit of the Liturgy

The "spirit of the liturgical celebration itself" might be too easily interpreted as referring to suitability or good taste, but quite often such judgments are based on extra-liturgical considerations such as polite social or aesthetic conventions. Taste in church music is all too often a reflection of childhood familiarity or a Hollywood-inspired idea of what is spiritually evocative. But a music that is rooted in the spirit of the liturgical act does not attempt to create a religious atmosphere by manipulating emotions. Rather, it reflects, sustains and articulates on a different level the dynamics of our ritual prayer.

The spirit of Christian worship calls us to thanksgiving and unity, the joining of our hearts and minds in Christ. This is not some romantic ideal, but a real and challenging goal that can indeed be fostered through our use of music. As D. Saliers has pointed out, good church music can "bring our beliefs and emotions into a deeper harmony with Jesus Christ active and present in the world" (Saliers, p. 296). Thus our music should not be merely an expression of how we feel or think, but a way of shaping our emotions and thoughts in the way of Christ.

We come to an understanding of the spirit of our worship only through a study of the rites themselves and even more importantly through an ongoing experience of prayerful worship. It can be difficult for musicians to maintain this experience. Employed with a host of details throughout a service, their attention is easily focused more on the performance of music than on the leading of musical prayer. This is perhaps the fundamental violation of the spirit of worship for a musician. Whatever the musical style employed, it must be in keeping with the abilities and training of both the musicians and the congregation. Otherwise musical prayer is almost impossible. It must always be remembered that Christ "is present when the Church prays and sings" (S.C., 7).

Ritual Integrity

Music must also respect the "nature of the individual parts" of the liturgy. Each element of the ritual has specific functions which relate it to the whole. These functions must be respected and reinforced by the choice of music; music that obscures or works against them must be avoided. If the call for the congregation to "join with the angels and saints in our triumphant hymn of praise" is followed by a musical setting of the Sanctus that leaves the congregation standing in silence, the nature of that moment of the rite has been violated.

Liturgical planning often tends to look at the scriptural readings for the day, making musical choices based on a string of key words or phrases common to the readings. It is tempting to look at that which is different rather than that which is familiar. But in doing so, we run the very real risk of obscuring the nature of our worship. Our first concern must be those structural elements of musical worship that are fundamental to the rite itself, items such as the acclamations and the dialogue between the celebrant and congregation. The style of music employed at these moments must be one a congregation can sing repeatedly, a style that will hold up over many repetitions, a style that the people can sink their teeth into.

The absurdity of a soloist singing the Our Father within a eucharistic celebration is obvious. The more one begins to understand the nature of the individual moments of the liturgy, the more other stylistic requirements become obvious as well. If one regards the communion song as a processional song of the people, one would not ask them to read long, unfamiliar lyrics at that point. The deeper one's understanding of the prayer "alleluia" is, the less inclined one is not to sing it.

Active Participation

The "active participation of the people" must also be served by the choice of musical style. The styles employed for those parts of worship, which by nature and right belong to the people, must be styles that are singable by the congregation. This often has less to do with the style of music than it has to do with the musical training and experience of the congregation. Whole congregations have successfully learned music of a style and complexity that would be impossible for a less well-trained group. The key to the active participation of the people is a systematic and patient building up of a repertory suitable for both the congregation and the liturgy. Not only must a musical director look for music in keeping with worship; a director must also look for music that can stand the test of time, that can hold up with repeated use not just over a span of weeks but over years.

In order to guarantee the active participation of the people in song, there must be a sense of ownership of the repertoire that is fostered. A congregation must have a sense that the music employed is their music. Although the repertoire was somewhat limited, many American Catholics of the first half of the 20th century had this sense of ownership. Gregorian chant, "Holy God We Praise Thy Name" and "Tantum Ergo" belonged to them. With the sudden introduction of so much "new" music, some of it associated with other churches or styles considered secular or even profane by some, there was a loss of ownership. Ownership need not be exclusive; many different groups can feel such ownership over the same music.

Another important factor in fostering the active participation of the people in song is "significance." People sing when they have a reason to sing, not just because they are told to sing. Many people who insist they never sing actually do; it is a rare person who will not join in singing "Happy Birthday," a national anthem or "Silent Night." These are songs that have meaning and significance for vast groups of people. For some people the act of singing itself is sufficient significance; for others there must be a felt need in their present situation. The act of singing must be seen as important and meaningful.

The tremendous diversity of musical styles in contemporary culture, often stratified by age and/or social class, makes the acceptance of a particular musical style by such a diverse group of people as a typical congregation somewhat difficult. The simple fact is that musical styles do represent things, such as ideas, movements or ethnic groups. Attempts in the 1960s to employ folk music in the liturgy were sometimes labeled "leftist" by those who associated it with the politics of the 1950s. Those who have attempted to retain Gregorian chant have sometimes been labeled reactionary. The question of musical style can become a divisive one, a sad irony for a church whose primary image of song is unity.

It would be a mistake, however, to assume that the symbolic nature of musical style is a negative factor. A clear example of the positive role of such symbolism can be found among American black Catholics. The development of a "black Catholic gospel" style of music has been very successful. The adoption and adaptation of a living religious musical tradition has provided a basis for both the unity of the diverse members and identification with their heritage. The adaptation of this style for use in the Catholic liturgy has often been done with great sensitivity to the dynamics of the ritual itself.

It should also be noted that the active participation of the people refers to participation in the entire liturgy, not just the musical aspects. The music employed should not hinder this participation at any level; it is not limited to the voice, but includes all aspects of emotional, mental and physical concentration on the action taking place within the assembly. The style and selection of music employed must allow for this non-vocal participation of the people. It can be fostered by the development of a repertoire that respects not only the integrity of the individual celebration, but the rhythm of the yearly cycle of the liturgical year.

The strains of "O Come, O Come Emmanuel" bring us far deeper into the Advent spirit than a lector's announcement that we are celebrating the first Sunday of Advent. Those who were steeped in the chant found many of those seasonal associations with individual chants. They can stir up the emotions of the season, the things we have learned and experienced in years past.

Any effective repertoire of church music must build on these intelligently and patiently. There is no reason that even the parts of the ordinary of the Mass and the various acclamations cannot develop these seasonal associations. But once again, the music must be of sufficient quality and depth to endure through the cycles of many years. It must be the return of a well-loved friend, not of a boring acquaintance.

Textual Consideration

Having looked at each of the criteria for kinds of church music as set forth in Musicam sacram, at least a brief mention must be made of the style of the song texts which are employed.

If a text is taken directly from a lectionary or sacramentary there is obviously little difficulty. Paraphrased or freely composed texts can, however, be problematic. Dropping a stanza or two of a hymn because of time considerations can distort the meaning of the text. Omitting the third verse of a trinitarian hymn often results in removing the Holy Spirit from the Trinity. If one sings only the first verse of the traditional version of "A Mighty Fortress," one is left with a somewhat strange affirmation of Satan, "on earth is not his equal."

The military imagery of some older hymns is found offensive by some; the lack of inclusive language can be offensive to others. But the two fundamental considerations in judging a song text are theological soundness and the style of the text. One must be concerned not only with what is conveyed but also how it is conveyed. A straightforward didactic style is easily ignored; a too heavily poetic text style can be obscure. The primary way that the church teaches the mysteries of the Christian faith is through images. Many of these images are conveyed through our songs and have a very real impact on people's understanding of their faith. It should always be remembered that textual considerations are as important as musical ones in the selection of church music.

Styles of Music

Bearing these considerations in mind, we can turn our attention to the vast array of styles of music that presently exist in the treasury of church music. Any group would be foolish to turn its back on almost 1500 years of tradition and art. At the same time, this treasury also includes masterpieces of art that are now museum pieces. Although no one would doubt their aesthetic value, they are no longer of real service to the contemporary worshipping community. Yet it is the task of the trained church musician to continually survey the vast resources of the past as well as the present with an eye and ear to their service to the contemporary church. What follows does not intend to be a complete history of Christian church music, but simply a survey of those areas most likely to be fruitful in the search for a contemporary repertoire of music for the Christian church.

Chant. Perhaps the greatest loss in the musical life of the church in recent years is the on-going tradition of Gregorian chant. This is music deeply rooted in Christian worship. Scholars dispute the exact age and origin of the chant; some see the bulk of the repertoire being a mere thousand years old, while others trace its roots to the music of ancient Israel. Regardless of its exact age and origin, it is a rich, fruitful tradition. It is not music of instant appeal or showmanship; it is music deeply rooted in prayer, not unlike the chant of many Eastern religions. It is music that must be slowly and carefully cultivated within a community, but that yields great fruit. The more simple chants are easily learned by an entire congregation. Perhaps the greatest perceived difficulty with the chant is the Latin language so essential to it. Yet this should cause little difficulty with the ordinary of the Mass. Through familiarity and repetition most congregations know these texts by memory. The occasional use of Latin in our worship, the language of no particular country, may also serve to remind us that the church is not bound by national or linguistic borders.

It should also be pointed out that a great deal of research into the chant has gone on in this century, research that has changed the way the chant had been performed. The refined and ethereal performance style of Solesmes with which most musicians are familiar has yielded to styles which are perhaps closer to the true medieval style. It is an area well worth investigation by both liturgists and musicians.

Hymnody. The question of Latin hymnody is somewhat more difficult. Simply stated, we need poets to translate these great works into new great works. Some translations already made are serviceable; a few, such as Gerard Manley Hopkins' translation of the "Adoro Te Devote," are masterpieces. The strength and beauty of these texts must not, however, be lost to us.

There is no doubt that the great polyphonic tradition of the West, from Machaut to Palestrina, is a tremendous cultural heritage. The use of this heritage in contemporary worship is nonetheless problematic. Motets and other set forms can certainly be an asset to any church musician, properly placed within the liturgy and with printed translations available for the congregation when appropriate. The greater difficulty is in the use of the great tradition of settings of the ordinary of the Mass which by necessity completely exclude the congregation's active participation. This is not to say that performance of this music is never possible within worship, but that in general it is best left to extra-liturgical events.

The Reformation saw a great increase in both the use and production of vernacular hymnody. This tradition goes back two hundred or more years before the Reformation, however; some of the earliest, extant examples of such hymnody are German translations of medieval sequences. Martin Luther, recognizing the importance of church music, authored many hymn texts himself, often translations of Latin hymnody. The melodies were often those of secular songs. The German chorale tradition, as well as the later English and American hymn tradition, were for many years the mainstay of Protestant church music. In recent years much of this tradition has been adopted by Catholic churches as well.

There are good reasons for the popularity of this tradition of song. The strophic form of the hymn does not put unreasonable musical demands on the congregation; it can be easily learned and remembered. The metrical nature of both the text and tune allows for the interchange of texts among a number of melodies of similar meter. The relative simplicity of the congregational part can be augmented by descants and harmonizations by a choir and creative accompaniment by a skilled organist. There is also a wealth of material available in the English language.

As valuable as this tradition is for all Christian churches, a few words of caution are necessary when discussing its use within Roman Catholic worship. The chorale and hymn tradition grew up within the dynamics of Protestant worship, dynamics quite different from those of the Catholic worship. Indeed, hymnody was never a significant part of Catholic eucharistic worship; hymnody belonged to the liturgy of the hours. Anyone who is familiar with the so-called "four-hymn-Mass" phenomenon has experienced the violence that hymnody can do to the proper dynamics of Catholic worship. The restriction of congregational music to the entrance, offertory, communion and recessional hymns focuses attention away from the most important dynamics of Catholic worship. This is certainly not implying that metrical hymnody has no place in Catholic eucharistic worship, but rather that the placement of such hymns within the liturgy must be done with sensitivity to the structure of the rite. According to the directives of Musicae sacrae (29-31) these musical elements are of the lowest priority; they are certainly desirable, but only after more important structural elements of the eucharistic liturgy have been sung.

Psalmody. The tradition of chanting the psalms has a long history in Christian worship. Two main styles have come down to us, the Gregorian psalm tones and Anglican chant. Both of these styles can be useful musical forms for English prose texts. The Gregorian psalm tone is a single monophonic line which may be supported by organ accompaniment. Anglican chant is a harmonized version of the psalm tones, most often in four parts, and includes very useful and effective settings by a number of great composers including Thomas Tallis and William Byrd. Once the basic principle of applying these tones to a pointed text is understood, they can serve numerous functions within worship. One should not fall into the trap of learning a single psalm tone and forcing it to suffice in all cases.

Ethnic Music. In recent years there has been a great increase in interest in spirituals and various ethnic religious musics. There is certainly a great wealth of musical materials in these various traditions that can enrich the repertoire of any congregation. They should of course be judged by the same standards any liturgical music is judged by. Many standard hymnals contain fine examples of such music. This music can also connect us with our heritage, our history and our identity, although it should never do so in an exclusionary fashion. A number of the major Protestant hymnals publish companion volumes giving short histories of each of the hymns. These can be helpful in understanding the nature and significance of these songs. Musicians performing music of traditions other than their own should, however, take the time and effort to learn the proper performance styles of such music.

Classical Music. The mainstream tradition of Western art music has over the last four hundred years produced many musical masterpieces that are settings of liturgical texts; far fewer of them can be considered liturgical music. It is highly doubtful that anyone ever considered the Bach's B-minor Mass or Beethoven's Missa Solemnis suitable for use within the eucharist. Nevertheless, one can find music from this period which is highly suited for use in worship. The orchestral Masses of this period involve the same difficulties mentioned in regard to polyphonic Masses of an earlier period. But from Bach's chorale harmonizations and Mozart's Ave Verum Corpus to Bruckner's motets and Stravinsky's Ave Maria there are many treasures that can enrich the worship of all Christians.

The Contemporary Task

Our own time has witnessed an explosion in the publication and dissemination of religious music of all types and styles. The sheer volume of music that is produced makes it difficult for the church musician to stay abreast of it all. The mass marketing of much religious music has produced a phenomenon similar to that found in the field of popular music; a song is produced, becomes a hit and fades away in a relatively short period of time. Much of the so-called folk music published for worship tends to sentimentality. Yet there is also music of lasting quality to be found both in this "folk" style and dozens of various styles. Thus, a major task of the church musician today is that of a music critic, judging and discerning both the quality of the music and its suitability for a particular worshipping community.

A sad irony of recent years is the dissolution of many church choirs with the renewed emphasis on congregational singing and the more recent increase in the use of prerecorded music in worship. The use of records or tapes for personal devotion is fine; such use should never even attempt to replace the union of individual voices joined together in praise and thanks to God.

There is a wealth of musical styles appropriate to Christian worship and available to us today. There are certainly challenges to be met but perhaps even more opportunities to take advantage of. Our song is our prayer. It unites our breath, our minds, our hearts and our bodies in the worship of our God.

MUSIC, TYPES OF LITURGICAL

Liturgical music, being a type of sacred music, has been called by all the popes of the 20th century, from Pius X to John Paul II, the finest of all the arts employed in service to worship. Sacred music is the term preferred by the hierarchy in reference to musical arts applied to the liturgical rites. It implies artistic worthiness, holiness in style, and a general acceptability, or universality. These elements were not appreciably changed in the aftermath of changes that affected music after the Second Vatican Council. But the nature of liturgical music began to be more defined, as that branch of sacred music that has immediate applicability to the collective song (vernacular or Latin) of the whole assembly within the reformed rites and ceremonies.

It is clear from the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy that Gregorian (Latin) chant and 16th-century polyphony of the Roman school continue to be the ideals whereby all liturgical music is judged worthy and acceptable (S.C., 112ff). However, the specialized nature of interpreting this music as found in the Graduale Romanum or in the highly polished polyphonic works of Palestrina has led liturgists in many countries where vernacular missals are in use to question the liturgical usefulness of much of this "treasury of sacred music." It is certain that the Gregorian Masses VIII and XVI have a popular style that lends them to singing by even large assemblies. Furthermore the Latin language as found in commonly known hymns like "Salve Regina" or "Adoro te devote" cannot be seen as impeding the song of the people. Rather it gives a true universality to worship. Nevertheless the Latin tradition has in many places barely survived as an actual method of common liturgical song. Thus the American bishops have written, "singing and playing the music of the past is a way for Catholics to stay in touch with and preserve their rich heritage" (Liturgical Music Today [L.M.T.], U.S.C.C., 1982, n. 52).

The types of liturgical music found in today's worship are quite varied. Some are very ancient, several are revivals of lost traditions, and a few are of modern invention. Music used in worship passed from the Middle Ages through the period of Renaissance and Counter-Reformation in a gradual evolution to 20th century practice. The "Order of Mass" in the Roman rite has remained relatively stable in its musical dimension. The ancient usage of litanies in the Kyrie of the entrance rite and in the Agnus Dei of the communion has been fortified in post-conciliar worship. The Gloria remains from its medieval foundation as an opening hymn, largely choral in its conception and execution. The Sanctus has been linked to eucharistic acclamations and final doxology, and has been stipulated as belonging to the congregation's role in singing.

The gospel acclamation ("Alleluia" in all seasons but Lent) and the doxology after the Lord's Prayer have been heightened in importance as songs of the assembly. The gospel acclamation, along with the entrance song (usually a psalm, litany or hymn) and the communion hymn, have a processional aspect to their performance. They are tunes wedded to text, accompanying a visible motion, usually done by the people, with cantor and choir in vigorous alliance. The re-introduction of cantor or solo singer into the Roman rite has precedent in both ancient and medieval practice. In ancient churches in Rome even today one can see the elegant ambos of marble and Cosmati inlay where the solo singers proclaimed the Graduale a millennium ago, for instance, in San Clemente or Santa Maria in Cosmedin. This in turn was a reflection of the even more venerable traditions inherited from Hebrew cantillation in the formative Christian communities of the city. In the new order of Mass (promulgated by Pope Paul VI in 1969) it is quite clear that a new type of psalm-singing is to be practiced, namely responsorial psalmody. Although not mandatory, it is quite clear that a cantor is needed for the most effective usage of this psalmody. The alternation between the solo introduction of the antiphon or refrain and the congregational repetition, together with the solo singing of the psalm verses, require a cantor. While principally featured as a response to the first reading at Sunday Masses, responsorial psalmody has found its way also into the communion rite as an effective way to utilize the communion antiphon with a corresponding psalm. As the refrain consists of a complete sentence from scripture, it is easily remembered by the congregation during the reception of communion with or without printed copy.

Metrical hymns have been adopted into common practice of reformed liturgy. The final liturgical Instruction of the pontificate of Pope Pius XII in 1958 dealt with the introduction of vernacular hymns within the traditional structure of "high Mass." It was seen in post-war Europe as a growing practice to have the people sing hymns in their own language even during the all-Latin solemn celebration. Thus "Englishing" the Mass began a couple of years before the convocation of Vatican II. Hymnals in English, such as Liturgical Press' Our Parish Prays and Sings, appeared at the end of the 1950s to encourage active participation of the Sunday assembly. In today's liturgy the hymn serves often as an entrance or "gathering" song. As many hymns, some from the Genevan psalter or Wesleyan provenance, others newly composed in folk-style, are actually direct paraphrases of psalms, they can function in place of responsorial psalms between scripture readings. But there is a conscious discouragement by liturgists regarding the accompaniment of the preparation of the gifts at eucharist (formerly called offertory) with hymnody. Hymns are increasingly sung with at least four verses. Thus the length of hymn-singing is considerable, and ought to be reserved for times of reflection (such as after communion) or during processions and recessions. The multitude of tunes as well as poetic texts borrowed from Protestant resources has tripled the quality and quantity of hymns in use in the American Roman rite. Just after the council the accessibility of good hymns was very limited, and in the confusion, hastily written texts and poorly composed music crept in abundance throughout the new liturgy. There arose a mistaken "four-hymn syndrome" (entrance-offertory-communion-dismissal) that dealt a blow to smoothly functioning liturgical practice. In other words, the singing of four hymns sufficed at solemn celebrations of the eucharist. With the correct understanding of the relationship of song to all the parts of the Mass, this practice is happily subsiding, and music and song are becoming part of the fabric of ritual.

Choral music has been for centuries a major element in Catholic worship. Nothing in the post-conciliar reform discourages the formation and implementation of choral song. The Roman Consilium that dealt with liturgical music issued a strong encouragement of choral practice in its well-known Instruction, Musicam sacram (M.S.) in 1967. Calling for "full, conscious and active" participation of the people in the celebration, the instruction notes that the role of the choir is "to ensure the proper performance of the parts which belong to it, according to the different kinds of music sung, and to encourage the active participation of the faithful in the singing." It further emphasizes that large choirs already existing in basilicas, cathedrals, monasteries and major churches, are to continue to preserve and develop "a musical heritage of inestimable value . . . retained for sacred celebrations of a more elaborate kind" (M.S., 19-20). Therefore, Latin motets and Mass sections from the classical masters may still be considered as having valid liturgical function. The document earlier speaks of the need to have internal participation of the laity as well as external songful responses. To hear a masterwork of sacred music performed by a refined choir in no way interrupts the flow of contemporary worship, for it calls the people to reflect on their religious heritage and to be moved by the beauty of sound during the whole celebration. The American bishops have stated that now is the time "to make realistic assessments of what place the music of (our) past can still have in the liturgies of today (L.M.T., 50).

Ministerial singing or proclamations have always been a type of liturgical song. The opening and closing dialogs, the preface proclamation and exhortations to respond, such as the deacon's introduction to the eucharistic acclamation, "Let us proclaim the mystery of faith," ought to be sung. Prayers of the celebrant, also known as orations, may be intoned in plainsong formulas that adapt well to the vernacular. The reintroduction of the sung eucharistic prayer is officially encouraged with "tonus simplex" editions of the four prayers appearing in the appendix of the Roman Missal. Liturgists, together with contemporary composers, have seen this relatively new type of liturgical song as enhancing the solemn prayer and giving greater musical balance to the two great liturgies (word and eucharist). Alongside the priest's chanting, the lectors and deacon may chant the scriptural pericope. Surely the concluding versicles of the chosen readings are best chanted. Where once such ministerial singing was normative, it remains an option that enhances the solemnity of the rites. The most important Easter proclamation ("Exsultet") continues to be sung in most places. In such similar services as blessings of water and oils, proclamations of praise at the end of the reconciliation rite, or prayers over the people, ministerial chants are not mere decoration, but rather are an integral mode of proclaiming the mystery.

This is especially true in the rites of Christian initiation and other sacraments. The rite of baptizing children calls for sung dialogs, litanies and hymns. Hymns that befit the rite of election and scrutinies during the adult initiation (R.C.I.A.) become "an essential element throughout the entire prayer experience" (L.M.T., 25). Communal celebrations of reconciliation in their various forms require song in praise of God's mercy. A special effort to find suitable hymns and acclamations for weddings is the job of every pastor and church musician.

Scholars of the history of church music such as Johannes Quasten have studied all types of music used in worship. From pre-Christian times, flutes, harps and drums have accompanied the chanting of priests and vestal virgins. Music even accompanied the human sacrifices of antiquity: Plutarch stated that loud instrumental music was used to cover the screams of children offered to Saturn at Carthage (Quasten: Music and Worship in Pagan and Christian Antiquity). Thus there has been in Christian worship a certain historical hesitancy regarding the use of musical instruments in worship. The medieval pope, John XXII, railed against "dissonant" part-singing in church, and the early Cistercians forbade organ playing in the monastery. Yet the Roman rite has preferred the moderate path: never forbidding instrumental music as such, but preferring certain instrumental types, such as stringed instruments and organs, over percussion and brass. The admission of the guitar and piano as liturgical instruments is very recent, only post-conciliar. While brass and timpani are used in church for solemn occasions, their usage is at the periphery of liturgy. Liturgical use of instruments ought to be in a reverent context.

Joseph Gelineau wrote some years ago that music can be considered liturgical when the church recognizes in it a prayerful spirit. (Gelineau: Chant et musique dans le culte chretien). When people are comfortable enough to pray in and through the music that music is deemed liturgical. For years, the official liturgical music was coextensive with what today we term "sacred music," Latin chant or settings of the Latin Ordinary for polyphonic choir. Certain types of religious music were always seen as concert pieces. These would be oratorios or lengthy Mass-settings for chorus and orchestra (such as Beethoven's Missa Solemnis). In the last century much music was written for the organ intended as accompanying the priest's softly read "low Mass." Length, size and forces required to perform the music were more determinant of the liturgical appropriateness than any given style.

Pope St. Pius X rectified much by insisting that liturgical music be inclined toward encouraging people to participate actively in the liturgy, rather than giving a feeling of being in the concert hall or opera house. He called on composers to respect the specialness of worship, even in the manner of their composing. "Holiness" has become the norm for judging the appropriateness of music within worship for most of this century. The conciliar reform did nothing to replace that norm, but rather heightened and expanded it to include music from the vernacular traditions or national vogues. Still the liturgical text, whether proper to the feast or part of the ordinary of the rite, remains the central point in wedding the melody to worship, in becoming the people's prayer. Conversely, music that is truly secular can never be thought liturgical. Musical instruments are accessories to the vocal praise of God by his people.

From the time of the earliest Christian Jews, liturgical music has been heard in the gentle cantillation of psalms and scriptural songs (such as in Phil 2:6-11), inspired prayers, and melismatic "Hallels." It developed into the "jubilus" of Alleluias and other acclamations in the Gallican churches, and longer poetical "sequences" in medieval England. Before the notation of music made Gregorian chant possible, there were orally preserved chant traditions in the earliest Celtic liturgies, as preserved in the 7th-century Bangor antiphony and Stowe missal that show a rich variety in its unique distribution of psalmody, with a marvelous vein of hymnody (such as "Sancti venite," the oldest known eucharistic hymn). These monks from Scotland and Ireland were "great travelers and ardent lovers of liturgy, indefatigable in collecting every book on the subject, copying, retouching and sometimes adding a formula here and a rite there" (New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, Vol. II, Macmillan, London, 1980). With their patchwork collection of liturgical songs and harps strung on their backs, from Luxeuil (France), St. Gall (Switzerland) and Bobbio (Italy), the Celtic pilgrims enriched the Roman rite with a lilting treasury of sacred music in its darkest hours. There is no doubt some of it survived in our recorded notes of plainchant.

With the purifications that church music has undergone in the Council of Trent and recently in Vatican II, liturgical music in our times is both sacred and relevant to contemporary people at prayer. Its forms and formulae have varied greatly over the ages, yet there remains a consistency of purpose that can be traced from the earliest canticles to the latest creations in modern harmony. Through it all, however, runs the prevailing type of ecclesiastical modality. The ancient scales that marked the first notations of church singing have prevailed, through Palestrina and Tallis, to be heard today in the sacred compositions of Hindemith, Vaughan Williams and Britten, of the Canadian Willan and the American Woollen, or in the Appalachian folk carol, "I Wonder As I Wander." North America has a fine tradition of ecclesiastical song-writing reflected in the unprecedented outpouring of new songs and scriptural paraphrases since the post-conciliar era began in 1964. Whether it be in a tune that has taken universal roots in English, such as "Gift of Finest Wheat" (Omer Westendorf and Robert Kreutz), or the continuation of "Roman school" polyphony in the works of Domenico Bartolucci (Sistine Choir director), Catholic liturgical music finds its truest voice in the flow of the modes of plainsong. This "musica perennis" is no mythical music of the spheres, but the perfect melody of Christ praising his Father in the voice of his singing people.

MYSTAGOGY

The term mystagogy means the interpretation of mystery. The earliest allusion to be found in early Greek refers to someone, a mystagogue, who initiates neophytes into the Elusinian mysteries. It later becomes associated with the teaching of mysteries found in secret religions. In the early Christian tradition (circa late 2nd century), the Katecheseis Mystagogikai refers to the post-baptismal catechesis delivered to the neophytes during the "week of white robes." This period of instruction lasted five to seven days, depending on local custom, during Easter week. The purpose of the mystagogical catechesis was to explain to the newly baptized the spiritual and theological significance of the various signs, symbols and gestures of the initiation rites that they had experienced on Holy Saturday night.

There are few intact or complete mystagogical instructions before the 3rd century. The reason for this can only be surmised. What is clear, however, is that by the time of the early Church Fathers there was an established pattern, which was more or less universal, for initiation into the Christian community. The final movement of this structure was a period of post-baptismal catechesis. While sacramental initiation was celebrated during the Easter vigil, catechetical initiation continued for at least another week.

It is perhaps owing to the growing political tolerance toward the early Christian community, coupled with an ever-increasing number of converts, that we have complete and intact procatecheses and catecheses from the 3rd to the 5th centuries. The primary sources are: Cyril of Jerusalem (though there is some debate as to the authenticity of his mystagogies, with some scholars attributing them to Cyril's successor, John), Theodore of Mopsuestia, Ambrose, John Chrysostom, and Augustine. The baptismal sermons of these Fathers reflect some of the richest sources of sacramental theology during the patristic period. The style is most often extemporaneous, with a scribe taking dictation, combining a commentary upon the various symbols of the rite itself with scriptural exegesis. Most often the tone of the mystagogies are poetic and lyrical, though at times they can be logically inconsistent, soporific (for example, Cyril chides his listeners to remain awake) and long-winded (Ambrose complains of losing his voice).

Since the nascent Christian community was essentially a secret sect religion, some period of post-baptismal instruction was necessary. Consequently, the catechumens were allowed to attend only the Mass of the catechumens (today, the liturgy of the word), being dismissed after the homily. They would, therefore, not have participated in the full sacramental life of the community before their baptism. A practical function of the mystagogia was to articulate the meaning of these sacraments so that the newly baptized could enter more fully in spirit and understanding into the worship-life of their community.

For the most part, the patristic mystagogues reserved any discourse on the sacraments until after the catechumens had experienced the initiation ceremony first-hand (exceptions to this are Theodore of Mopsuestia and John Chrysostom who explain to the elect the meaning of baptism). Yet, to ascribe this practice simply to the discipline of secrecy would miss a crucial understanding of mystagogy. The Church Fathers were not so much concerned with the initiation sacraments as mysterious; rather with the mystery that the initiated experienced in the sacraments. As Cyril of Jerusalem points out in the preamble to his first mystagogical discourse, "It has long been my wish, true-born and long-desired children of the church, to discourse to you upon these spiritual mysteries. On the principle, however, that seeing is believing, I delayed until the present occasion..." (Riley, 171). When the catechumens gather on the paschal night, they were unprepared for what they were about to experience. While they knew the purpose of their assembly, they knew not the form it would take. It was the general belief that in the baptismal experience the neophyte had participated in the paschal mystery of Jesus Christ, the significance of which lies beyond the understanding of the newly baptized, but which needs none the less to be articulated.

The structure of the mystagogical preachings is a step-by-step analysis and explanation of each symbol and gesture of the baptismal rite intertwined with scriptural commentary. In his explanation of the water font, for example, Cyril of Jerusalem will speak of the waters of creation, the exodus and passage through the Red Sea, allusions to Second Kings and the Song of Songs, culminating in the Lord's baptism as a harbinger of his resurrection from the dead, his descent into the "nether world" and ascension into heaven. It is clear, however, that this is not an artificial ordering, i.e., the Easter vigil will be explained in the pattern that it was experienced. Rather, the events of Holy Saturday night are calculated to engage the initiand in a dynamic process that leads from death to life. The mystagogue asks the neophytes to call upon the memory of their sacramental initiation and to "attend to the invisible as if it were visible" (Yarnold, 161). The rite of initiation is a representation of a much broader struggle, one of spiritual, or cosmic, proportions. From the initial confrontation of the evil one in the darkness of the night to the immersion in the water to the sharing of the eucharistic table, a foreshadowing of the heavenly banquet, the initiand is thrust into a struggle of a primordial tension: darkness and light, chaos and creation, evil and good, death and life. The patristic mystagogues perceive in the complex of baptismal symbols the watershed of salvation history, recapitulated and unfolded in hoc tempore. It is from this notion of participation that the Fathers draw forth an ontology of the baptismal symbols. As Theodore of Mopsuestia attests, "We are not concerned with empty symbols but reality," and he adds, "By dying and rising with Christ and being born to a new life, you come to share in the reality of the signs that attracted you" (Yarnold, 193). In continuity with Pauline death/resurrection theology, the mystagogues ascribed to the initiation ceremony a "stripping of the old man" and a "putting on of Christ." In baptism, the initiand was buried with Christ, with whom he also emerges, new, in the victory of the resurrection. The initiation ceremony is the external drama that signifies the interior transformation, vita ex morte, after the pattern of Christ's death and resurrection. The Fathers do not engage in a polemic that defends this substantial change, but are intent to interpret that it is so. The Eastern Fathers name this transformation "divinization" and the Western Fathers name it as "restoration." Both in their own traditions point to the ontological efficaciousness of the initiation sacraments.

Unlike the pedagogical catechesis during the preceding periods of inquiry, catechuminate and election, mystagogia cannot be described at all in terms of creedal formulas to be understood or doctrines to arm the neophytes against heresy. The pre-baptismal catecheses are concerned with communicating the central truths of the early Christian faith, creation, sin, and redemption, grounded in the understanding that the events of the OT prefigure those of the NT, and characterized by a strong emphasis on ethical teaching. By contrast, the post-baptismal catecheses are rarely so didactic. Their content, tenor and style is marked by a rhetorical ornamentation and theological splendor that is unparalleled by contemporary standards. The patristic mystagogues are given to images, metaphors and stories that reveal the significance and deeper meaning of the baptismal symbols. It is owing to the theological incisiveness of the Fathers that they are able to discern in the external complex of baptismal symbols, gestures, and signs the economy of salvation that is offered to the neophyte. It was at the culmination of this period of post-baptismal catechesis that the neophyte was incorporated as a full member into the Christian community.

For all practical purposes the formal period of mystagogy, including the term itself, disappeared from the liturgical argot, along with the early Christian pattern of initiation, during the Middle Ages. It was re-introduced into the liturgical vernacular in 1972 in The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. The modern day application of this period of catechesis does not differ, at least in understanding, from its ancient forebearer delineated above. This document intends that the mystagogical instructions should take place during the Mass on Sundays of the Easter season, culminating in the celebration of Pentecost. This final period of initiation is valued not only for the pedagogical significance it holds for the neophytes but also for the ongoing sacramental and theological education of the entire local community. Some scholars have argued that the restoration of this particular period of initiation is artificial, given that modern day Catholicism no longer bears the traits of a secret sect religion. Such an understanding, however, fails to grasp the key insight of the patristic mystagogues, an insight that is as binding today as it was in the 4th century: mystagogia seeks to uncover the Mystery that is encountered in the signs, symbols and gestures of the initiation rite. No matter the historical context, the condition of the neophyte is the same. The deepest significance of the baptismal event is not immediately ascertainable and requires some time of mystagogical reflection and catechesis. In a broader context, this period of catechesis is essential, not only for the newly baptized, but also for the continuing initiation of all Christians, a process which is, in fact, life-long.

MYSTERY THEOLOGY

In more than one hundred articles, letters and books from 1918-1941, Dom Odo Casel, O.S.B., clarified and defended a doctrine known as mystery theology. His purpose was to set out an explanation of the relationship between Christians and the saving activity of Christ in the sacraments, especially in the eucharistic celebration of the church. He based that doctrine on the notion of mystery (mysterium) and asserted that this theology, while avoiding the myriad abstractions and distinctions of Scholastic theology, was nevertheless true to the tradition of the church as found in the scriptures, patristic writings, and the most ancient Christian liturgies. Although serious controversy ensued, and even though today certain points are best set aside, the basic intention and effort of mystery theology, especially regarding the meaning of initiation and its relationship to the meaning of the eucharist, are recognized as significant contributions to the shift in theological method, as well as to the Liturgical Movement, in the 20th century.

Historical Context

The life of Odo (John) Casel (born Sept. 27, 1886, died March 28, 1948) extends through one of the most embattled periods in the history of the church and theology. The contributions of mystery theology, as well as its controversial nature, can be understood only by recognizing their roots in the ambience of Roman Catholic theology in general at the turn of the 20th century, as well as from within the historical and intellectual situation in Germany in particular.

With the loss of World War I and the subsequent political and economic upheaval, the mood in Germany was marked by profound disillusionment. The optimism engendered by the industrial revolution and by a philosophy which had glorified autonomous subjectivity had collapsed. Further, the theological situation, governed as it was by the web of 19th century neo-Scholastic objective categories and distinctions, was not able to respond to the anguished questions revealed in the human situation. In other words, neither official church theology, characterized by the extreme objectivity of neo-Scholastic categories nor the extreme concentration on subjectivity and individuality had proven adequate sources for addressing the human search for meaning.

The tremendous theological renewal initiated by the Catholic Tübingen School (J.S. Drey, J.A. Moehler, J.B. Hirscher, J.E. Kuhn, F.A. Staudenmeier) was rejected and condemned, because it was wrongly associated with the name of Modernism (A. Loisy, G. Tyrrell). The rigid, hair-splitting categories of neo-Scholasticism were joined to an analogy of the church as a civil monarchy (R. Bellarmine). Consequently, ecclesiology was articulated in juridical-organizational categories, and was expressed by the notion of a societas perfecta. Accordingly, liturgy was understood as the manifestation or "action of the state." On the one hand, the faithful were expected to be present for the celebration of the liturgy, but on the other hand, their presence was characterized by private devotional forms of prayer. In the end, the sacraments were understood as means of grace, whose objective power was understood as an a-personal, instrumental cause which guaranteed the communication of divine grace as the "effect" in the soul. The intrinsic relation between the activity of Christ and the faith of the participants was not articulated.

The entire controversy over mystery theology arose over what Casel believed was an answer to an individualistic piety which he saw flourishing at the beginning of the 20th century. He decried this isolationist piety which, influenced by Rationalism, had led persons to imagine that the Mystery could somehow be possessed by one's own effort and without relationship to the public, social worship of the church. Casel developed the doctrine of the mysteries (Mysterienlehre) to address that individual-centered piety. The doctrine appears most clearly in his book, The Mysteries of Christian Worship, and in an extensive article, "Mysteriengegenwart" (Presence of the Mysteries).

According to Casel, the Mystery means "three things and one." First, the Mystery is God, as the infinitely Other and Holy One, to whom no person may draw near and live. Second, the union of the Word of God and human nature in the person of Jesus of Nazareth has given the notion mystery a new and deepened meaning. The incarnation, passion, death and resurrection have manifested the glory of God in Jesus the Christ; therefore, this saving pattern is not merely a teaching, but Christ's saving acts. Third, Christians meet the person of Christ, his saving deeds, the working of his grace, in the sacraments, first in the sacrament of initiation and especially thereafter in the celebration of the eucharist. Casel supported this mystery theology (a) by his reading of Rom 6, 1-11, (b) by constant citations from patristic writings, and (c) by a linguistic analogy to the Hellenistic mystery cults.

Casel might well be termed a mystical theologian whom we now recognize to have been a pioneer both in moving beyond the Scholastic method in theology, as well as by participating in the "return to the sources" of the early church and patristic writings. However, in articulating the three-fold content of mystery, Casel moved beyond the formal doctrine of the church regarding the relation of Christians to the saving activity of Christ as contained in Scholastic theology, and especially as expressed at the Council of Trent, Session XXII, Sept. 17, 1562: "For the Victim [Christ] is one and the same, the same [Victim] now offering by the ministry of the priests, who then offered himself on the Cross, the manner alone of the offering being different. The fruits indeed of which oblation, of the bloody one ... are received."

However, from Casel's reading of the tradition, the Christian not only receives the fruits or effects of the saving activity of Christ, which is certainly true, according to the teaching of Trent; the Christian, Casel maintained, really encounters Christ in his saving activity in and through the liturgical activity of the church. To substantiate this claim, he repeatedly referred to St. Leo the Great: "What was visible in the Lord has passed over into the mysteries" (Sermon 74,2), and to St. Ambrose: "I find you [Christ] in your mysteries" (Apologia prophetae David, 58). In any case, it was to this assertion, beyond the teaching of Trent, to which he and his confreres at the abbey of Maria Laach addressed themselves, and to which others reacted negatively.

Fundamentally, mystery theology was the locus of several points of controversy. What is the relationship between what Christians do in the celebration of the sacraments and Hellenistic mystery cults? What is really present in the liturgy? Is the saving activity of Christ simply historically in the past, or is it supra-historical? Is the person of the Lord present alone, or the Lord with his saving acts? Is the saving activity of the cross present, or the saving activity of the Lord's entire life? How is the saving activity of the Lord rendered present?

Casel argued that it is not simply grace as the fruit or effect of the redemption which is present in the liturgy (Kultmysterium), but the redeeming acts themselves; the effect of grace flows from these saving acts. He justified his claim by saying that the real presence of Christ's redeeming acts must not be limited to a short period in Palestine; persons must share in them. That is, the person and saving acts of the Lord must be made contemporaneous in some way with all generations of Christians, since salvation can be effected only according to the economy (pattern) established by Christ as known in the scriptures and tradition. Therefore, this implies that the death and resurrection of the Savior must be made present in the action of the liturgy itself. Otherwise, no real participation by Christians can take place.

This position, according to Casel, was not simply a retrieval of the tradition, a value in itself; it provided for a response to alienation by positing the co-activity of the members of the body of Christ in the offering of the sacrifice of praise.

Casel found his strongest support for the logic of his mystery theology in Rom 6: 1-11. Here Paul asserts that in baptism, the Christian dies to sin with Christ and rises with him now to new life. Casel claimed that in baptism we have a sacrament, a liturgical-mystery (Kultmysterium) in which the death and resurrection of Christ are re-actualized in order that the Christian may realize justification (being set in right-relation to God) by union with the Savior. So, unless that saving act of the Lord is somehow re-presented, how can anyone die together with Christ?

Casel's use of words is crucial. He uses verbs like gegenwärtigsetzen and vergegenwärtigen which mean to re-present or make present, and not darstellen which means to exhibit, as if the object is outside of the situation.

Method

Casel invoked the NT far more frequently than the OT to support his doctrine of the mysteries, and cited the letters of Paul, especially Romans, Ephesians, and Colossians. For Casel, Romans 6 makes Paul a major exponent of mystery theology. Casel's use of Romans 6 reveals his three-pronged method: (1) the manner of interpreting scripture, (2) the use of the patristic writings, and (3) the use of the Hellenistic mystery cults as a framework within which to articulate the meaning of Christian liturgical activity.

Use of Scripture

Casel's scriptural method consisted generally in the use of Dom Simon Striker's exegesis of Romans 6, where Paul speaks of a death and resurrection. A synthesis of Striker's exegesis follows: (1) The destiny of Christians unfolds in a manner parallel to the destiny of Christ. Christ is dead and risen and lives for God. Likewise, Christians are dead to sin and risen to that new life, and must, therefore, walk in the newness of that life.

(2) The destiny of the baptized does not unfold exactly in a parallel manner to that of Christ. The baptized do not die as Christ died, but with Christ. Therefore, the baptized die neither alongside Christ nor after him. (3) The baptized die with Christ because they die in Christ, that is, in the death of Christ. The death and resurrection of the baptized is a participation in the death and resurrection of Christ. (4) The death of the baptized is realized in the homoïoma (Gleichbild, reproduction) of the death of Christ. (5) Since the resurrection is inseparably bound to the death of Christ, the baptized participate infallibly in the resurrection of Christ as well. Nevertheless, Christ does not at first make the baptized participate indirectly in his life as well as his death. The baptized are inserted first into the death of Christ in order to be thereby inserted into his life. (6) It is only by faith that we have the certitude of the reality of the new life which is received in baptism.

Obviously, the meaning of v. 5 is crucial: "For if we have been united with him in a death like his, we shall certainly be united with him in a resurrection like his." Therein lies the word homoïoma. Casel, following Striker, gave that verse the following meaning: in fact, we have become one with Christ by the reproduction of his death, then we will also participate in the resurrection. The word homoïoma is translated in several ways. According to Theodore Filthaut, German exegetes most often used the word Ähnlichkeit or resemblance. Dom Striker rejected that as too abstract. For him, homoïoma has a concrete meaning which the word resemblance does not render satisfactorily. Homoïos really means "essentially identical under another form." Striker cites Mt 22:39 as a supporting example: "The second (obligation) is homoïa as the first."

Philologically, the word homoion itself mean "a copy which is filled with the same reality as its model." Hence, Striker's translation with the word Gleichbild or reproduction. Baptism is, therefore, the complete copy of the death of Jesus; the death of Jesus is present in the baptismal action.

It followed for Casel that if the one death of Christ is not present in the baptismal action, Christ cannot die in the baptized and the baptized cannot die the death of Christ, but rather, Christ would have to suffer another death than the death on the cross. But, the death on the cross is present; and that death is brought so close to the baptized that they can there "die with" Christ. The baptized are crucified "with," die "with" and are buried "with" Christ. The most important act of Christ, his saving death, becomes present in baptism in such a way that the baptized acquire a participation in that act.

It seems that Casel was not interested in presenting a detailed exegetical study, but a simple explication of that text which proposed to be nothing but a direct presentation. He stated that his method was: "Let us read what is written (scripture itself) and let us understand what we have read . . . then we shall have fulfilled the duty of perfect faith." From this perspective, the true job of the theologian is to discard the weakness and foolish manner of earthly thinking, and to widen all the impasses of this imperfect form of insight in devoted expectation of true learning. The path of learning is faith, although the pneuma precedes the capacity to believe; this leads to gnosis (knowledge of God) and beyond sophia (God-like wisdom) to the point where one gives up the rational and falls into the delightful state of agape and surrender to divine revelation.

Consequently, Casel maintained that the method of scriptural interpretation must be pneumatic. It is not human writing, but is written out of the inspiration (breathing-upon) of the Holy Spirit by the will of the Father through Jesus Christ. It contains and conveys mystical plans in a symbolic manner.

Use of the Fathers

In addition to this approach to scripture, Casel marshalled a formidable host of the Fathers of the church. He believed they had used the vocabulary of the Hellenistic mystery cults, and saw in their writings an articulation of his thesis on the objective presence of the saving activity of Christ in the liturgy. To mention a few: Origen, Justin, Tertullian, Cyprian, Athanasius, Gregory of Nazianzus, Ephrem of Syria, John Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Augustine, Ambrose, Maximus the Confessor, Leo the Great, Bede, and Paschasius Radbertus. Casel returned to these sources because he believed that from the 9th century on, the corporate ecclesiology manifested in the NT and patristic writings had been lost. With this loss, theology concentrated on articulating the real presence of the body and blood of Christ to such an extent that the real presence of the sacrifice of Christ, as articulated by the Fathers, became buried in the rubble of the controversy over the manner of the real presence of the body and blood under the forms of bread and wine. In the Fathers, Casel saw the doctrine that salvation is obtained not by a simple application of Christ, but by a mystical and real participation in the life, death and resurrection of Christ here and now, in the time of the church. By initiation and thereafter in the celebration of the eucharist, Casel argued that the total identification of the Christian with the person of Christ comes about, and in this way, the Christian lives the life of Christ.

By joining his perceived insights from the Fathers with his use of Romans 6, Casel argued that, if for Christ death was real, that is, soul was really separated from body, then, in initiation, the Christian is inserted into the likeness, the pattern of Christ's death and suffering, and in this way truly experiences the reality of salvation. The saving activity of Christ is, therefore, objectively beyond human control, yet made available for salvation.

Understanding of Pagan Mystery Religions

Casel's constant stress on the objective presence of the saving activity of Christ was a response to the excessively anthropocentric, subjective, rationalistic concept of religion against which he was struggling. In opposition to that attitude, he insisted that Christianity was not a "religion" in that sense, but a Mystery.

From his study of the history of religions, Casel believed that he had found in the pagan mystery cults a ritual type which could lend support for his argument that the saving activity of Christ was objectively present in Christian liturgy. According to Casel's understanding, the lord of a mystery cult is a god who has entered into human misery and struggle, and made his appearance on earth and fought here, suffered, even, been defeated; the whole sorrow of humanity in pain is brought together in mourning for the god who must die. But, then, in some way, the god returns to life, and the god's companions and the whole of nature revive and live on. Yet, since the world is always in need of life, the manifestation of the god goes on and on, in cult-worship, that is, the saving act of the god is performed over and over. Worship is, therefore, the way of making the saving act real once more.

Even though this understanding of the mystery cults has been proven inaccurate, it is understandable that Casel would have seen this language and ritual type as supportive of his thesis on the objective presence of Christ in the liturgical activity of the church.

Evaluation of Mystery Theology

(1) The mystery theology of Odo Casel is part of the over-all effort of Catholic theologians during the first decades of the 20th century to break out of a theological method which found it difficult to relate divine activity and human response. Along with such figures as R. Guardini, P. Parsch, J.A. Jungmann, K. Adam, and many others, Casel saw a return to the sources of the early church and patristic writings, not simply as the way to escape the confines of neo-Scholasticism, but as a way to address the individualism inherent in that system and the alienation which flowed from it. Hence, Casel insisted that mystery theology was not just any theological system, but rather the expression of the primordial belief of the church. From his perspective, medieval Scholasticism, as well as its expression in neo-Scholasticism, had damaged the core of the faith and had deviated from it by alleging to be the norm for theological discourse. His own and others' return to the sources was motivated by a desire for radical reform, indeed by the desire to return to language which could bear the weight of the core of Christianity.

(2) Since the appearance of mystery theology, biblical scholarship has determined that the concept of mystery used by both Paul and the Fathers of the church is rooted in the Jewish tradition, rather than in the Hellenistic mystery cults.

(3) Granting that Casel's use of the pagan mystery cults was misunderstood, and indeed that his understanding of them was itself inadequate, his purpose in drawing an analogy between them and Christian liturgy was not. He intended to move from a common understanding of pagan worship to an understanding of the content and significance of the liturgical-sacramental actions of the church. He did not intend to argue for a genetic dependency upon or derivation of the sacraments from pagan religions. Rather, given the renewed interest in the history of religions at that time, he argued that the use of the same terminology by Paul and the Fathers indicated a fundamental analogy, not at the level of content, but in the manner of expression.

Casel found in pagan practices what he thought was an apt structure and language by which he could explain the relationship of the Christian to the "once-for-all" saving activity of Christ. Rather than the current form of mysticism which emphasized individual piety to the point of "auto-soteriology," the ancient structure seemed to be able to express the sovereign activity of God in Christ in the Christian sacraments. Needless to say, Casel knew that the moment one affirms that that dependence is at the level of content, the originality and uniqueness of the Christian revelation is compromised.

(4) Casel's primary purpose in returning to the sources, however, was to elucidate the unique mode of spiritual knowledge inherent in corporate, liturgical activity. From this starting point, the gnosis (knowledge of God) bestowed in the sacramental activity of the gathered church is not knowledge which leads to an escape from the world. For, given the incarnation of the Word of God in Jesus the Christ and the union of Christians with Christ, the sacraments of the church are not "mere symbols" but real symbols; they reveal and make present the saving activity of Christ in human history through the church.

(5) Mystery theology did not want to say that the liturgy is a mere instrument of the mediation of grace, whereby grace is understood simply as an "effect" of the once-and-for-all saving activity of Christ. Rather, Casel wanted somehow to articulate the "simultaneousness" of the liturgical-sacramental activities of the church with the "charter event" which brought the church into existence: the saving activity of Christ, which extends beyond space and time to all generations of Christians. By articulating the union of Christians with the Savior, he believed he had been able to set forth the faith of the church that the sacraments effect what they signify, that is, accomplish what they mean: salvation through union with the Savior by "imitation of his mysteries" in the liturgy of the church.

Enduring Challenge

While it is true that the perceived authority of the mystery religions has been definitively questioned, as has the thesis that Paul and the Fathers freely used Hellenistic mystery language to posit the objective presence of the saving activity of Christ in the sacraments, the fundamental contribution of mystery theology remains a major impulse for the on-going spiritual and theological renewal of the church. In the intervening years, mystery theology could well be understood not only as an example of what David Tracy has named the "analogical imagination" in theological method, but also, and for that reason be recognized to be a major source for liturgical theology.

The contribution of mystery theology to the retrieval of the notion of the church as a living organism is certainly present in the 1945 encyclical of Pius XII, Mystici Corporis, and Casel himself believed that the 1947 encyclical of Pius XII, Mediator Dei, had vindicated the basic insights of mystery theology. Its impact is obvious in the 1963 Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, promulgated by the Second Vatican Council. Further, ecumenical theology has directly considered its contents, especially with regard to the articulation of the sacramental representation of the saving act of Christ. This specific contribution addressed the incorrect notion, in Protestant circles, that Catholic theology asserts the "repe-tion" of the sacrifice of the cross in the celebration of the eucharist. The regard for this corrective is evidenced by the direct reference to mystery theology in the 1952 report of the Faith and Order Commission of the World Council of Churches. Its influence is also found in the 1982 report, Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry.

The longing for mystery, which Casel observed during the early decades of this century, continues today. The challenge of Vatican II to address the relation and confrontation between faith and culture, that is, "of scrutinizing the signs of the times and interpreting them in the light of the Gospel" (G.S., 4), was issued by Casel and many others. The idea of considering the Mystery, the Totally Other, as manifested in Christ in and through the church, remains an enduring challenge, especially in technological cultures which devalue persons, and in which persons themselves experience alienation from self, others and God.

Casel's passion for mystagogy, that is, for the explanation of the mystery made flesh in Christ and now present in his members at worship, is richly fruitful for the contemporary effort to speak of the various modes of Christ's presence in human life. His notion of gnosis, Spirit-given knowledge of God in the sacramental celebrations of the church, gives support to the efforts of religious anthropologists, that is, to the articulation of the mode of knowledge available only in corporate, ritual activities. The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy simply asserts these insights: "The liturgy does not exhaust the entire activity of the Church (9). . . . Nevertheless, the liturgy is the summit toward which the activity of the Church is directed; at the same time it is the fountain from which all her power flows" (10). Further, in comparing private or personal spirituality with liturgical spirituality, the constitution reads: "Popular devotions . . . should be so drawn up that they harmonize with the liturgical seasons, accord with the sacred liturgy, are in some fashion derived from it, and lead the people to it, since the liturgy by its very nature far surpasses any of them" (13).

Christo-Ecclesial Theocentrism

Casel's anthropological approach to mystagogy was grounded on the conviction that all events of grace are rooted in nature which is embraced and transformed by grace. Any other explanation of the relation of grace to the world and human existence would be a denial of the incarnation, that is, a rejection of the radical union of the Word of God and human nature in Christ.

From this perspective, Casel fixed the core and very being of Christianity in the phenomena of the liturgical-sacramental activity of the church in which the Christ-mystery is made present, and in which Christians are joined together in Christ by the power of God. This concentration on liturgical-event resisted the approach of neo-Scholasticism, with its stress upon objective divine power to the point of understanding the faithful as passive recipients of grace, an effect in the soul; further, it confronted anthropological individualism, with its stress on subjective piety to the point of denying the corporate nature of the church. In as much as the liturgical-sacramental activities are not carried out in individualistic isolation, but essentially in the context of the assembled church, Christians are drawn into a posture before God in Christ which cannot ignore the radically social nature of the experience of salvation.

As Arno Schilson has shown, this Christo-ecclesial theocentrism remains a challenge today. For Casel's theocentrism was not one which imagined the Totally Other God in a disjunctive relationship to human history, but one which saw humanity as oriented to God in its innermost being through the merciful gift of the incarnation. Hence, humanity finds its true salvation in a posture of adoration.

This God-language at first glance may appear similar to the dialectical theology of K. Barth, E. Brunner, and others. However, precisely because of its anthropological consideration of humanity as grounded in and oriented to God, it is best associated with the dialogical personalism of R. Guardini or the transcendental theology of K. Rahner.

By concentrating the whole reality of Christian faith on the living celebration of the liturgy and sacraments, Casel powerfully counter-acted the neo-Scholastic conceptual fragmentation of the faith into a collection of isolated truths and norms: Christian existence is oriented to God, in Christ, through the church, and therefore through the experience of Christ himself and his saving activity in the liturgy and the sacraments. Such a summary demands no specialized theological training, since it transcends all time-bound formulations of the faith, and is preserved from the burden of philosophical abstractions. In the liturgy, both learned theologian and any other Christian stand before the Mystery, intimately united to the perfect act of faith, obedience and worship of Christ, the Mystery made flesh. The dynamic kernel of Christianity is known, as in no other way, in the liturgical praxis of the church.

While it is true that mystery theology never pretended to be a complete, systematically organized account of the faith, its anthropologically grounded Christo-ecclesial theocentrism is increasingly recognized as a source for a systematic theology. Its concentrated attention to praxis is a rich source for liturgical theology, especially in the on-going effort to reform the rites as concrete expressions of the reality of faith: Christ at prayer in his members. Therein rests the ability to overcome the sometimes perceived dichotomy between word and sacrament, as well as a powerful source for recognizing the public worship of the church as a primary source for Christian moral knowledge, and the demanding ethics which bind worship and social justice.

NATIVE AMERICAN RITUAL

Vatican II opened the door for indigenous liturgy. "Even in the liturgy the Church does not wish to impose a rigid uniformity in matters which do not involve the faith or the good of the whole community. Rather does she respect and foster the various races and nations" (S.C., 37).

The council also invited all peoples to be at home in the liturgical forms that are theirs. "Mother Church earnestly desires that all the faithful should be led to that full, conscious, and active participation in liturgical celebrations which is demanded by the very nature of the liturgy. . . ." (S.C., 14). "In the restoration and promotion of the sacred liturgy the full and active participation by all the people is the aim to be considered before all else" (ibid). In speaking about liturgical rites and symbols, the constitution goes on to say: "The Christian people, as far as it is possible, should be able to understand them with ease and take part in them fully, actively and as a community" (S.C., 21). These words of the council are particularly relevant to Native American peoples.

Knowing the mandate of Vatican II, and speaking in simple words, I would define ritual, as it applies to Native American peoples, as an external expression of an internal reality. Ritual, which is more clearly expressed in our Native culture as ceremony, is intimately related with the land. Our "traditional" ceremonies are founded in our myths which narrate the way we view the creation. Our ceremonies and stories show us how we are a part of the whole family of creation and of how and why people act as they do.

The spirituality of our people, which is based on and drawn from all that is mentioned above, has to deal, first of all, with the "world view" of our people, on which all ritual must be based.

World View: the Basis of Ritual

Charles Kraft (Christianity in Culture, 55-57) names the significance of "world view." The world view of a person, or a society, is one's basic view of reality around one's self. It touches the how and why things got to be as they are and how and why they change. It is the "theology" of the individual and society. The world view of the person judges and evaluates the values and goals of society. It is the ground for the supernatural.

World view encourages the person or society to continue or to take over situations in their experience: birth, death, illness, puberty, marriage, planting and harvest, uncertainty and elation. This is often done through ritual or ceremony, in which many people participate: some by prayer, some by trance. The person or community is provided security and support for their behavior. World view integrates, systematizes and orders a person's or society's perception of reality. It shows what reality should be like. It understands and interprets the many events of life. In all this it establishes and validates basic premises about the world and men and women's place in it. World view also relates the striving and emotions of each person to his/her perceptions of reality.

How we look at reality determines how we approach God and how we see God. It also determines how we are going to celebrate this relationship to God in our daily lives as a person or as a community or society.

In the western culture, which brought the truth about Jesus and Christianity, we see a world view of creation and the land as that of a relationship of dominance and subservience. The world view of the Native American person and society, in contrast, is that of relationship of equals. The world and all of creation is family together. Creation is not to be controlled but is and does empower us in our daily life and relationships. The sacred history of our peoples contains all the creation stories, legends of who we are as a people, where we came from, and who we are today. There are about 450 different traditions of peoples with whose sacred stories Christian spirituality and ritual has to deal. There are many teachings, in all the tribes, that are similar. How each tribe celebrates these teachings differs.

Native Ritual: Native Ceremony

For the Native person ceremonies are not occasions for display, they are a necessity. The prime reason for having a ceremony is to restore or ensure the health of an individual. The mystical spillovers from the ritual benefits the health of everyone who attends. The ritual heals the spirit as well as the body. It heals the community, drawing those in attendance together into the mystical body of the people" (Hurdy, p. 152). Hurdy's description of ceremony brings out a world view of a people who have a close relationship with the land.

Liturgy (ritual and ceremony) has to do with the expression of our selves and our way of being religious. It draws us to become who we really are in relationship to God and to each other as community. It is the external expression of our internal relationship to God and neighbor. This external expression of our internal relationship should both assist us and empower us to become who we are to be in the family of creation. In our Native ceremonies, therefore, we allow our relatives of the world to assist us. We do not use the "things" we use in our ceremonies as objects to be used. We pray in thanksgiving as with a relative who shares of self and life to empower us to become who we should be in relationship to God, to self, to community. Even when we go to gather the medicines (our prayer objects) of the people we give thanks for the life of what we have picked. We pray for the continuance of the life of the family of the sweet-grass, the tobacco, the sage and the cedar. I mention these because these are four of the medicines that I use when I pray. Every tribe has medicines that are proper to their ceremonies.

Ceremonies in our tribes are owned by certain people. The person who has the right to conduct a certain ceremony is gifted with this or that ceremony by the people because of a certain respect they have in the community. Among the Navajo, as in many of our tribes, it takes a lifetime of prayer and learning to own even one ceremony. It requires "an incredible feat of memory to hold clearly in mind to the last detail the symbols and their position, the colors and materials of the dry paintings, the equipment, the elaborate rituals, the dances, the hour long chants" (Hurdy, p. 153).

Certain people are given the right to conduct a sweat, to carry a pipe, to perform the many ceremonies of our Native American life. In all the ceremonies there are different people who have the right to do certain ceremonies that make up the total ritual. Take for example, my medicine lodge. There are certain peoples to drum and sing, certain songs to be sung. There is the oshkahawis, who is the helper in the ceremonies. There is the hotaweinini, who is the fire tender. There are the teachers, the elders. Each person has special ceremonies which are proper to each thing they do.

Ritual: Our Way of Being Christian

Richard McBrien says that Christian spirituality is "the cultivation of a style of life consistent with the presence of the Spirit of the Risen Christ within us and with our status as members of the Body of Christ. Christian spirituality has to do with our way of being Christian, in response to the call of God issued through Jesus Christ in the power of the Holy Spirit" (Catholicism, vol. II, 1057f).

Western Christianity has been brought to the Native American in the western world view, and has done violence to the spirituality of the Native peoples of the Americas. The rituals that have been given to us are foreign to how we experience our view of the world. Perhaps this is why we see the great dichotomy of 80 percent of some tribes being baptized Catholics and only 5 percent living the sacramental life of the church. How can the Native peoples respond to "this call of God issued through Jesus Christ...?"

In the document on liturgy the council fathers clearly state that the liturgy "is made up of unchangeable elements divinely instituted, and elements subject to change. These latter not only may be changed but ought to be changed with the passage of time, if they have suffered from the intrusion of anything out of harmony with the inner nature of the liturgy or have become less suitable Christian people, as far as is possible should be able to understand them with ease and take part in them fully, actively, and as a community" (S.C., 21). The elements of Christian liturgy that can be changed need to be translated into the world view of the Native American people.

I have explained some aspects of ritual, ceremony, as it exists among our Native American peoples. This is not an exhaustive treatment of the subject. There are many different ways of existing and many possible rituals that can be drawn from the many tribes of Indian people. One example of a Christian use of Native American ceremony can be found in the Native ceremony of purification which can easily be used as the reconciliation rite in the eucharist (See, Hascall, "Native American Liturgy," in Liturgy, 7, 1, 1988, pp. 35-39).

Native American Ritual

Spirituality is the heart of the struggle of our Native people to be strong and proud as individuals and as a people. This spirituality is closely tied to the land and to all of creation. The land gives us strong religious experiences, which nurture and renew our experience of God and our relationships with each other. In the past we have been forced to separate from our reality what spirituality is. What was sacred to us was seen as pagan. The loss of a strong spirituality among the Native peoples can be attributed to our being alienated from the land and being put on reservations. Many have rejected their spirit ways and are now lost in the rapidly changing world. Instead of full, conscious and active participation in the rituals of the church, which the council fathers envisioned, we see alienation. Those people who try to adapt their world view to this new world view struggle in faith.

If we are to come to this "understanding with ease and taking part fully, actively, and as a community" among the Native peoples of this country, there has to be the sincere dialogue between the two world views of reality. We must search the rituals, ceremonies, myths and legends of the Native peoples and find Jesus, who is the Truth, find Christ who is already present in the ceremonies and teachings of our peoples. We must look at the sacred history of all the tribes of our peoples to see how our reality of God has taught us and led us to worship, which is the purpose of all religious ritual. We must search the ceremonial celebrations of life that are already present in the Native people's lives and draw forth the Christ who is already there.

I cannot tell what these rituals will be or who will perform these ceremonies. That is the future. What can we do today to allow the people to grow into that which the Father wants us to be?

OILS, SACRED, HOUSING FOR

The housing for the sacred oils is called an "ambry"; the word comes from the Latin word for "armory." The Christian needs protection on natural levels beyond the graces asked in the seven sacraments. The oils, in the tradition of the church, symbolize the graces asked over and above the supernatural graces asked in the sacrament.

There are three oils brought to the parochial churches from the diocesan center at Eastertime. Blessed by the bishop these oils signify the universal charisms of the church for healing, consecration (chrism), and faith building (oil of the catechumens). The first is for blessing the sick and asking the healing of mind, body, spirit from God through the ministry of the church. The second is used in the consecration of priests, bishops, and the church building itself—consecration for the service of the church. The third oil is for asking at baptism for the blessing of God in the natural gifts of the neophyte so that they might be shared with the body of Christ. The three oils obviously have connection with baptism, the sacrament of the sick (the reserved eucharist), and the ambo, altar, and presidential seat (the places from which the priest and deacon are ordained to preside). So an ambry has an appropriate place of reservation near baptistry, tabernacle, or sanctuary. Since it is, however, in baptism itself that all other ministries are implied for all Christians, the ambry's most appropriate place in the church building is at the baptism entry because all Christians, nourished by Christ's sacraments, are baptized into his death, and called to share in his priesthood through ministry.

ORDERS, SACRAMENT OF

This article will treat of the sacrament of orders in the Western church from a Roman Catholic perspective, and in the main the approach will be historical. It does not attempt to identify a series of periods through which to trace the history of orders. It indicates elements, questions, processes and changes that are historically important and so contribute to the understanding of the issue today. Since the ordination of women belongs to a separate article, this is not considered here even in its historical aspects.

The New Testament

The present state of scholarship demands great caution in our speaking about ordination, its meaning or its rites in the NT. The words "ordain" and "ordination" are not found there, and there is considerable disagreement about the extent to which this later Christian use may coincide with the categories of the NT and with its pattern, or varied patterns, of understanding, vocabulary and practice.

The evidence suggests that the church had both unity and differentiation from the beginning. There is equality based on baptism: equality nevertheless that requires authority, leadership; that is structured and maintained as a unity through special ministers. Ministry rather than order or status is the predominant emphasis: a mission to be accomplished, a task to be done, rather than a class to be entered or a status to be attained. These differences should not be exaggerated: ministry may well involve position, and a mission may carry with it or may require a certain personal status, and ministers may be grouped together because of the nature of their function.

Ministry does not arise merely out of sociological pressure; its necessity is found at a deeper level in the person and mission of Jesus Christ. The entire ministry is ultimately the work of God (1 Cor 12:6), the gift of Christ (Eph 4:7-12) and of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 12:4-11; cf. Acts 20:28) in and through and for the church, the body of Christ. The most important forms of ministry can be characterized as those of leadership: preaching the gospel and founding new churches, supervising and nurturing the growth of the young churches, leading the communities as they become established. This ministry of leadership manifests itself in a variety of activities: instruction, encouragement, reproof, visitation, appointment and supervision of some ministries, and so on—all that is demanded by the task of building up the body of Christ.

Scholars are not agreed about the manner in which such Christian leaders came into being in the early church. The recent trend has been towards the view that leaders emerged or were appointed in different ways in different communities with different church orders. Is there any evidence of a rite associated with this? Rather than discuss the question simply as a NT issue, it seems best to look at it with an eye to subsequent developments.

The NT mentions the laying-on of hands on four main occasions that could be important for our consideration of the sacrament of orders (Acts 6:6; 13:3; 1 Tm 4:14; 2 Tm 1:6; and cf. 1 Tm 5:22). Scholars do not agree on the background to this Christian action, whether it was borrowed from a supposed Jewish rite of ordination or was derived from more general OT influences or was primarily a Christian introduction. Nor is there agreement that in these instances the function and the meaning of the gesture are the same.

In Acts 6:6 the seven are chosen in Jerusalem by the whole body of disciples for appointment by the apostles, who pray and lay their hands upon them. In Acts 13:1-3 Barnabas and Saul are set apart in the church at Antioch for a mission in obedience to a command of the Holy Spirit. After fasting and prayer they (the prophets and teachers? others?) lay hands on Barnabas and Saul and send them on their mission. They are understood to be sent out by the Holy Spirit (13:4). In neither of these cases do scholars agree about the function or the meaning of this imposition of hands. The second especially may have been no more than a blessing or the acknowledgment of a mandate (cf. Acts 14:26, which may interpret this rite in saying that they were commended to the grace of God for this work). One other text from Acts makes an interesting parallel. According to 14:23, Paul and Barnabas appointed elders in every church with prayer and fasting. The mention of prayer and fasting and the absence of reference to the laying-on of hands are worth noting, though it could well be that the latter is presupposed.

Although there is also disagreement as to the meaning of the imposition of hands in the two instances from the pastoral epistles (1 Tm 4:14; 2 Tm 1:6), perhaps there is a firmer consensus that it is part of what may be called with greater confidence an ordination rite. The choice of Timothy may have been made by prophetic utterance (1 Tm 1:18; 4:14; cf. Acts 13:2) and the core of the rite by which he was commissioned is presented as the laying-on of hands done by the body of presbyters and by Paul (1 Tm 4:14; 2 Tm 1:6). Probably this was done in public (cf. 2 Tm 2:2 "before many witnesses"). In or through this rite a spiritual gift, a gift of God, has been conferred. This gift is at the service of the word, strengthening Timothy to bear public witness to the gospel (2 Tm 1:8-14). He is warned "not to neglect"; he is to "rekindle" this gift of God that he has received and in fact the last two chapters of 1 Timothy envisage a broad range of responsibility for the apostolate and the community. It is a power that enables him to carry out his ministry, a charism for the office that he has received. Here we have the makings of a later explicitly "sacramental" understanding of such a rite.

No doubt these texts, partial as they are, represent different situations of time and place. They may not simply be collated in the expectation that the ensemble will provide the ordination rite of the early church or of St Paul. Scholars maintain that the pattern of ministry, its understanding and its mode of appointment or recognition, may be more varied than has been acknowledged in the past. In addition, as has been pointed out, the precise influences that led to the Christian use of the laying-on of hands are unclear and so the meaning of this action, and in some cases its role, are also unclear. It is not evident that some such form was always and everywhere used during the NT period or indeed for some time after it, nor is there any probability that all these elements were present on all occasions. But neither can it be proved from the evidence of the NT that such a form was exceptional. Elements do undoubtedly emerge from the church of the NT that will influence all later generations and that will in fact endure.

Subject to all the qualifications that have been made, the following may serve as a summary of some of the points from the NT that will be prominent also in the subsequent tradition. In the appointment of ministers to positions of leadership the whole local body of the church and yet also particular ministers or groups of ministers have an important role. The context of worship, of prayer and fasting is mentioned, suggesting a liturgical setting and referring the ministry and appointment to it to God. Hands are laid on the candidate by a group within the church and/or by such individuals as Paul and Timothy. What the church does through its corporate action or through its leaders is regarded as inspired by the Holy Spirit, and through the church's choice and the liturgical action, God provides for the church and gives a spiritual gift that in some way endures. This inter-working of God-whole church-special ministers in the appointment of ministers is to be noted, as is the religious form of prayer-fasting-liturgical rite that is part of it.

Early Developments

During the 2nd century, episcopacy, presbyterate and diaconate emerge almost everywhere as the most important ministries and form what will be the universal pattern. From the letter of Clement onwards, correspondences are noted between the Jewish structure of authority and the Christian. Ignatius of Antioch already presents the bishop as an image of the Father, and here and elsewhere bishop, presbyter and deacon are related in a variety of ways to God and to Jesus Christ. These comparisons manifest the conviction that the existence and the pattern of this ministry in the church are willed by God and mediate the authority and the power of God. Between God and the church is Jesus Christ, who came from God and from whom the power and the authority of the church originated historically. In the 2nd and 3rd centuries, a consensus may not yet have emerged as to the way in which the church commissions these ministers.

Order, Ordain, Ordination. Clement of Rome and Irenaeus had employed the language of structure and function with regard to the church, but Tertullian is the first that we know to use the Latin words ordo-ordinare-ordinatio as part of the Christian terminology. The meaning the words have in his writings is that of the common usage of the time, but he extends this to certain Christian realities and actions, giving them a new application. He is followed closely by his fellow North African, Cyprian, and some of Cyprian's contemporaries. The terminology is still fluid at this stage and the words are not yet the technical terms that they will become later. Ordo for Tertullian generally denotes a certain group or class in the church and, with the adjectives ecclesiasticus or sacerdotalis, denotes at least the combined episcopacy, presbyterate and diaconate, which are thus distinguished from the plebs or laici. This ordo is marked by authority and function in the church. The word is thus strongly institutional. The verb ordinare and its noun ordinatio are used in a similar way. To ordain is to designate someone to some function, to install in a charge, to give a mandate. It is a juridical word, suggesting a legal act carried out by authority, and it fits well into an understanding of the church as structured in different groups distinguished by different responsibilities and powers. It conveys a markedly functional understanding of the act and its effects.

In broader usage the ordination could include the preparatory stages but in a more formal sense it was distinguished from the election of the candidate by the community. By ordination the minister is invested with his charge and with all the powers that it requires. There is strong and widespread evidence for the laying-on of hands, at least in the ordination of bishops, but it cannot be proved that this took place in every instance. However, it seems more plausible to hold that it was used also for the presbyterate and the diaconate. It may have been regarded as a sign, but not an essential one, of the intention to ordain the candidate to the particular charge. In some places the ordination of a bishop required the approval of neighboring bishops or provincial synods, thus showing concern for such ecclesial realities as the apostolic succession, the unity and communion of the churches in the universal church, and the personal and ecclesial standing of the new bishop.

Though this cluster of words conveys a primarily juridical understanding of the reality they refer to, there is also a spiritual side that is important. There is emphasis on the qualities of holiness demanded in the person to be ordained, on the acts of sanctification for which ordination grants authority and power and on the priestly nature of the order to which it gives access. The church's act of ordination is grounded on the will of God and the authority of Christ. God ordains and the church ordains, and these are in direct relation. The sanctifying mission of the church that has its origin in God and is derived through Christ is engaged, and through the act of the qualified leaders of the church the candidate is divinely empowered to sanctify. Thus while the early terminology of order and ordination is primarily juridical, from the beginning it is also spiritual and has clearly sacramental elements.

Ordination Rites. A picture that is different in some respects emerges from the Apostolic Tradition (written in Greek at Rome about 215 by Hippolytus). There bishop, presbyter and deacon are ordained (Hippolytus uses the word) by the bishop in a liturgical rite which has as its core the imposition of hand(s) accompanied by prayer. The bishop certainly (and probably the other ministers) was chosen by the whole community. The prayers provide a context of understanding for the ordination by referring to deeds of God in the OT or in the event of Christ and all pray for the gift of the Holy Spirit upon the candidate, indicating the tasks that the ministry involves.

Thus, by imposition of hand(s) and prayer the bishop—the qualified minister of ordination—accompanied by other bishops or other ministers and by the people, gives the church's commission. Through this ordination a gift of the Holy Spirit is communicated, a gift that is the ground of the ministry in question and that empowers the candidate for its exercise. This represents an understanding of ministry and commissioning for it for which there is evidence in the NT and which had been growing in confidence during the 2nd century.

The pattern of ordination so plainly given in Hippolytus will be followed in the later Roman rituals. The prayers will have the same general character; they will be strong in OT typology; they will continue to be addressed to the Father and to have a clearly trinitarian structure; they will have a petition for the gift of the Spirit and will set it in some relation to the tasks of the ministry and requisite qualities in the minister.

From all this there emerges the conviction that the ministry of leadership in its threefold form is a gift of God for the church, a gift foretold and prefigured in the OT, a gift that had its historical origin and was supremely manifest in Jesus Christ, a gift that God continues to make to the church through the Holy Spirit in each ordination. This is a gift to be acknowledged and proclaimed in a prayer that has a certain eucharistic quality, a gift to be prayed for humbly over the candidates. When the community of the church chooses its candidates, this is understood to be the expression or announcement of God's choice, as the rite of ordination is the act of the church through which God operates. In other words, no opposition is thought to exist between God and the church in the process and the rite of ordination. God announces and accomplishes the divine will through the church's election and its ordination; the church's action makes known and realizes God's provident gift. Through the church's act of ordination, then, the gift of the Holy Spirit is communicated to the candidate, conveying the ministry or function together with the spiritual empowerment required for its fulfilment. These are elements that later theologians will bring together in speaking of the sacrament of ordination.

Ordination rites will grow in importance and be acknowledged as the ground of these ministries. Whereas in the first two to three centuries it seems that one presided at the liturgy because of one's position as leader of the community, subsequently one is understood to preside and so to lead the community because one has been ordained.

Qualities. Five important qualities of ordination and of the ordained ministry should be noted from this period.

(a) Christological. Jesus, coming from God, is the historical origin of this authoritative ministry in the church, which therefore must always be related back to him. In his life he gave the supreme example of authentic ministry, and so he remains always the model. What he taught and preached must be passed on faithfully, so that the church's ministers must at all times be faithful to Christ's gospel. As the risen Lord he is active in the church through his Spirit and the Spirit's gifts. In carrying out his responsibility the minister is serving Jesus Christ, who is thus in a sense the goal of the ministry. This characteristic of ministers and ministry can be summed up in the phrases, "servants of Jesus Christ," "the service of Jesus Christ," understood in all their virtualities. It is much of this that is implied in the word increasingly used from the second century, "apostolic." The apostolic character of the ministry declared its authentic relationship to its historical origin in Jesus Christ, and so grounded its fidelity to him.

(b) Pneumatological. There is recurring reference to the role of the Holy Spirit in the provision of ministry and regular petition for the appropriate gift of the Spirit in the various rites of ordination.

(c) Ecclesial. The ecclesial character of ministry and ordination is particularly evident in these early centuries. Ministers are of the church and represent it, public figures of leadership in and for the community (recall the prohibition of absolute ordinations by the Council of Chalcedon), in many cases chosen by the whole people, ordained by the qualified minister of the church, the bishop, in the presence of all, and perhaps confirmed by neighboring churches. Public service in the church is the summary of the ministry.

(d) Priestly. As is well known, while the NT uses priestly terms both of Jesus and of the whole church, it does not do so of any Christian minister. It is only about the turn of the 2nd century that such an extension of sacerdotal vocabulary begins to be common: first of all and primarily with reference to the bishop and then more slowly and in a subordinate way of the presbyter (notably so in the Roman tradition). By the Carolingian era in the West there will be a change, and it will become more and more the practice to speak of the presbyter primarily as sacerdos. Involved in this change of usage there can be detected a practical and theological shift in the relationship between bishop and presbyter, to which we shall return. Priestly vocabulary was not generally extended to the deacon, and Hippolytus had said of him explicitly that he was not ordained to the priesthood. The introduction of priestly terminology and its increasingly widespread acceptance had enormous theological and practical consequences for the understanding and the exercise of the sacrament of orders.

(e) Persorial. The one ordained is not merely a functionary but a minister of Christ and of the church, so that his call requires a full personal response: commitment to this ministry and holiness of life in imitation of Christ.

Bishops, Presbyters, Deacons. The triple pattern of episcopacy-presbyterate-diaconate takes some time to emerge and to establish itself, but it then becomes universal in the church (though the Reformation will bring some break in the West). However, the functions of these orders and the relationships between them do not remain unchanged. The bishop becomes the focus of ministry, the center of leadership; the office mediates divine authority, involving supervision or leadership by the individual bishop and on the part of the whole episcopal college (a reality of which the patristic church was strongly conscious). But the exercise of this changes considerably as the territory of the bishops' episkope grows. The presbyterate, for some time primarily a council to advise the bishop, becomes more diversified: individual presbyters, regularly and no longer only in the absence of the bishop, carry out many formerly episcopal functions, emerging as leaders of areas and groups of Christians, preaching, presiding over the eucharist and other liturgical functions, so that the presbyterate becomes more markedly pastoral and liturgical in character. Throughout the patristic period deacons have important pastoral and administrative tasks in addition to their liturgical functions, and it will be some time before the deacon loses his strong and distinctive role in the church to become almost exclusively a liturgical minister overshadowed by the presbyter. It is important to note of all these that the ministry has a broad scope that is not exclusively or predominantly liturgical either in its exercise or in the way it is understood.

The Middle Ages

The theological contribution of the Scholastics in the 12th and 13th centuries was influenced by changes in the practical exercise of orders that had been taking place for several centuries previously, changes that reflected a sharpening of the distinction between laity and clergy and were part of an older and broader process of clericalization. With the spread of the church and the social organization of the time, the presbyter continued to establish himself and the functions of his ministry in a more defined and more independent way vis-a-vis the bishop (and also at the expense of the deacon). In practice he became the priest, the minister par excellence of the eucharist and of other sacraments too. Decline in the popular understanding of Latin and generally in the level of popular participation in the liturgy changed the relationship between him and the people and increased the emphasis on his sacramental power. Mass celebrated by the priest alone or with a single minister began to be common. There were changes too in the Roman ritual of ordination, which now came to incorporate investiture, anointing and the traditio instrumentorum. The last two would become important for the Scholastic discussion of the matter of the sacrament, while all three would enhance the perception of the ordained minister as a figure of sacred status and power. A more general change of great consequence was the gradual loss of communication and mutual influence between the churches of West and East.

The Sacrament of Orders. In the course of the 12th century "sacrament" came to be defined narrowly; orders was recognized as one of the seven sacraments, and "the sacrament of orders" became a technical term. In addition to the issues common to all the sacraments, this raised a number of particular questions. There had long been discussion about the number of orders, and this continued to be debated. The more common view emerged that there were seven orders, though there was less agreement that subdiaconate and the minor orders, recognized to be of ecclesiastical institution, were sacramental in the strict sense. The question was posed most acutely of the episcopacy, as we shall see. Theologians agreed that order was a single sacrament and not several, but they disagreed about the precise relationship between this unique sacrament and its several parts. For some, no one order had the fullness of the sacrament, which was constituted rather by all the orders taken together. However, the more common opinion was that the priesthood contained the fullness of the sacrament as being the fullness of order and that the other orders participated in this plenitude, being ordered to this single end. This view fit well into the widespread medieval way of understanding reality in terms of hierarchy, order and participation.

The Status of Episcopacy. The status of episcopacy and the relationship between it and the presbyterate were not new issues. Although in the patristic church episcopacy was commonly presented as the supreme order and the high priesthood, with the presbyterate, especially in the Roman rite of ordination, explicitly and emphatically designated as subordinate, from at least the time of St. Jerome and Ambrosiaster there had been another view. The proponents of this argued that presbyteroi and episkopoi were synonymous in the NT and maintained that bishop and presbyter were equal as priests, the difference between them being a matter of ecclesiastical institution related to authority. We have seen already the change in the way in which the term "priest" came to be applied to bishops and presbyters. Now the Scholastics posed the question: is episcopacy an order? Among theologians there developed a strong tendency to define orders with reference to the eucharist and to locate the essence of priesthood in the power over the body and blood of Christ exercised in the eucharist. Since in this precise respect the powers of bishop and of presbyter (now increasingly called "priest," sacerdos) are the same, the majority of theologians held that episcopacy in itself is not an order but an ecclesiastical honour, an office of jurisdictional power only, and so they denied it sacramental status. The contrast with the earlier tradition is obvious: the high priest of the liturgy, the pastor and teacher par excellence was in danger of becoming an administrator. Nevertheless, the memory of the past had not disappeared, and some theologians, together with canonists generally, tried to provide for the episcopal office within the scheme of orders. Others, too, recognized the special dignity of the episcopacy on the grounds that its power of jurisdiction is also a power over the body of Christ, the mystical body that is the church.

Character. A number of factors contributed to the development of the concept of character among the Scholastics, notably the earlier and continuing debate about the status of those ordained by a heretical or schismatic minister. The question had arisen in a corresponding way earlier for baptism, and the Scholastic theologians took up the words signaculum (seal) and character to provide the basis of an answer to the controverted question. The words were used by the Scholastics both of the external sacramental rite and of its interior effect, the inner reality that was the necessary effect of the celebration of the sacrament and that remained in the recipient in a permanent manner. In general theologians maintained that the character was a spiritual power or capacity, divinely given, enabling the recipient to carry out the proper ministerial functions. Because of the close link established between order and the eucharist, a number of theologians gave the character a christological interpretation, and it was St. Thomas more than anyone who developed and deepened this.

St. Thomas was strongly conscious that all Christian cult, with the eucharist at its center, is derived from the unique priesthood of Christ. Christ is the source of this and its true celebrant, and others can join in it only to the extent that he gives them this capacity, through the participation in his priesthood that they receive from him. This is precisely what the character is and does. It is "the character of Christ," a configuration to him, a sharing in his priesthood that empowers the Christian to have part in the whole Christian economy. This general presentation of the character applies analogously to baptism, confirmation and orders. St. Thomas' understanding of it in respect of orders can be dealt with appropriately through consideration of the phrase "in persona Christi."

In Persona Christi. In general this traditional phrase was originally used of biblical words, to attribute or refer to someone the words spoken by another, as if the one were represented in and spoke through the other. Hence in persona Christi meant that the words spoken should be referred or attributed to Christ.

During the Scholastic period, however, the use of the phrase underwent considerable development, particularly in respect to the eucharist, in a desire to determine the status of the biblical eucharistic words of Christ as spoken by the priest at the consecration. St. Thomas gave the phrase a technical sense, to mean that the consecratory words were spoken by the priest in the name of Christ, who so engages himself in the priest's speaking of the words that the deed is in fact his and not the priest's. The phrase is used almost exclusively of the eucharist by St. Thomas, but it is worth noting that on occasion he refers to the whole ministerial priestly action as action in persona Christi. He expresses a similar understanding in different terms in his teaching that the priest as minister is an instrument of Christ's own action. This power to act in persona Christi is conferred through the sacrament of priestly ordination, because there the priest is configured to Christ by the sacramental character, being made to share in Christ's priesthood. The character is permanent, which means that the minister's participation in Christ's priesthood, his priestly empowerment, cannot be lost.

St. Thomas' technical use of the phrase in persona Christi together with the somewhat broader expressions gerere personam, gerere vicem Christi sum up for his time and later in respect to the priesthood and the eucharist the earlier universal tradition that in the sacraments as celebrated by the ministers of the church Christ is present and active.

There was a similar traditional phrase, in persona ecclesiae, which resembled in persona Christi in that it indicated that words were spoken by someone in the name of the church. With the Scholastics, St. Thomas especially, it too was developed, so that in celebrating the eucharist the priest was said to offer the sacrifice, to proclaim faith, to utter the prayers in persona ecclesiae, though the use of the phrase was not confined to the eucharist or to the church's ministers. For the great Scholastics it acquired the sense that the church engages itself and its faith in the official cultic actions of its ministers so that they represent it and act with its authority and its sanctifying power. However, in persona Christi and in persona ecclesiae are not exactly parallel expressions, since the latter had a somewhat broader usage (for example, the server at Mass or even the unbaptized person who baptizes in emergency act in persona ecclesiae). Moreover, for St. Thomas while the validly ordained priest who has been rejected by the church does indeed act in persona Christi in celebrating the eucharist, he does not act in persona ecclesiae. Later this expression will largely lose its strong Scholastic sense and will come to be interpreted in a more juridical way, as if it were merely a matter of delegation to act in the name of the church.

The two phrases and the relationship between them are important for understanding the nature and function of the ordained ministry. Overwhelmingly but not exclusively cultic in their reference, they sum up the traditional datum that the Christian liturgy is an act both of Christ and of the church, and in their different ways they aim to state more exactly the role of the minister particularly in the celebration of the eucharist. They have entered into the Catholic theological tradition and express theological positions acquired and confirmed by later tradition. But they are still phrases of their time, from their own background of theology and practice. That theology lacked a developed ecclesiology, and neither theology nor liturgical practice was strong in attending to the role of the lay faithful in the celebration of the sacraments.

Thus in the Middle Ages the understanding of orders became more narrowly cultic. Theologians commonly defined order by its reference to the eucharist, and they characterized it in terms of spiritual power. The majority of the great Scholastics, including St. Thomas, held as the matter and form of the sacrament of priestly ordination the handing over of the chalice with wine and the paten with bread to the candidate together with the accompanying formulary, seeing in this the act that confers the essential priestly power.

Through all of this another change may be detected: the predominant image of the ordained person, formerly that of a minister, now became more sacral or hieratic. The central work of the ordained person was related to the eucharist, and a more sacral understanding was found to correspond well with this. In the ritual for ordaining priest and bishop a rite of anointing was introduced, and slowly the interpretation of the central prayer and of the rite as a whole changed. The earlier sense of the prayer has been referred to above, and in that sense it had also been spoken of as a "blessing" or "consecration" (which seem to have been equivalent). The blessing in early times might still have been understood in the Jewish sense as a prayer in which God is blessed. Later it was thought of as a prayer which sought the blessing of God on the candidate. Now it came to be interpreted as a prayer that blessed, or through which God blessed, the candidate, a prayer of consecration. And so, the ordained minister became a consecrated person, and in the case of bishop and priest the anointing served to confirm this. The investiture in appropriate apparel likewise can be interpreted in such a way as to reinforce the predominantly hieratic image that emerged. This new image of a sacral figure with sacred, spiritual power remained the dominant one until the changes set in motion by Vatican II.

It is easy to see how this sacral model of the priesthood can be linked to the strongly christological understanding involved in the phrase in persona Christi and the configuration to Christ on which this is based, to produce eventually the common conception of the priest as alter Christus. The connection is made directly and immediately between the individual and Christ. But the christological point of reference is almost exclusively liturgical, and in this respect is much narrower than what we have seen in the patristic period. And the ecclesiological reference too is inadequate, although order is presented as order in and for the church.

The 16th Century

The questions raised by the Reformation about the sacrament of orders arose chiefly from the more basic issues of justification, grace and good works, the nature and the application to us of Christ's redemption, etc. that were the ground of the 16th-century controversy. But there were also some more particular questions: is there a sacrament of orders in the church by the institution of Christ? Is the rite of ordination as practiced by the Catholic church a sacrament? What are the essential functions of such special ministry? How is this special ministry related to the priesthood of all believers? Issues such as these challenged both the current theology and the practical exercise of orders in the Catholic church.

The Council of Trent did not purport to give a full, worked-out theology of orders or priesthood. What it did was to defend on the basis of the church's long tradition the theology and practice of orders that it had received: in the face of attack it affirmed what it regarded as essential positions and legitimate practice, and it did so largely in the categories and the terms of the Scholastic theologians. In addition, it issued a set of reform decrees and attacked abuses, thus initiating a change in the context that had given rise to some more theological criticisms.

Thus Trent upheld a visible, external priesthood with its center in the eucharist and the remission of sin; this is not a priesthood belonging to all believers nor is it a simple ministry of preaching. Orders-ordination is a true and proper sacrament instituted by Christ; it is not simply the act of the people or of the candidate or of any secular power; by it the Holy Spirit is given and a permanent character is imprinted (the nature of this character is not determined). There is a hierarchy in the church that is divinely instituted, comprising several ranks; of these, bishops are superior to priests (but the precise ground of the superiority is not stated, so that Trent left open the question whether or not episcopacy as such belongs to the sacrament of order); the hierarchy also contains "ministers" (who are likewise unspecified). Thus Trent reaffirmed the traditional datum that the special ministry is not a human invention but the provision of God, and it reinforced this by its insistence on the true sacramentality of orders and ordination.

The strength of Trent was the long earlier tradition and particularly the great Scholastic synthesis on which it rested. Its weakness was its failure to come to grips with some of the issues raised by the Reformers together with the narrowness of the eucharistic base of the medieval theology of orders and priesthood. The teaching of Trent and the long anti-Reformation polemic that ensued combined to prolong the life and influence of this theology in the Catholic church down into the present century. It is only in the past few decades that new and broader theological thinking has made its impact.

The Second Vatican Council

The following summarizes some of the salient points of Vatican II on orders and priesthood.

(1) While the Scholastic framework of orders took the eucharist as its base,

Vatican II represented an important change in two respects: it preferred to start from the person and mission of Jesus Christ, and it broadened the scope beyond the liturgical to include teaching and pastoral leadership. The church's ministry is essentially related to that of Jesus. As he was prophet/teacher, priest and king/pastor, so the church shares in his work of teaching, sanctifying and shepherding/ruling.

(2) Vatican II explicitly and deliberately affirmed that episcopacy is the fullness of orders. As we have seen, medieval theologians commonly had identified the presbyterate as the highest degree of orders, seeing in the episcopacy a dignity or office superior in its authority or power of jurisdiction but not in its power of orders. From the post-Reformation period onwards there had been a change of theological opinion, but it was not until Vatican II that this was given such authoritative corroboration. This teaching rejoins the common tradition of the patristic church; it enhances the episcopal office by giving it a sacramental rather than a jurisdictional foundation. This means that the episcopal functions of teaching, sanctifying and pastoral leadership are grounded on the sacrament itself—and hence on Christ—and not on papal delegation. It also strengthens the basis of episcopal collegiality, since membership of the college of bishops too derives from the sacrament and not from any other authority.

(3) The result of this is to make the episcopacy rather than the presbyterate the primary theological reference point of orders and priesthood. This was accompanied by restoration of the ancient idea of the presbyterium, the single priestly body formed by the presbyters together in communion with their bishop. It also rejoins another element from the early centuries, the understanding that the presbyters formed a sort of council of advisers to the bishop. Thus the interrelationship of episcopacy and presbyterate is stressed. This does not make the individual priest the delegate of the bishop any more than the bishop is the delegate of the pope, since the sacrament of ordination—and therefore the call of the Lord—rather than episcopal empowerment is the source of the presbyteral ministry.

(4) The council had little to say about the diaconate, but subsequent developments opened the possibility that it might emerge in time as a full and permanent ministry once again.

(5) Thus not only did the council modify considerably the Catholic church's theological presentation of orders but it also aimed to strengthen the different orders and the network of relationships between them.

(6) Vatican II also recognized unambiguously the apostolate of all the baptized, the participation that all Christians have in the triple function of Christ through the sacraments of initiation. At the same time, it asserted an essential difference between the common priesthood of the faithful and the ministerial priesthood while acknowledging that they are ordered one to the other.

(7) All of this opened up new possibilities, but Vatican II could not work out fully either theologically or practically all the relationships that are involved (between the mission and ministry derived from the sacraments of initiation and that derived from ordination, for example, or between episcopal collegiality and papal power). Much was incomplete, as the succeeding years have shown. Nevertheless, a different model of ministry began to emerge, more dynamic, multi-dimensional, ecclesiological, and a strong impetus was given to renewal and innovation.

Conclusion

What does it mean to speak of the sacramentality of orders? It is to recognize the mystery of the church, that it is the fundamental sacrament of salvation. Ultimately it is the economy of God revealed and realized in Jesus Christ by the Holy Spirit that justifies and requires this ministry in the church; it is this trinitarian mystery of salvation that grounds it. The experience of history has shown that this ministry is referred in a double way to Christ: to his historical mission and ministry, which is the origin, exemplar and reference point of the church's mission and ministry; to his abiding presence in the church, as head of his body, in his Holy Spirit. And it is referred to the Holy Spirit, who accomplishes in the church the mystery first achieved in Christ.

The sacramentality of orders proclaims that the church does not exist of itself or for itself or by its own resources. What it preaches is the gospel of Christ entrusted to it. Its work of sanctifying can begin and end only in God through Jesus Christ in the Holy Spirit. What it is to build up is the body of Christ—and ultimately the aim for which it organizes itself is the Kingdom of God. Sacramentality also proclaims that the ministerial activity of these orders is a genuine and efficacious preaching of Christ's gospel, sanctifying his church and building up his body to the glory of God. This ministry represents Christ to the church. Contemporary Roman Catholic theology speaks of different ways in which Christ is present to his church. This ministry and its work is a primordial mode of the dynamic presence of Christ, through word, sacrament and pastoral leadership.

The sacramentality of orders also proclaims that the church is the fruit of Christ's work, the communion of life achieved among Christ's members by the Holy Spirit; the ordained ministry gives witness to and expresses the church, its faith, its unity, its life of grace in the Holy Spirit in its return to the Father through Christ. Thus this ministry represents the church to itself, to God, to the world.

Ministry or representation of Christ, ministry or representation of the church: together these two express the essential unity and the essential differentiation of the church, and finally they are identified in the one complex reality that is the church.

To number orders among the sacraments then is to acknowledge that this ministry belongs to the essential structure of the church, expressing and engaging the mystery of salvation in all its dimensions: trinitarian, christological, pneumatological, ecclesiological.

This mystery, however, is working itself out in the flux of history, a fact that touches the theology of orders in two related ways: historical issues have been posing questions for some time to the theology accepted since the Middle Ages; the great practical and theological changes that have been occurring inside and outside the church affect theological reflection on the sacrament of orders. The Roman Catholic church has begun to face the first of these seriously. This effort coupled with the work initiated by Vatican II bears closely on the second.

Four influences may be noted briefly.

(a) The general renewal of ecclesiology and of pneumatology together with the broadening of the concept of sacrament to embrace the church have provided a better ecclesiological context and basis for the theology of orders, and they suggest a fuller theological integration of the traditional data that the ordained minister represents Christ and represents the church.

(b) Revived appreciation of the dignity and the role of all the baptized has brought not only a shift in theology but also significant changes in liturgical and pastoral practice. This has been leading both in theory and in practice to some reassessment of the relationship between clergy and laity.

(c) Since 1972 ministry is no longer exclusively clerical, and there has been a remarkable expansion of interest in and diversification of ministry and ministries. This is an important change in the context in which theologians reflect on ordination and the ordained ministry. It also raises questions about the terminology to be used that may be theological issues at base.

(d) History shows that the present triple form of the ordained ministry, while very ancient, does not seem to have existed everywhere from the beginning and that the functions of each order together with the relationships between them have undergone considerable change. And despite the debates of history and the declarations of Vatican II, both the meaning of "fullness of order" and the nature of the theological relationship between episcopacy and presbyterate still require clarification.

All of this suggests that the nature of order or orders has still much to offer to the attention of theologians.

ORDERS, SYMBOLS OF

The primary symbols of ordination or of the ordained ministry are found in the rites of ordination to the orders of bishop, presbyter, and deacon. These symbols consist of actions or gestures, vestments or ornaments given to the newly ordained minister, and objects presented as a sign of office or of the duties connected with the particular order.

Primary Symbol of Orders: Imposition of Hands

The most basic symbol of ordination is an action common to the rites of ordination to all three orders of ministry: the imposition of hands. The action of the bishop laying or imposing hands on the head of the one to be ordained is mentioned in the NT and is found in the subsequent liturgical books of the Latin church, the Eastern churches, and the Reformation churches. In his Apostolic Tradition, written in the early part of the 3rd century, Hippolytus of Rome notes that the bishop lays hands on the head of the one being ordained during the ordination prayer of consecration. The bishop alone lays hands on the deacon, since the deacon is to assist the bishop; the bishop and presbyters lay hands on the presbyter, since the presbyter will share in the council of the presbyterate; the bishop and the other bishops present lay hands on the one chosen for the office of bishop. These directions as articulated by Hippolytus eventually found their way into the later ordination rites and continue to be found in the church's present ordination rites. The act of imposing hands on the one to be ordained is a multi-valent symbol. It is a sign of blessing, and an epicletic gesture, whereby the Holy Spirit is invoked upon the person being ordained. In the Latin church, the imposition of hands is now done in silence, immediately before the prayer of consecration. In the Eastern churches and in most Anglican, Lutheran, and Protestant churches the imposition of hands occurs during the ordination prayer or formula of ordination. Pope Pius XII declared in Sacramentum Ordinis (1947) that the imposition of hands was the sacramental matter of ordination and that the epicletic section of each prayer of consecration was the sacramental form of ordination.

Secondary Symbols of Orders

In addition to this primary level of symbolic action, the ordination rites contain a series of symbolic presentations of vestments and other objects and anointings which help to explain the meaning of the imposition of hands and prayer of consecration.

Vestments and Ornaments. The vestments given to new presbyters and deacons and the pontifical ornaments given to a new bishop are visual symbols of the order which has just been conferred. In the earliest Roman ordination rites the candidates were presented to the bishop in the vestments of the order they were about to receive. Eventually the practice was changed and the vesting was postponed until after the prayer of consecration. In the present ordination rites the candidates are presented to the bishop wearing the vestments of their previous order. The candidates for the diaconate are dressed as acolytes in alb (amice and cincture), and the candidates for the presbyterate wear the vestments of the deacon: alb (amice and cincture) and diaconal stole. The bishop elect wears all the eucharistic vestments of the presbyter, namely, alb (amice and cincture), stole, and chasuble, with the addition of the dalmatic which is worn under the chasuble. The new deacon is given the diaconal stole (worn over the left shoulder and fastened under the right arm) and the dalmatic. The new presbyter has the stole changed to the presbyteral manner of wearing it, i.e., around the neck with the ends hanging straight down before him, and he is given the chasuble. The new bishop receives the pontifical ornaments of office: mitre, ring, and pastoral staff (crozier).

Anointing. The rites for the ordination of presbyters and bishops contain an ancient symbolic action that probably came from the Celtic church: the hands of a presbyter are anointed with chrism, as is the head of a bishop. The more ancient practice seems to have been that the hands of the deacon were anointed and the hands and head of the presbyter were also anointed. The practice of anointing the deacon's hands was quickly abandoned and the anointing of the presbyter's head was transferred to the ordination of a bishop. These anointings are explanatory in nature and attempt to underline the significance of the consecration of the person effected by the imposition of hands and prayer of ordination. During the Middle Ages many theologians thought the anointing of the presbyter's hands to be an essential rite, but a careful examination of the ordination rites as they developed and of the texts used for the anointing clearly shows their secondary and explanatory nature.

Presentations. The presentation of a symbol (porrectio instrumentorum) of the order which has been given concludes the ordination rite. The bishop is presented with the Book of Gospels which was placed on his head immediately after the imposition of hands and was then held over his head during the prayer of consecration. The words said during the presentation of the gospels remind the new bishop that he is to "preach the word of God with unfailing patience and sound teaching." The new presbyter is given the chalice of wine and the paten with the bread for the eucharist which were presented to the bishop by the faithful. In the Middle Ages many theologians thought this rite to be the matter and form of ordination. The medieval text associated with the presentation gave the impression that the power to celebrate the eucharist was being conferred by this rite. The present text is a welcome theological correction to previous misunderstandings of this rite. As he presents the offerings to the new presbyter, the bishop says: "Accept from the holy people of God the gifts to be offered to him. Know what you are doing, and imitate the mystery you celebrate: model your life on the mystery of the Lord's cross." The deacon is given the Book of Gospels as a reminder that he is to be a "herald" of the gospel. He is told: "Believe what you read, teach what you believe, and practice what you teach."

ORDINATION OF WOMEN

The ordination of women was not a practical question in any Christian church before September 15, 1853, when Antoinette Brown was ordained in the Congregational church in the U.S. Since that date most Protestant churches have come to admit women to ordination. The exceptions are the fundamentalist churches and, among Lutherans, the Missouri and the Wisconsin Synods. In 1976, the Episcopal church decided to ordain women. In September 1988, the Lambeth Conference approved the ordination of women for the generality of the Anglican Communion, the practical adoption of it being left to each ecclesiastical province. In the Anglican bishops' intention, this canonical authorization of an untraditional practice "implies no departure from the traditional doctrine of the ordained ministry" (Final Report of Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission, p. 44).

The Contemporary Problem

However appropriate it may have seemed in its time, the Scholastic argumentation does not provide a solid basis for the permanent canonical affirmation that "solus vir baptizatus validly receives sacred ordination" (can. 1024). For contemporary exegesis and theology do not admit that Jesus instituted the sacraments in all their details and applications. It is therefore thought that the church must have more extensive power and initiative over their form and their use than was believed in the Middle Ages. In fact, the study of the NT and post-apostolic writings shows that several women (such as Prisca) actively shared Paul's ministry, and that one of them, Junia, was called an apostle in Rom 16:7. In establishing the orders of widows and virgins, in organizing the religious orders of women, in giving a number of medieval abbesses quasi-episcopal jurisdiction over their subjects, who often included laymen and priests, the church adapted the ministry to varying circumstances and cultures. In addition, contemporary philosophy and political experience deny the belief that women are inferior to men in essence, as citizens, or in the professions. When Paul VI solemnly proclaimed Teresa of Avila and Catherine of Siena "doctors of the Church" (September 27 and October 4, 1970), he seriously undermined the Scholastic objections to ordaining women. Given the contemporary emancipation of woman and the spread of the feminist liberation movement, the question of the ordination of women needed to be reviewed in the aftermath of Vatican II. Yet when he reformed the minor orders (motu proprio Ministeria quaedam August 15, 1972), Paul VI decided to maintain the principle of the non-ordination of women even to minor orders: reception of these orders, "in keeping with the Church's venerable tradition, is reserved to men."

The Declaration of 1976

On July 9, 1975, Donald Coggan,

Archbishop of Canterbury, wrote to Pope Paul on the question of the ordination of women. Paul VI answered (November 30, 1975): the Catholic Church "holds that it is not admissible to ordain women to the priesthood, for very fundamental reasons. These reasons include, the example recorded in the Sacred Scriptures of Christ choosing his apostles only from among men; the constant practice of the church, which has imitated Christ in choosing only men; and her living teaching authority, which has consistently held that the exclusion of women from the priesthood is in accordance with God's plan for his church." In another letter to the archbishop (March 23, 1976), Paul VI expressed his sorrow that the ordination of women in the Anglican Communion would be a "new obstacle and a new threat" on the way to reconciliation. From this point of view, it is regrettable that the Anglican Communion decided to act unilaterally in admitting women to the priesthood and (as was decided in principle) to the episcopate.

The Scholastic Reflection

The theoretical question of the possibility of ordaining women to the priesthood becomes classic in Scholastic theology. It takes the form of a reflection on Gratian's Decretum. The Decree forbids women "to handle sacred vessels and vestments and to act as thurifers around the altar" (part I, d 23, chap. 25). Nor may women "teach men in the assembly" (chap. 29). In other sections, the decree asserts that women are not "in the image of God," and that sin began through Eve. This spiritual inferiority makes women inapt to teach in the church and to dominate men. But the decree does not establish a connection between this inferiority and the non-ordination of women.

It is with St. Thomas that woman's essential unordainability is clearly affirmed: woman has an inner incapacity to receive the sacrament of orders (Commentary on the Sentences, bk 4, d 25, a 2, q 1). For the sacrament requires a "natural likeness" between signum and res, the sign and the reality shown by the sign. The priesthood must include a sign of "eminence and authority," whereas women are by the law of nature "in a state of subjection." There would therefore be a contradiction between being a priest (signifying authority) and being a woman (signifying inferiority). As understood by Aquinas, woman's state of subjection is not only natural and social (enforced by society), but also scriptural (taught by St. Paul). While they generally espouse the same basic position, the other great Scholastics are not so assertive as St. Thomas. St. Bonaventure deems it only "saner and more prudent" to hold that women cannot be ordained. It is for him a question of congruity. The sacrament of orders is not "congruous with the female sex," because, being subordinate to man, woman cannot be a sign of mediation between God and man (C.S., bk 4, d 25, a 2, q 1). Here the chief concern is not authority, but mediation.

John Duns Scotus, however, is embarrassed by the traditional practice and the canonical legislation. Unlike his predecessors, he cites Gal 3:28: "In Christ Jesus there is . . . neither male nor female. . . ." He understands this statement to apply to the state of grace and glory, not to that of nature, and still less to that of fallen nature. Scotus believes that Mary Magdalen was chosen by Christ as a true Apostle (Reportata Parisiensia, bk 4, d 25, q 2). Moreover, he judges that, had the church refused ordination to women on its own authority, it would be guilty of a deep injustice toward the entire female sex. If women cannot be ordained, it must be because Christ does not allow it. Proof of this is that the Virgin Mary was not a priest. Christ, however, has not explained his reasons and cannot be accused of injustice. If one wishes to speculate, one may find that it would be against nature for women to be in "a position of superiority," and that women lack the "quick intellect" and the "stable will" that are needed to know and to maintain the truth as teachers (doctores).

The Deaconesses

That women functioned as prophetesses in early Christianity is attested by the NT and is commonly admitted. Prophets and prophetesses took an active part in the communal prayer of the synaxis. What role, if any, they played in the eucharistic prayer is itself debated. Prophets, however, were never identified with priests, even if some of them, according to the Didache, may have presided over the eucharist. In any case, the Montanist crisis in the 2nd century inspired a distrust of prophets and especially, several women being closely associated with Montanus, of prophetesses. Nonetheless, the patristic tradition in the East did admit the ordination of women to the diaconate. The practice is attested in the 3rd century Didascalia Apostolorum. The ritual of ordination is the same as for deacons. It includes cheirotomia (laying on of hands), vesting with a deacon's robes, and porrection of the chalice. The women deacons work in the pastoral care of women and children, teaching the faith, anointing women during baptism, attending those who are sick; they supervise women's participation in worship; in some places they distribute communion to women. The age of ordination varies; in 451 the council of Chalcedon (can. 15) fixes it at 40 years of age. For reasons that are not clear, women deacons, or deaconesses, disappeared in the Byzantine church in the 12th century, and in the Syriac church in the 15th.

From the East, the institution of deaconesses spread to the West, though with a difference: in 441 the 4th council of Orange forbade their ordination with the laying on of hands. In other words, they do not constitute, as in the East, an order in the strict sense. The Latin deaconesses are not women deacons. Their group is assimilated to the early order of widows and to the later order of virgins. These institutions do not raise the matter of ordination: a blessing only accompanies the veiling of women as widows or virgins.

The question of ordaining women to the priesthood is mentioned for the first time by St. Epiphanius, shortly after 376. In his book against heresies, the Panarion, Epiphanius denounces the "Collyridians," women who worship the Virgin Mary, offering her cakes that they eat in communion, and performing "priestly acts" in her name. There is no suggestion that these women are ordained. On the contrary, Epiphanius' condemnation of this "sect" gives him the occasion to assert that women have never been ordained to the priesthood. It also includes a diatribe against women, who are said to be "a feeble race, untrustworthy, and of mediocre intelligence." The later Fathers of the church, whether in the East or in the West, do not seem to have been concerned with the question.

It was in keeping with the guidance given by Paul VI that, on October 15, 1976, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued the declaration Inter insigniores, on the question of the admission of women to the ministerial priesthood. This is a delicately balanced document, that is in part quite progressive. All arguments that assume the inferiority of women in any domain are rejected. The question of women deacons being left aside, the problem is carefully circumscribed. It is limited to one basic point: is the church authorized to ordain women? The modern liberation of woman is considered irrelevant, for a theological question cannot be solved according to standards borrowed from secular society. Yet the negative conclusion is maintained: the church is not authorized to ordain women. This belief is based: (1) on the continuity of the traditional practice, where the congregation sees an apostolic tradition; (2) on the biblical testimony that Jesus did not include women among the twelve apostles, which is taken to be normative for ordination, the priesthood being considered a participation in the apostolate of the twelve; (3) on the sacramental requirement that the priest, as signum, have a "natural likeness" to the res, which is Christ, the Word of God incarnate as a man; (4) on the nature of the vocation to the priesthood, that is neither a right to ordination nor a purely inner and subjective call, but results from the "authentication by the church" of an inner call.

A basic methodological flaw, however, considerably weakens the persuasiveness of this case: the position adopted by the Pontifical Biblical Commission, after two meetings held in April 1975 and April 1976, is disregarded. In answer to specific questions, the commission warned that "difficulties" result from "a study of the biblical data from the perspective of a later conception of the eucharistic priesthood." Its conclusion was that the NT does not settle the question whether women can be ordained to the priesthood. One may infer from these two points: (1) that reading the NT in light of the fact that women have never been ordained to the priesthood is likely to lead to a misinterpretation of the intent of the biblical texts; and, (2) that the opinion that a clear apostolic tradition excludes women from the priesthood is not supported by the NT. Admittedly, the Biblical Commission is no more than advisory to the congregation, which is not bound by its conclusions or recommendations. Furthermore, the answers given by the commission were never officially released to the public. Yet this does not detract from the weight of these findings regarding the biblical witness.

Two points of the declaration remain untouched by this methodological flaw: the sacramental requirement of "a natural likeness" between signum and res, and the nature of the priestly vocation. The first is universally recognized in sacramental theology. But it is compatible with the principle that the likeness between the ordained priest and the heavenly High Priest resides in their common humanity rather than in their sex. The second is unimpeachable. Yet it need not exclude that the church may some day authenticate a call that is not at this time acknowledged.

An Underlying Problem

The exclusion of women from the Catholic priesthood is tied to certain assumptions in anthropology. This does not clearly appear in most of the recent discussion. Yet it is patent in Scholastic theology. The problem of Thomas Aquinas is not only sacramental. It is primarily anthropological, in that he assigns to women a position in humanity and in society that is incompatible with the duties and responsibilities of priests. This position he calls "subjection" to men, and "weakness" of body and mind. Such is not, however, the understanding of womanhood in contemporary Catholic thought. One may then ask if the exclusion of women from the sacrament of orders is founded in a normative theological anthropology. The medieval conception being, for many reasons, obsolete, Catholic thought needs a new theological anthropology. The nearest one comes to this is found in the many documents of the ordinary magisterium, in which modern popes and bishops have spoken about the tasks of women. These documents generally describe men and women as standing in a relation of "complementarity." Yet, as is pointed out in feminist writings, the model of complementarity, that has its fundamental source in sexual roles and customs, has been universally oppressive of women, for it has always assigned to men general and glorious tasks (defense of the country, hunting, wage earning) and to women repetitive and menial tasks (cooking, gardening, keeping house, cleaning). As applied in the church, the complementarity model has given men the primary power of magisterial and priestly leadership, while women have been left with secondary roles of discipleship. Of course, Christian dignity does not reside in a function, but in the holiness to which all are called. Yet this is not to the point. For the call to holiness does not answer the question of the proper structure of the church and of its priesthood.

The Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue in the U.S. has examined some of these questions, the only ecumenical dialogue to do so. The resulting document is entitled, Images of God: Reflections on Christian Anthropology (December 22, 1983). While generally accepting the complementarity model, it saw it as "open," underlining the universal "call to communion," and imaging the disciples' "identity-in-difference." It also noted that another model may be proposed: "The mutual relationship of male and female is not one of complementarity...; it is rather a supplementarity. Each, being already fully human, receives from the other a supplement of humanity."

A modern Christian anthropology needs to be more fully elaborated along these lines. Further theological reflection and ecumenical consultation will be required before all legitimate questions can be properly answered. Yet the incidence of these questions on the matter of the ordination of women is unavoidable. It was on the basis of a certain conception of the role of men and women that the decisions of the early church were made; and this conception was itself informed by the experience of men and women in Judaism, in Greek civilization, and in Roman society. The contemporary experience inspires a legitimate doubt concerning the present validity of a conclusion drawn in other contexts, and dominated by the social and intellectual conditions of another period.

Conclusion

It would be utopian to expect from the near future a change in the Catholic practice of not ordaining women to the priesthood. Agitation in favor of the ordination of women may well be a useful consciousness-raising exercise. But it cannot be the instrument of a radical change in the discipline of the sacrament of orders. For a change, if it is to come, has to be based on more serious theological reflection than is compatible with a polemical intent. Such reflection can take the form only of a development in Christian anthropology, supported by a converging reflection on the symbolism of the sacraments, and specifically of the sacrament of orders. In the meantime, no basic obstacle would seem to stand in the way of ordaining women to the diaconate, where this may be useful, on the model of the ancient Greek church.

The question of ordaining women to the episcopate is not basically different from that of ordination to the priesthood. For episcopacy and priesthood are one sacrament in two degrees (or, counting the diaconate, in three degrees). Nonetheless, it is to be expected that the ordination of women to the episcopate in the Anglican Communion will make the Catholic hierarchy still more hesitant to consider the ordination of women to the priesthood. In this, the Catholic bishops will find support in the Orthodox church and the Old Catholic church, that are just as reluctant drastically to alter the traditional structure of the church. In the long run, however, the episcopate of women bishops in the Anglican Communion, like the already impressive performance of many of its women priests, will have to be taken into account, whenever the Spirit brings the still separated churches to the point of reconciliation.

ORDINATION RITES

Comparatively little is said in the NT about the rites by which the leaders of the church were commissioned for their ministry. This is not surprising, since ministry in the NT period was still undergoing development and change. We find references to the twelve and to the apostles (Mt 10:1-5; Mk 3:14-19; Lk 6:13) in the gospels and to apostles, prophets, and teachers in 1 Cor 12:28. Acts and the epistles speak of leaders (Heb 13:7), presbyters or elders (presbuteroi, 1 Pet 5:1; Jas 5:14; Acts 11:30), teachers (Gal 6:6), overseers, i.e., bishops (episkopoi, Acts 20:17,28; Phil 1:1; Tit 1:5ff), and ministers (diakonoi, Phil 1:1; 1 Tm 3:1ff). These various titles represent charismatic ministries and offices common in the Pauline communities, as well as more institutionalized forms of office which seem to have existed in the Jerusalem community. A common characteristic of these offices or ministries is that appointment to them is by the apostles and their successors (see Tit 1:5) and that they originated from the apostles or were associated with them (see Acts 6:1ff; 11:30; 14:23). In Acts, appointment to an office or ministry is by the imposition of hands (epithesis ton cheiron) and through an associated confirmation by the Holy Spirit (Acts 13:2; 20:28). In the pastoral epistles, imposition of hands is also mentioned as a means of recognizing a ministry exercised prophetically (1 Tim 4:14) or of appointing a person to a ministry or office (2 Tim 1:6). The actual rites described in Acts and the epistles of Paul contain no liturgical texts and the barest of descriptions. In Acts 6:1-6 we are told of the selection of seven men to serve the needs of the widows of the Hellenists in Jerusalem. They are selected by the community and presented to the apostles who prayed and laid hands on them. Acts 13:2-3 describes how Paul and Barnabas are set apart for their ministry: "Then, completing their fasting and prayer, they laid hands on them and sent them off." Paul and Barnabas, during their first missionary journey, appointed presbyters in each church and "with prayer and fasting, commended them to the Lord in whom they had put their faith" (Acts 14:23). This practice of praying over and laying hands on those appointed as ministers is also alluded to in the two letters to Timothy (1 Tim 4:14; 5:22; 2 Tim 1:6; 4:1-8). It is this pattern which formed the core of the ordination rites of the church as they were developed and elaborated over the centuries.

Ordination in the Early Church

The most ancient ordination rite of the church is that of Hippolytus of Rome (c. 225), and is contained in his Apostolic Tradition. Hippolytus provides us not only with a description of the ordination of a bishop, but also with the ordination prayers for presbyters, and deacons. The rubrics contained in the Apost. Trad., and the prayers, especially that for the ordination of a bishop, have had a great influence on ordination rites in both the Eastern and the Western churches. The ordination rite takes place on a Sunday in the context of the celebration of the eucharist. The bishop is chosen by the people and the bishops who are present give their consent. The bishops silently lay hands on the candidate while the members of the presbyterate stand by in silence. One of the bishops, in the name of all, says the prayer of ordination while continuing to lay hands on the one being ordained bishop. The prayer is addressed to the "God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" and recalls that God has established ministers for the church. A brief epiclesis follows which asks God to "Pour forth now that power which is from you, of the princely Spirit which you granted through your beloved Son Jesus Christ to your holy apostles who established the church in every place as your sanctuary, to the unceasing glory and praise of your name." The prayer continues with intercessions for the new bishop. He is to feed the flock and exercise a blameless high priesthood by unceasing prayer and offering the holy gifts of the church. The bishop is to forgive sins and every other bond. All this is done through the Servant/Child Jesus Christ. After the prayer all exchange the kiss of peace with the new bishop and he proceeds to receive the offerings of the people from the deacons and then proclaim the eucharistic prayer.

Similar prayers are provided for the ordination of a presbyter or deacon. The prayer for presbyters indicates that the role of the presbyter is to assist the bishop in the governance of the church. Hippolytus notes that "When, moreover, a presbyter is ordained, let the bishop lay his hand on his head, while the presbyters also touch him. . . ." He goes on to say that when a deacon is ordained only the bishop lays hands on him. "For he is not ordained for the priesthood, but for serving the bishop. . . . For he is not a member of the council of the clergy, but attends to responsibilities and makes known what is necessary to the bishop; not receiving the common spirit of the presbyter. . . . Wherefore, let the bishop alone make him a deacon; on a presbyter, however, the presbyters as well should also lay on their hands because of the common and like spirit of the clergy. For the presbyter has only this power to receive; he does not on the other hand have power to give. Because of this he does not ordain clergy; he rather is to put his seal on the ordination of a presbyter while the bishop ordains."

The 5th century Statuta ecclesiae antiqua, which was probably written in Gaul, substantially reproduces the directions of Hippolytus in cans. 2, 3, and 4. All three texts speak of the imposition of hands as the central act. All bishops present impose hands on a new bishop; the bishop and presbyters present lay hands on the new presbyter; and the bishop alone lays hands on the deacon. Eventually these texts become rubrics which are prefixed to the ordination rites of the medieval pontificals.

The actual terminology used for ordination in the early church changes over a period of time. The pagan term for election by a show of hands, cheirotonein, is seen in the NT and in early Christian writings. It is eventually replaced by the term cheirepithesia which refers to the imposition of hands. By the 4th century a distinction is made between the imposition of hands performed by a priest, cheirothetei, and ordination, cheirotonei, which is done by the bishop. Thus the emphasis changes from raising the hand to elect the candidate to that of imposing or laying hands on the one elected to the office of ministry. This distinction between election and ordination is manifested in the later ordination rites which either presume a previous election of the candidate, or have a brief rite of election by the bishop with the consent of the people at the beginning of the rite.

Ordination Rites of the Roman Sacramentaries and Ordines

In the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries the ordination rites are found in the ancient sacramentaries of the Roman church and in Gaul as well as in the collections of rubrics known as the Ordines Romani. The Sacramentary of Verona (Sacramentarium Veronense), also known as the Leonine Sacramentary (5th to 6th centuries), contains the texts of the ordination prayers for bishops, priests, and deacons (nn. 952-954 in the Mohlberg edition). As is common in the early liturgical books, no rubrics are provided and it is necessary to go to the Ordines Romani XXXIV-XL for rubrics. The ordination of the bishop of Rome took place before the Gloria, while the ordination of presbyters and deacons occurred between the epistle and gospel. The ordination of the bishop begins with two collects, whereas the rites for presbyters and deacons have an invitatory and collect which originally probably introduced and concluded the litany of the saints. By the 7th to 8th centuries, the collect and invitatory followed the litany. The ordination prayer follows the collect. In the case of the bishop and presbyter, the prayer is given the title, consecratio, and that of the deacon, benedictio. These titles vary in the liturgical books and the difference in terminology has no major significance during this period.

The ordination prayers, which are totally unrelated to those of Hippolytus, are filled with allusions to the ministry of the high priests, priests, and levites of the OT. In a characteristic Roman fashion, they are preoccupied with the cursus honorum or progression of honor from a lesser dignity to a greater one. There is no reference to the laying on of hands in the Verona Sacramentary itself, and, in fact, the Ordines Romani are not always clear about the matter. They do mention that the Book of Gospels was held over the head of the one being ordained bishop of Rome, but nothing is said about the bishops present imposing hands on his head. When the pope ordained bishops he alone laid hands on them. Nevertheless it is probably safe to assume that the imposition of hands took place at Rome during the ordination prayer for deacons and presbyters.

In this early period of the Roman ordination rites, the candidates were clothed in the vestments of their order before they were presented for ordination. After their ordination, deacons and presbyters took their places with their fellow presbyters and deacons for the remainder of the liturgy.

As the Roman liturgy spread north into Gaul, it began to be intermixed with rites and prayers taken from this region. The resulting hybrid rite eventually returned to Rome and effected the subsequent Roman liturgical books. The Gelasian Sacramentary and the Missale Francorum reflect this mixed form of the Roman ordination rites. In addition to the Roman prayers, these books contain prayers of Gallican origin. The Gallican ordination rite of the 5th or 6th century probably consisted of an admonition to the faithful and the clergy, a bidding or invitatory (praefatio), and the prayer of consecration (consecratio). These consecration prayers are more centered on Christ and the notions of ministry in the NT than those of the Roman tradition. In the case of the presbyter, an anointing of the hands followed the ordination prayer. In the Missale Francorum and the Gelasian Sacramentary, the Roman prayers are followed by the Gallican texts so that there is a doubling of ordination rites. At first a choice was probably made between the Roman texts and the Gallican texts, but eventually both were recited, one set after the other. The anointing of the hands of the priest seems to have come from the Celtic church and then passed on to the church in Gaul. It was not until after the 9th century that this practice was accepted by the Roman church. The 8th to 10th century English ordinations have an anointing of the deacon's hands and an anointing of both the hands and head of the presbyter.

Medieval Ordination Rites

By the end of the 9th century the rubrical texts from the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua referring to the imposition of hands are inserted before the invitatory of the Roman ordination prayers, with the result that the imposition of hands now occurs in silence before the prayer of ordination, rather than during it. In some manuscripts, e.g., the English Pontifical of Egbert, the rubrics infer that the imposition of hands also continued throughout the ordination prayers.

A basic structure has evolved by the 10th century in which the Roman and Gallican prayers are separated from each other by the vesting of the newly ordained minister, and the presentation of symbols or instruments of office. Accordingly, the crozier and ring were given to the bishop, the chalice and paten were given to the presbyter, and the gospels were given to the deacon. This presentation of the symbols of office was a common feature of the rites for the ordination of ministers to the minor orders. The incorporation of the presentations into the ordination rites for bishops, presbyters, and deacons began a change that would eventually lead theologians and bishops to regard them as the essential act of ordination rather than the imposition of hands before or during the ordination prayer. The 10th century Roman-German Pontifical of Mainz is the primary example of these new developments in the ordination rites. It contains, in addition to the usual material, an inquiry into the worthiness of the candidate, an anointing of the head, hands, and thumb of a bishop and the hands of a presbyter, the presentation of a symbol or instrument of the order being conferred, a final blessing and the kiss of peace.

The Pontifical of William Durand(us), the 13th-century bishop of Mende, elaborates rites in a more theatrical manner. The ordination rites for a bishop begin with a formal presentation of the candidate, examination, and profession of faith. After the gradual there is an invitational followed by the litany of the saints, the imposition of the gospels on the head of the candidate and the imposition of hands by the consecrator and co-consecrators with the words: Accipe spiritum sanctum. The ordination prayer is interrupted by the singing of the Veni Creator while the head of the bishop-elect is anointed; the ordination prayer then continues. After the prayer, the hands of the new bishop are anointed, and he is presented with the crozier, ring, and gospels. The ordination rite proper concludes with the kiss of peace. In the rite for the ordination of a presbyter a whole new series of rites is added. As in the rite for the ordination of a bishop, there is a presentation which is followed by the election of the candidate at the beginning of the rite. The ordination prayer is preceded by the imposition of hands and followed by the vesting of the new priest. His hands are anointed and he is then presented with the chalice and paten. A second imposition of hands takes place after communion and the recitation of the creed. This imposition of hands is accompanied by an imperative formula, Accipe Spiritum Sanctum . . . , which had previously been used in various places in connection with the first imposition of hands. The use of such a formula is a reflection of the medieval concept that the forms for the sacraments should be declarations rather than prayers. Following the imposition of hands the back of the chasuble is lowered (which hitherto had been pinned up). The new presbyter then makes a promise of obedience, receives the kiss of peace, and is admonished concerning the manner of celebrating Mass. The bishop concludes the rite by giving the newly ordained priest a penance and a final blessing. In a sense, this all forms a second ordination rite at the end of Mass. The most significant change in the rite for the ordination of a deacon is the division of the ordination prayer into two parts by the imposition of hands and a formula beginning, Accipe After the new deacon is vested in stole and dalmatic, he is presented with the gospels. The Gallican ordination prayer is used to conclude the rite. The ordination rites of Durand are the foundation of the rites contained in the post-Tridentine Pontificale Romanum, and, in reality, they are nearly identical.

In the 13th century, the practice of the newly ordained bishop concelebrating with the consecrator becomes common. The newly ordained priests are told to come near the altar and from the offertory on they read all the prayers of the Mass in a low voice, as if they were celebrating individually. Both newly ordained bishops and priests receive the body of Christ from the presiding bishop.

At the time of the Reformation, the continental Reformers stripped away all that they considered to be unbiblical in the ordination rites. As a result, the rites consisted, with local variations, of reading from scripture, a long admonition, the laying on of hands with an imperative formula, and a prayer for the ministry of the church. Unfortunately, the epicletic and eucharistic nature of the ordination prayers of consecration were lost and replaced by a questionable medieval concept of ordination using a formula rather than a prayer. Vesting, anointing, and the presentation of symbols of office generally disappeared, with the exception of the giving of a Bible to the one being ordained.

Contemporary Ordination Rites

The rites for the ordination of bishops, priests, and deacons were revised in 1968 under the title, De Ordinatione diaconi, presbyteri et episcopi. The revised rites follow the principle established by Pius XII in his constitution Sacramentum ordinis (1947) that the matter of ordination is the imposition of hands and the sacramental form is contained in the prayer of consecration of each rite. The imposition of hands by the bishop and the ordination prayer of consecration are clearly made the central features of the revised rites. All three ordination rites begin with the celebration of the liturgy of the word of the Mass. The ordination rites proper take place after the gospel. The candidates for the diaconate and presbyterate are presented to the bishop, elected by him, and the people give their consent. The rite for the ordination of a bishop begins with the Veni Creator, the presentation of the bishop-elect, and the reading of the apostolic mandate. All three rites then follow with the homily and the examination of the candidate. When deacons are ordained, the examination is preceded by a commitment to celibacy for those who will later be ordained presbyters. The examination is followed in the rites for deacons and presbyters by a promise of obedience to the bishop and his successors.

All three rites continue with an invitation to prayer, the litany, and a concluding prayer. The laying on of hands then takes place in silence. The presbyters join the bishop in imposing hands on candidates for the presbyterate, and all bishops present lay hands on the bishop-elect. The gospels are then placed on the head of the bishop-elect. In each rite the ordination prayer of consecration is then sung or recited. After the prayer, the new bishop's head is anointed with chrism. Deacons and presbyters are vested by members of their new order with the dalmatic and stole (for deacons) or the chasuble and stole (for presbyters). A new bishop is then presented with the gospels, ring, mitre, and pastoral staff. A new presbyter has his hands anointed with chrism and is presented with the offerings (bread on the paten and wine and water in the chalice), which have been brought to the bishop by the faithful.

A deacon is given the gospels by the bishop. The new bishop is seated in his episcopal chair if he is ordained in his cathedral. The ordination rites proper end with the kiss of peace given to the new minister by the bishop and other members of the diaconate, presbyterate, or episcopate. At the ordination of a bishop, he is led through the congregation after the prayer after communion, while the Te Deum or another similar hymn is sung, in order to bless the people. A new bishop who is ordained in his cathedral takes over the presidency of the eucharist, otherwise he takes the first place among the concelebrants. New presbyters concelebrate with the bishop, and new deacons carry out their diaconal functions during the liturgy of the eucharist.

These new rites attempt to express the theology of ordination and holy orders as articulated by the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council. In one case, namely the prayer of consecration for a bishop, the ancient prayer of Hippolytus has replaced the traditional prayer of the Roman rite. This prayer is also being used in the Episcopal church for the ordination of bishops. It is unfortunate that the ordination prayers for presbyters and deacons were not replaced with texts that are more focused on the imagery of the NT, perhaps the Gallican ordination prayers. The rites themselves follow the common pattern that emerged after the Second Vatican Council of being placed after the liturgy of the word and before the liturgy of the eucharist. The laying on of hands and the prayer of consecration take their rightful place as the center of these rites. And the rites of vesting, anointing, and presentation of symbols of office take a secondary place.

Comparable revisions have taken place in the Anglican, Lutheran, and many of the Protestant churches in the United States and Europe.

PALM SUNDAY

Also called Sunday of the Passion or Passion Sunday, this day inaugurates the week that is called Holy. The movement that begins today culminates in the paschal triduum of Holy Thursday, Good Friday and the vigil of Easter. On the liturgical tone of this week the words of Pius Parsch remain to the point: "We must not separate the passion from the resurrection, but rather regard the Cross as the way to Easter victory. The liturgy does not make this week one of sorrowful lamentation or tearful sympathizing with our suffering Lord. That was the medieval approach. No, through the whole week there runs a note of victory and joy, a realization that Christ's sacred passion was a prerequisite to Easter glory" (The Church's Year of Grace, Vol. 2, p. 290).

An irony presents itself in today's liturgy. The first part enacts the joyous entrance of Jesus into Jerusalem amidst loud cries of "hosanna." The naive bravado of disciples unaware of their own sinfulness and of the extent of Jesus' own journey is plainly set out. In the passion proclamation that follows, the same people who cried "hosanna" now cry "crucify," and the disciples, so boldly ready to "follow him anywhere" are seen to abandon him. Together, however, they proclaim a more important fidelity: the fidelity of Jesus to his mission, and the fidelity of Abba to his Son.

PAPACY, MODERN, AND LITURGICAL RENEWAL

Although some claim that the liturgical movement began with the publication of Dom Prosper Guéranger's monumental L'année liturgique (1840), his work remained on the scholarly, academic level and never really affected the grass roots. If one considers the movement as an advance toward an intelligent participation in the liturgy of the church, then one has to look to the Catholic congress in Malines, Belgium (1909), under the leadership of Lambert Beauduin or the first liturgical week held for lay people at Maria Laach, Germany, during Holy Week of 1914 for its origin (cf. Koenker, 11-12; Jungmann, 11-12; Kolbe, 6).

Be that as it may, this article limits itself to developments in the 20th century and the impact of the papacy upon them. Guéranger in France, Dom Gerard van Caloen in Belgium and J.A. Moehler in Germany had laid the groundwork for liturgical reform and people like Ildefons Herwegen, Romano Guardini, Lambert Beauduin, Pius Parsch and Virgil Michel, to mention but a few, stand as pioneering giants in its development. Yet without the influence of the popes of our century, their efforts may never have had such widespread and relatively rapid effects (cf. Koenker, 13-17).

Pope Pius X is a case in point. On November 22, 1903, he issued a motu proprio On Sacred Music in which he sounded the rallying cry for the liturgical movement: "Our people assemble for the purpose of acquiring the Christian spirit from its first and indispensable source, namely active participation in the most sacred mysteries and in the public prayer of the Church" (St. Meinrad translation, St. Meinrad Abbey, 1951, p. 4. Emphasis added). Pius XI was to return to this statement in his apostolic constitution Divini cultus (1928) as was Pius XII in his encyclical Mediator Dei (1947): "It should be clear to all . . . that the worship rendered to God by the Church in union with her divine Head is the most efficacious means of achieving sanctity" (art. 26). Fittingly, the decisive vote during Vatican II on the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy took place fifty years to the day that Pius X had issued his statement. The Constitution again echoed his cry: "In the restoration and promotion of the sacred liturgy, the full and active participation by all the people is the aim to be considered before all else; for it is the primary and indispensable source from which the faithful are to derive the true Christian spirit" (S.C., 14).

Not only did Pius X provide a rallying cry. His decree On frequent and even daily communion (1905), coupled with his earlier urging that the faithful participate in the singing, had paved the way for a new sense of community in and through the liturgy. Although it would take time for the reception of communion to resume its rightful place within the eucharistic celebration, this pope—known for his strong reaction to Modernism and other currents—had begun the movement to which catchwords, inaccurately attributed to him, gave voice: "Do not pray at Mass, pray the Mass" or "Do not sing at Mass, sing the Mass" (Koenker, 12-13, 235 n. 10; Jungmann, 20-21; Kolbe, 31, 57, 86).

Pius X was also known for his efforts to reform the breviary and to reduce the number of saints' feasts in the Roman calendar. Pius XI immediately "cluttered" the calendar again but he also reinforced the exhortation that the people learn Gregorian chant as a means of involving them in the liturgy (Koenker, 58, 154-55).

It was Pius XII, however, who would be the next dominant, papal figure in the liturgical movement. His encyclical Divino afflante spiritu (1943), which recognized developments in biblical studies, was of great value to the movement. The same was true of the encyclical Mystici corporis (1943) which gave official sanction to the notion of the church as the body of Christ. The liturgical movement was to stress this doctrine as integral to liturgical life. It did not, however, emphasize the hierarchical structure as much as Mystici corporis did and it stressed the spiritual life of the body rather than its visible, institutional character (Koenker, 37, 89).

Pius XII also gave the liturgical movement a more direct impetus. This is all the more surprising since he was not always known for his great liturgical sense. He cautioned Benedictine abbots against those who extol liturgical forms of "bygone days" and who belittle popular devotions. In Mediator Dei (1947), rather than criticize certain characteristics of non-liturgical practices, he warmly recommended them. It was clear at times that he wanted to tighten the reins on the liturgical movement. But the progress and toleration granted the movement was even more surprising than the warning and repression. His emphasis, in Mediator Dei, on the liturgy as not only exterior but, especially, interior worship and as " . . . the most efficacious means of achieving sanctity" (art. 26) is a case in point. His address to conclude the Pastoral Congress of Assisi (1956), in which he referred to the liturgical movement as a sign of God's care for the present times and a movement of the Holy Spirit in the church, offered encouragement along with caution

Pius XII also echoed Pius X's concern that church music be pastoral. In his encyclical Musicae sacrae disciplina (1955), he pointed out that church music was never to be art for art's sake but was to be the handmaid of liturgical celebration. While some of the changes made under Pius XII might at first glance seem minor in themselves, they underlined the link between liturgy and pastoral concern. Some examples of this were: the decree on the simplification of rubrics (1955); the reform of the Easter vigil and then of Holy Week (1951-55) and permission for evening Mass and new laws for the communion fast (1957) (cf. Kolbe, 90, 97, 102; Jungmann, 25). These changes and the attitudes behind them also set the stage for the momentous changes that were to follow.

And onto the stage walked Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli or Pope John XXIII, as he was to be called. The biblical, liturgical and ecumenical movements seemed ripe. Theological trends were more or less developed. But by announcing (January 25, 1959) and then officially convoking Vatican II in the apostolic constitution Humanae salutis (December 25, 1961), John XXIII triggered changes that would profoundly affect the universal grass roots level. As early as 1919, Roncalli had admitted to an idée fixe: "The need to popularize study of the liturgy and encourage living participation in it" (P. Hebblethwaite, Pope John XXIII, Doubleday, 1985, p. 91). Dom Lambert Beauduin, one of the pioneers of the liturgical movement as well as of social action and ecumenism, was a good friend of Roncalli and had left a lasting imprint on him. Beauduin had to suffer much until John XXIII vindicated both him and his ideas by placing great emphasis on liturgy and ecumenism during Vatican II (Hebblethwaite, 116; Kolbe, 36, 148-49). It was John XXIII who determined that liturgy would be the first topic dealt with at the council, since this most directly affected the people. He also signaled an easing of the opposition to the mother tongue in the liturgy (Kolbe, 112-113). Although he died on June 3, 1963, six months before the promulgation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (December 3, 1963), there could be little doubt that John XXIII had had an enormous impact on the liturgy he loved and saw as a key to the church unity for which he longed (Kolbe, 148-50).

The man who did promulgate the constitution was Giovanni Battista Montini, Pope Paul VI. It was he who in 1925 had comforted Roncalli with the ecumenical possibilities of the latter's apparent exile to Bulgaria and who in 1958 called Mediator Dei the "Magna Charta" of liturgical renewal (Hebblethwaite, 116; Kolbe, 85). It was to him that the carrying out of the post-conciliar reform fell.

The liturgical documents which appeared during the time of Paul VI varied in emphasis, tenor, style, terminology and even their underlying theology. They reveal the complexity of the task that was at hand and while some may see in them a sign of harmful vacillation, others would hail Paul VI as a reconciling genius. A few examples should suffice. The liturgy constitution, for all its compromises, remains positive and pastoral in tone. The resurrection, or more precisely the paschal mystery, receives frequent mention, as it does throughout the conciliar documents. The constitution opens new avenues of adaptation and decentralization, at least in principle. It is basically an optimistic document. The encyclical Mysterium fidei (September 3, 1965), on the other hand, reveals a different tone as well as different emphases. Surprisingly for a document on the eucharist, the resurrection or paschal mystery is mentioned only twice and in both cases the passages are quotes from elsewhere. The document is basically restrictive, cautionary and negative in tone. The Instruction on eucharistic worship (May 25, 1967) is more positive than Mysterium fidei both in content and tone. The resurrection and paschal mystery receive frequent mention. The instruction speaks in turn of important principles for the catechesis of the eucharistic mystery (here used in the biblical sense), of the celebration of the memorial of the Lord and the worship of the eucharist. This document clearly seeks an overall view which sees the various facets of the eucharist in their relationship to one another. It also indicates certain priorities among these facets.

The document which best illustrates the tension produced by the various approaches to liturgical renewal is the General Instruction of the Roman Missal (April 6, 1969). The basic draft was finished in October 1965. In 1967 a number of changes were made and the document was submitted to the Bishops' Synod for consultation. In 1968, after further changes reflecting the suggestions of the synod and of the pope himself, Paul VI approved it orally and in writing. Following its promulgation in 1969, however, a storm of protest in certain circles led to a new Foreword or Introduction (March 1970) to the General Instruction. This checkered history accounts for the different style, terminology and theology within the same basic document (McKenna, 162-64).

Paul VI guided the liturgical renewal through those complex times and may very well have earned the title of reconciling genius which has been attributed to him. Whatever the tenor of the document, his papal addresses, especially to the clergy, left no doubt that he was committed to liturgical reform and its implementation (cf. J. Megivern, ed., Worship and Liturgy, Wilmington, N.C.: McGrath Publ., 1978, p. xix).

The history of Pope John Paul II's contribution to the liturgical movement remains to be written. Following his encyclical Dominicae cenae (February 24, 1980) on the mystery and worship of the Holy Eucharist (cf. D. Power, The Sacrifice We Offer, New York: Crossroad, 1987, pp. 21-26, 132, 134), the Sacred Congregation issued an instruction Inaestimabile donum (April 3, 1980) on certain norms concerning worship of the eucharistic mystery. In October 1984, the same congregation granted permission to use the Tridentine Mass under certain circumstances. Most recently John Paul II issued an apostolic letter on the 25th anniversary of Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy dated December 4, 1988, and released May 13, 1989. To date the overall impression of the pope's influence is reminiscent of that of Pius XII—encouraging yet cautionary.

The journey of the liturgical movement has been complex and varied. While the impetus came from the people of God (Jungmann, 26-27), there can be no doubt that the papacy played a crucial role in shaping its path. One can expect the future to be no different. The papacy will play a crucial role—and so will the people of God.

PARISH RENEWAL

This investigation of parish renewal begins with three related introductory considerations.

First, the experience of parish life in the United States can be mapped in three stages. The first style of parish existed from c. 1760 to 1860. Catholics were a minority. Their church buildings were often purchased from Protestant neighbors and redone. Clergy were few. Laity exercised significant roles in policy-making and participation. These parishes can be described as congregational and democratic. The second style of parish, rooted in European ethnic heritage, flourished from 1860 to 1950. Catholics swelled in number, built their own buildings for worship and education, and developed a devotional style under ample clerical leadership. The last and present style of parish is no longer based on one's geographical location, ethnicity (save for newer immigrants), or sense of obligation. From 1950 Catholics in this country belong to a parish through voluntary association. They choose to remain because their needs are met and they have some say in parish life and direction.

Second, due to the shift from parish as building to parish as voluntary association, parish is people. A parish "is a definite community of the faithful established on a stable basis in a particular church; the pastoral care of the parish is entrusted to a pastor as its own shepherd under the authority of the diocesan bishop" (C.I.C., can. 515). This legal statement faithfully reflects the imagery and ecclesiology of Vatican II which described the church as "the people of God." It also expresses the lived reality. Parish is church, and church is people.

Third, parish is about people-in-relationship. Church is about being a group. A parish shares characteristics common to any group in its dynamics and interpersonal workings. But what distinguishes parish from other groups is that the basis for its being, its assembling, and its voluntary belonging is God's ability to be donative. God freely invites this group of people into covenant and faith relationship so that the group might respond with faith, with a vital inner life and external mission. The Spirit, reminding this group about the life of Jesus, is entrusted to the parish as people-in-relationship. This modifies the mentality that parish exists for privatized salvation or sectarian exclusion from the affairs of humankind.

While the above considerations affirm both the transcendent origin of the church and the divine gift of grace that the Spirit is for a parish, they also remind us that the parish is a historical, empirical and concrete reality. The parish that is renewing is a local church, a group of people in this here-and-now place. They are shaped by their culture, geography, language and historicity. Each local church, in communion with its other ecclesial groups, has to renew according to the ways God involves "Godself" with this people, a group changing, developing, living and being a historical, empirical and concrete church. This suggests that parish renewal may present one challenge to a particular parish that can be distinctively different from the challenge faced by another.

A renewing parish will be helped by norms and guidance from credal confessions and codes of ethics and law. But its vitality will need to be illuminated by a historical, empirical and concrete ecclesiology-from-below. Thus the undergirding ecclesiology for parish renewal is an historical-theological one that directs people in their relationship with God and with their world.

Renewal and Liturgy

Numerous attempts have been made, in the United States and elsewhere, to foster parish renewal during the last two decades. Cursillo weekends, Marriage Encounter, Christ Renews His Parish, Renew, have all been a boon for parish renewal. Many have come away with an experience of conversion, dedication and enthusiasm. What all of these movements have in common is a strong sense of bonding, affective appeal and a mis- sioning of members back into their social settings. What is unfortunate among all these "good news" renewal movements is that liturgical renewal has not captured the same vitality. Or is it that we have failed to unearth the treasures and potential of the liturgy itself to renew?

Liturgy is the public work of this particular local church. It is hard work; it calls for energy expended in public celebration. It demands careful preparation, full and active participation, and follow-up evaluation. Liturgy is often thought of, particularly by clergy and well-educated planners, as primarily textual. This means that liturgy is viewed as rites residing in ritual books. But liturgy is communal, public, ritual activity; its stylized action is a prayerful doing of the mighty deeds of God in the here-and-now.

When liturgy is performed well, it is the source of personal prayer because its biblical and ecclesial images invade the assembly's mentality and inner life and eventually convert the heart by pushing out images of darkness. When liturgy is effective, it is the basis for people-to-people relationship in parishes because the Spirit gives various charisms to build up the assembly. When liturgy uses symbols authentically, it enables the assembly to be energized in order to be sent forth to connect the symbolic life with the doing of the works of justice and compassion, mercy and peace. When liturgy attends to this praying group, it begins to engage the assembly with its surrounding culture and the culture with the church.

Perhaps parish renewal has not happened as we might like because we have not believed that the liturgy has the power to effect renewal! What might occur if we took the liturgical renewal seriously! How might it renew the parish?

Renewal Through the Liturgy of the Word

One source of renewal through liturgy is the liturgy of the word. The specific church we call parish is a people who hears the word of God. This word invites people to faith by revealing the person of Jesus. It presents him to a people who can be converted to loyalty, friendship and allegiance with him. The word of God proclaimed in assembly puts this group back in touch with the authentic origins of this people: with Jesus and his movement.

On one hand, the church is always servant of the word of God. A parish is renewed by obedience to the word. On the other hand, the NT churches created and authored the word (and later determined which texts were canonical) in order to keep the memory of Jesus and his prophetic movement alive. The biblical texts are thus heuristic. They trigger a skein of images in order to unroll the scroll of salvation history. The original compositions were intended to meet the ecclesial needs of NT communities and to form their members in relationship to one another and to their social setting.

The reforms of Vatican II introduced a three-year Sunday lectionary so that a richer fare of scripture would be heard. This has been a boon for Catholics who indicate that, twenty years later, they have a better and deeper appreciation of Sacred Scripture because of the lectionary. This has been an ecumenical blessing as well because all the major churches have reshaped their Sunday lectionaries in like manner. The new lectionary was also designed to meet the need of catechumens whose journey might last up to three years. R.C.I.A. directors, catechists and pastors base their instruction on the lectionary. Still, much of the promise in this reform is still to come.

What might enable the Word of God to reform parishes? Four proposals are offered here.

First, each cycle focuses on one of the synoptic pictures of Jesus. Each year an assembly hears the word about Jesus through the eyes of Matthew, Mark or Luke (with selections from John inserted at various places). What still calls for development is the ecclesial, prophetic and mission significance of each gospel tradition, not only for its original hearers, but also for contemporary hearers. What this concretely means is this: obviously each parish does not redo its ministries and activities each year. But what if these ministries and activities were shaped by, focused on, and colored through the christological lens of the gospel heritage being proclaimed and presented that year. Even more concretely, as each gospel presents its own rendition of the passion, death and resurrection of Jesus, each one does so from its own perspective. Could not the perspective of that particular gospel begin to be directed practically to the life and ministries of this here-and-now assembly. The implications of this hold out important challenges to parish staffs and members.

Second, we have seen a recent desire of people to grow in their spiritual life and to deepen their personal bonds with God through spiritual direction. This is often done in one-to-one reflection or by small groups meeting with a spiritual director or guide. Whatever the setting, the process is one of listening, disclosure of the innermost heart, an evaluation of how God is working there, challenge, direction and encouragement. These same elements are also found corporately when the Sunday assembly hears the liturgy of the word. The assembly listens to God who is disclosing divine relationship with this assembly. The assembly evaluates its life in obedience to the word. It is challenged, directed and encouraged by the preached word, especially when that word is given by one who has intimate experience of the assembly. The consequence is that hearers of the word are able to offer prayer of petition and the great prayer of thanks and are sent forth to do the mission of Jesus.

Third, the blessing of literacy is at times a bane to those hearing the word.

Since the printing press and the ability of many to read easily accessible printed material, the church has risked losing its ability to be at home in an oral-aural world. Liturgical proclamation of the word demands that proclaimers and listeners reclaim an ancient orality if the word is to resonate in their hearts. Proclamation, like all good story telling, commands attention because it is sound heard in the here-and-now. It is actual and present. The voicing of sound enables the inner meaning, the interior, to be heard and known by the listeners because sound echoes and reveals the interior through the instrumentality of the proclaimer. Sound differs from print; the former allows listeners to hear simultaneously, the latter allows for assimilation of inner meaning at each reader's pace. A skillful proclaimer engages the listener totally by the sound of his or her voice, by posture and pace, by bodily expression, and by facial communication. When a group hears, sounds are united and the group moves towards harmony.

A modern assembly is often bombarded by multiple sounds every day. Even the best of proclaimers faces a difficult task with an assembly. In addition, modern people are so used to the privacy of printed text, that it is easy to assume that the oral-aural is endemic to a more ancient culture. Finally, so pervasive is the influence of print that our church space is often arranged like print type on a page (simply look down on an assembly seated neatly in pew after pew). Nonetheless, albeit a difficult task, a reclaiming of oral proclamation is crucial to parish renewal.

Fourth, the word of God is never confined to the proclamation of biblical text. The word is fleshed out for this assembly by homiletic preaching. The task of the homilist is to speak a word that rekindles faith and that enables the assembly to know God's loving presence. The skillful homilist is first a student and prayer of the word. The homilist is also one who can draw on the texts to help people interpret their lives and to offer eucharist.

The homily can often be the word that facilitates conversion, reconciliation, consolation and peace for people in their real life situations. This requires that the preacher know the life situation of the parish members. It also means that the homilist is one who has become imbued in biblical and ecclesial images and has become a disciplined wordsmith at home with the picture-language of metaphor and parable.

The homily does not exhaust the preaching ministry. People still hunger for conversion-preaching presented by artful preachers and for catechesis given by catechists who can use beautiful language to instruct and motivate the heart. We thus turn to a second source of renewal, R.C.I.A.

Renewal Through R.C.I.A.

The specific church we call parish is a people who are responsible for new birthing in their midst. Thus a second source of parish renewal is the assembly's role in inviting new members and in assisting their conversion. The R.C.I.A. has become a significant means of parish renewal, not only for catechumens, but also for those who have been Christian for many years. Parishes are still learning that this is not a program but a formative process done in the midst of the assembly. It is easier, especially for parish staffs, to administer a program. It is more difficult to make a group commitment to all the ambiguities and vicissitudes entailed in a process.

For the R.C.I.A. to be a vital means of parish renewal, assemblies must estimate their spirit of welcome and hospitality. The R.C.I.A. demands that people use their gifts to minister to one another because these people have shared in the hospitality of the Lord, have eaten and drunk with him. It forces people already baptized to examine their values, interests and lifestyles. In short, parish members are asked to plumb their praxis and the quality of service exercised in this assembly. In turn, "the catechumens are now part of the household of Christ, since the church nourishes them with the word of God and sustains them by means of liturgical celebrations" (47).

Evangelization. A ministry to catechumens is also a means of evangelization for the already baptized. The period of catechumenate is "an extended period during which the candidates are given suitable pastoral formation and guidance, aimed at training them in the Christian life. In this way, the dispositions manifested at their acceptance into the catechumenate are brought to maturity" (75).

Pastoral formation, guidance and training are spelled out in n. 75, 1-4. First, catechumens receive catechesis, gradual and complete, accommodated to the liturgical year and solidly supported by celebrations of the word. Second, their conversion journey is aided by the example and support of parish members who act in collaboration, e.g., sponsors, godparents, pastors, catechists, fellow catechumens and the entire Christian community. The quality of their presence can support or hinder Christian conversion. The hopes of this period are attitudinal and spiritual: that catechumens turn to God in prayer; that they bear witness to faith; that they keep their hopes set on Christ; that they follow supernatural inspiration in their deeds; that they practice love of neighbor, even if that entails self-renunciation. What this local community hopes for is that the process will foster for all a change in outlook and conduct, "made manifest by its social consequence." Third, n. 75 indicates that the assembly, a mothering church, helps the journey by liturgical rites that both purify and strengthen the candidates with God's blessing. It also witnesses to its life and commitment by having the catechumens join them for the Sunday celebration of the liturgy of the word, after which the catechumens are kindly dismissed in order to break open the word they have heard. Fourth, since the Christian life is apostolic, catechumens learn to work actively with others to spread the gospel and build up the church by the witness of their lives and by professing their faith.

These four points seem to be ad rem not only for catechumens but also for the entire assembly. In short, they indicate what parish renewal is. It is, first, a learning from the word of God lived out in the seasons of the liturgical year. Second, it is fostered by collaborative, not competitive ministries which help people cultivate a Christian way of life, including self-renunciation and praxis for social justice. Third, it requires that the entire assembly, patterned on the self-emptying of Jesus, be purified of toxins that destroy Christian life in order that the Spirit will fill the church with strength. Last, it is not intramural; it calls for apostolic service done with others as constitutive of the Christian life.

Any parish which is serious about its continued life will find ample basis for renewal in n. 75, 1-4. This will invite internal renewal based on the word of God, prayer, sharing, collaborative ministry, communal discernment, and mutual nurture and edification. It will also invite external vitality by a praxis of social justice, apostolic service rendered others for the sake of the reign of God, and a style of working with others.

Mystagogy. The second area of initiation ministry is the period of mystagogy, the post-baptismal period of fifty days. Part of the difficulty with this period is cultural. Many parishes do a fine job preparing people for sacramental moments and do celebrate the moments well. But they do not always know what to do with follow-up and with enthusiastic levels of rejoicing.

Parish groups are only now learning what it means to reflect back on the paschal mystery. This requires a method of theological reflection and faith sharing, an ability to spend time in being glad (without anyone's input), and the willingness to cherish mystery through contemplation, celebration and conversation. Perhaps the baptized will learn how to savor their paschal life only when they have learned how to minister this with the newly baptized.

The implications of this are significant for a sense of belonging to the diocesan church, for perseverance in faith by annual reunions, and for establishing bonds that sustain old and new-born when struggle, suffering and discouragement set in. There are no instant cures for an underdeveloped mystagogy. Perhaps parish renewal will entail a commitment to the entire process and a willingness to confront the product-oriented culture that the local church may have to oppose.

Renewal Through Sunday Eucharist

The specific church we call parish is a people who celebrate the Lord's Day. Parish renewal, if it be authentic to the heritage of faith, finds its highpoint in the Lord's Supper shared on the Lord's Day. Western Catholics, often accustomed to achieving results, may seek to get something out of Sunday eucharist. The experience of the Eastern tradition is a corrective. Eastern Christians celebrate because of the inestimable privilege of glorifying God. Sunday is not just a leisure time component which makes up the weekend. Sunday is the first day, the symbolic day, a sign of the privileged and graced time of the church between the ascension and the final coming of the Lord, the time we now live.

Parish renewal means reclaiming Sunday in its entirety—by keeping vigil as a people await the dawn to push aside and invade darkness so that the church discovers the risen Christ, by celebrating the Lord's Supper, by a spirit of leisure and communion with one another. It means that each historical, empirical, concrete assembly take seriously its primary ministry of assembling because a people is most clearly church when it assembles on Sunday (S.C., 7-10). Sunday liturgy is the lex orandi that is the norm and locus for lex credendi.

A number of concerns, when addressed by a parish, will indicate how its renewal is going. First, each parish might wish to measure how well it incorporates those who are liminars, the outcast and pariahs in society. This includes many women, some of whom are divorced, separated, single, widowed and often highly significant contributors to a local parish's life. It includes children who are sometimes abused, neglected, ignored or excluded from taking any significant role in liturgy. It includes elders, members of minorities, the disabled, those who are absent due to their being ill or in prison, and those who experience societal prejudice because of sexual orientation or who are angry because they perceive church discrimination—all these seek a place of welcome at the Lord's table.

Second, each parish might examine the language it uses. The old dictum, nomen est omen, still obtains. Liturgical language can no longer be exclusively male. This is not an issue because a parish needs to placate women or avoid conflict. What is at stake here is how we name God, how an assembly uses language to open up people's affective appreciation of the mystery of God, church, human-kind and world. When texts are crafted (e.g., in penitential rites, in the prayer of the faithful, in introducing the Lord's Prayer and in inviting to table sharing), they need to be fashioned to expand meaning, to avoid idolatry, and to enable the entire assembly to express both lament and doxology in public prayer. Those who shape prayer texts need to be attentive to the cultural context of its people and to how words both shape and express meaning.

Third, each parish might critique its worship space to ensure that it creates a setting congenial to reverence and warm hospitality. This is not simply to make people feel at home. It is for the sake of being what liturgical prayer claims an assembly is, i.e., sisters and brothers who offer praise to a God who is lavish in love, generous in mercy, and abundant in forgiveness. Either we shape space or it will shape us. If liturgical space is ill suited, our celebrations may result in a faith that is hindered or at risk of being destroyed. If space is fashioned according to how a parish wants to be church, if it even allows for some flexibility and possible rearrangement, then it is space that serves the assembly. In turn, an assembly that is thoughtful about its worship space may begin to work for hospitable and beautiful housing for its members and others in a neighborhood.

A parish can renew through its Sunday liturgy by calling forth an assembly that acknowledges and uses its people's gifts. Those who are proclaimers, cantors, musicians, artists, environmental ministers, greeters, servers, deacons, presiders and preachers serve the primary group, the assembly, in its prayerful dialogue with God. This assembly gathers around the font as it initiates new members in the awe-inspiring, death-defying waters. It gathers around the Lord's table as an assembly that voices the prayer of thanksgiving. Further liturgical renewal will require texts that manifest the eucharistic prayer as a dialogue between presider and assembly and that show that this prayer is an ecclesial doxology offered to God for the gifts of redemption and creation.

Renewal Through Pastoral Care

Parish renewal at its finest is never focused on liturgy alone. It looks for ways to connect public prayer with pastoral service. If the public work of prayer is effective, then its challenge makes a parish attentive to wholesome pastoral care. Liturgy often addresses critical turning points in the life of people and by doing so through ritualized prayer, points to and nourishes pastoral ministry at these turning points. If the liturgy models how we want to be church, i.e., different gifts used in service of the assembly, then pastoral care will create ways for gifted people to care for others.

Pastoral care includes those who are absent from the assembly due to illness or disability. Pastoral visitation of the sick, communion for the sick and their families, anointing of the sick in hospitals and homes and care for the dying require those gifted and trained to minister both personally and liturgically. Pastoral care will be exercised by both ordained and non-ordained, professional and volunteer ministers, and more informally by friends, neighbors and family members.

Pastoral care will create ways for people to serve those who are alienated or cut off from ecclesial communion. A ministry of reconciliation requires an ability to listen and a variety of ministers to facilitate groups of penitents seeking reconciliation. Liturgies of reconciliation presume a process of conversion and ritualize what has been developing due to God's grace working in those ministering and those being served.

Pastoral care will create ways for parish renewal by creative engagement of Catholics and other Christians to gather for conversation, liturgical prayer (e.g., a liturgy of the word or the liturgy of the hours), and for planning out social ministry (e.g., advocacy for others or assembling for public witness and prayer on behalf of justice and peace).

Renewal and Mission

Parish renewal, through liturgical celebration and pastoral care, does not exist solely for itself or its own members' personal salvation. A historical, empirical, concrete church is not only a community which celebrates liturgy, but also a people sent forth in mission. Liturgical and parish renewal are for the sake of the world, a world where Christians live the gospel. When an assembly uses elements authentically (e.g., bread, wine, oil, water), when it attends to their symbolic meaning, then it will call attention to the waters of the seas and streams, the soil which grows wheat, the welfare of vineyards that give grapes. How terrible that water used in baptism as a symbol of life, could become a symbol of death because it became so irrevocably polluted! How sinful a church would be if, in using the elements of the earth authentically, it did not care for those who picked grain or grape in sometimes inhuman or unjust situations. A local parish is never an isolated sect. As a church, it is most vital when it expresses its communion with other churches, when it looks beyond its own horizons and celebrates its communion with churches of other nations and concerns itself with being part of a global connection.

The United States bishops, in their pastoral letter Economic Justice for All, linked worship with justice. "Challenging U.S. economic life with the Christian vision calls for a deeper awareness of the integral connection between worship and the world of work. Worship and communal prayer are the wellsprings that continually call the participants to greater fidelity to discipleship. To worship and pray to the God of the universe is to acknowledge that the healing love of God extends to all persons and to every part of existence, including work, leisure, money, economic and political power and their use, and to all those practical policies that either lead to justice or impede it. Therefore, when Christians come together in prayer, they make a commitment to carry God's love into all these areas of life (329). . . . The liturgy teaches us to have grateful hearts.... We are encouraged to use the goods of the earth for the benefit of all" (331).

PASTORAL ADMINISTRATOR

Because of the increasing shortage of Roman Catholic presbyters, more and more parishes lack full time, resident presbyters as pastors. In such cases, lay women and men, religious sisters and brothers, and deacons are being appointed as leaders and principal pastoral ministers. This ministry is often referred to as that of pastoral administrator.

Other terms that are also used in North America include pastoral coordinator, parish life coordinator, parish director, resident pastoral minister, pastoral leader, parochial minister, and lay pastor.

The term "administrator" may be inadequate on two grounds. In Catholic canonical terminology, it is a temporary position, yet the end of the present shortage of presbyters does not seem very close. More importantly, "administrator" does not convey the spiritual dimensions of this minister's role and function.

Canon 517.2 requires that a presbyter be appointed to supervise and support the ministry of one or more pastoral administrators. He may be known as the presbyteral moderator, canonical pastor, priest supervisor or regional pastor. In addition, the ministry of the pastoral administrator may be supplemented by that of one or more presbyters who preside at the eucharist and other liturgical celebrations on a regular or occasional basis. This presbyter may be known as the sacramental priest or supply priest.

Pastoral administrators provide pastoral leadership to parishes on a full time basis, and should have appropriate qualifications. They minister as a presbyter-pastor would in administration, in ministering to people in crisis, in enabling individuals and groups to take leadership in ministry, in education and preparation for sacramental celebrations, in preparing and promoting good worship, and in generally building up the community of faith. They relate both to the presbyteral moderator and sacramental priests.

The liturgical ministry of the pastoral administrator will vary according to the availability of the sacramental priest and local needs and customs. However, he or she may be called upon to preside and preach at the following liturgies at least on an occasional basis: weekday celebrations of the liturgy of the hours, liturgy of the word, or other communal prayer; Sunday celebrations of the liturgy of the word or liturgy of the word and holy communion; penitential services; visits and communion to the sick; viaticum and prayers for the dying; marriages; funerals, including the wake, church service and burial; various blessings; baptism of persons in danger of death; acceptance into the catechumenate and the rites of the catechumenate of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults; distribution of ashes on Ash Wednesday; the Easter triduum (omitting the eucharist). When a sacramental priest is available only infrequently, the pastoral administrator may also preside and preach at baptisms for children and at other liturgies.

Resources for Sunday liturgies include:

Other resources are being prepared by the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy in the United States, and by the National Liturgical Office in Canada.

PENANCE

The term penance names both a religious practice and a sacrament of the church. The practice, which may arise from the desire to undo the damage of one's own sinfulness, or which may be undertaken as a prayer-action on behalf of someone else, or even the more inclusive "sins of the world," is primarily an act of worship, a turning to God who alone can overcome the reality of sin. It is not a spiritual payment that somehow buys forgiveness and mercy; it is the opening of the human heart to ask for, trust in and receive the mercy which God freely gives. The sacrament of the church goes under many names: confession, forgiveness, reconciliation, penance. In that sacrament the full religious practice of penance is set in motion; one surrenders even one's sinfulness to the mystery of God, in which mystery sin (alienation from God, from others and from oneself) is transformed into praise, forgiveness, communion and reconciliation. See entries below; also, Reconciliation; Forgiveness, theology of; Conversion from sin.

PENANCE AND RECONCILIATION

The terms "reconciliation" and "penance" (metanoia) in their NT origins had a comprehensive reference to the impact of the saving work of Christ upon a fallen world and upon those who came to believe in Christ. The principal ritual focus of these terms was on baptism, the sacrament by which the saving work of Christ became effective and the eucharistic communion of believers was established.

This essay is concerned with a second usage of the terms "penance" and "reconciliation": their reference to the modern post-baptismal rites of the Roman Catholic church. The use of the terms in this context is characterized by considerable terminological instability. In an examination of the 1974 Roman Rite of Penance, Paul de Clerck has identified five meanings for the word "reconciliation" and six meanings for the word "penance" (de Clerck, 313-314). De Clerck found little logic in the manner of employment of these terms and concluded that the rite as a result betrays an overall lack of coherence. A further problem is that the terms "penance" and "reconciliation" are often used interchangeably in official documents, as well as in general ecclesiastical parlance. This is often the case even in instances where some distinction is being suggested. For example, the 1984 Apostolic Exhortation on Reconciliation suggests a distinction between penance and reconciliation, yet generally follows interchangeable usage.

In order to establish some terminological stability, we shall suggest a distinction between reconciliation and penance in post-baptismal context. By post-baptismal reconciliation is meant the formal restoration of baptized believers to the communion of the church after virtual excommunication through serious sin. By post-baptismal penance is meant the comprehensive ongoing process, involving every feature and practice of Christian life, by which believers are more fully converted to Christ. The use of the term "reconciliation" in the way suggested here is quite traditional and reflects the understanding of early Christianity. The term was habitually used to refer to the formal conclusion of the process by which those who had entered the order of penitents were restored to the communion of the church by the bishop and allowed to return to the eucharist.

This usage is reflected in the later-developed tradition. For instance, the prayers for the public restoration of a sinner found in the 8th-century Gelasian sacramentary (itself a compilation of earlier materials) manifest a strong reconciliation motif. These prayers are profoundly ecclesial in character and indicate a definite conception of the church as the community of reconciliation. At least up to the beginning of the Middle Ages, the rites of reconciliation were markedly public, processual in character, and clearly restricted to cases of serious sin. Typically they involved some form of excommunication, a period of intense ascetical reparation, and a liturgical act of reconciliation by the bishop. When this tradition eventually was replaced with the private form of penance developed in the Celtic church, the critical reconciliation motif remained intact and survived in all subsequent developments of the rite. Thus there is clear precedent for speaking of "the sacrament of reconciliation" in reference to the ritual act that performs the task of restoring sinners to the church.

This concept and practice of reconciliation is underlined in the decree prefacing the 1974 Roman Rite of Penance in which we read: "Because of human weakness, Christians 'turn aside from (their) early love' (see Rev 2:4) and even break off their friendship with God by sinning. The Lord, therefore, instituted a special sacrament of penance for the pardon of sins committed after baptism (see Jn 20:21-23), and the Church has faithfully celebrated the sacrament through the centuries—in various ways, but retaining its essential elements" (The Rites of the Catholic Church, English translation prepared by The International Commission on English in the Liturgy, New York: Pueblo Publishing Co., 1976, 339). The Introduction to the rite declares that in this sacrament "the faithful 'obtain from the mercy of God pardon for their sins against him; at the same time they are reconciled with the Church which they wounded by their sins and which works for their conversion by charity, example, and prayer'" (n. 4; The Rites, 344). By the church's reconciling ministry in the sacrament, "those who by grave sin have withdrawn from the communion of love of God are called back" to the life they have lost (n. 7; The Rites, 346). The choreography of return and reconciliation is dramatized in a set of biblical images: "the Father receives the repentant son who comes back to him"; "Christ places the lost sheep on his shoulders and brings it back to the sheepfold"; "there is great joy at the banquet of God's Church over the sinner who has returned from afar" (n. 6; The Rites, 346).

If the term "reconciliation" in post-baptismal ritual context refers to the specific process by which those in serious sin are reconciled to the church, "penance" has a much wider and more inclusive reference and incorporates all those actions and processes that facilitate the sanctification, moral transformation and ongoing conversion of the church and its members at every level of corporate and individual Christian life. The closest biblical equivalent to penance is metanoia, which has to do with the profound interior conversion of life that accompanies the drama by which men and women become disciples of Christ. Latin Christianity translated metanoia as paenitentia, a word suggesting conversion of life or moral transformation. If baptism was paenitentia prima, the whole complex of prayer, ascetical practices and forms of life that advance baptismal commitment had the character of paenitentia secunda (Tertullian, De paenitentia, 6, 14). St. Augustine devised a scheme in which he identified three kinds of penance which together represent the whole ecclesial process of sanctification. There was pre-baptismal penance associated with the process of conversion; everyday penance which extends through the whole of life and achieves forgiveness from daily sins; and major penance for grave sins (cf. Sermons 351, 352).

While the term "reconciliation" traditionally had limited reference to the restoration of sinners to ecclesial communion, "penance" was used to refer to the comprehensive range of ascetical and sanctifying activities to which every faithful Christian is obliged. The 1974 Roman Rite of Penance, despite some conceptual instability, seems to conceive of penance in this comprehensive sense. On the question of the name of the revised rite, the U.S. Bishops' Commission on the Liturgy had this explanation: "The rite does not contain only the sacramental rites of reconciliation but also presents a variety of non-sacramental celebrations which, while penitential in character, are not sacramental celebrations. The broader title of Rite of Penance also embraces these celebrations" (Commentary on the Rite of Penance. Study Text 4 [Washington, D.C.: U.S.C.C., 1975], 10).

This comprehensive and progressive sense of penance is underlined by the 1984 Apostolic Exhortation on Reconciliation and Penance: "If we link penance with the metanoia which the synoptics refer to, it means the inmost change of heart under the influence of the word of God and in the perspective of the kingdom" (No. 4; Apostolic Exhortation on Reconciliation and Penance, published in Origins 14 [1984], 435). Accordingly, "it is one's whole existence that becomes penitential, that is to say, directed toward a continuous striving for what is better" (ibid.). Penance means, "in the Christian theological and spiritual vocabulary, asceticism, that is to say, the concrete daily effort of a person, supported by God's grace, to lose his or her own life for Christ as the only means of gaining it" (ibid.). It refers to the "effort to put off the old man and put on the new; an effort to overcome in oneself what is of the flesh in order that what is spiritual may prevail; a continual effort to rise from the things of here below to the things of above, where Christ is" (ibid.). Penance is "a conversion that passes from the heart to deeds and then to the Christian's whole life" (ibid.).

The terms "reconciliation" and "penance" and the theological concepts they enshrine resist complete compartmentalization. There is considerable overlap and their somewhat interchangeable character yields up insights that are integral to biblical and liturgical theology. However, within the more limited realm of modern Roman Catholic ritual theory and practice, there are good grounds for more stable and restricted usage.

PENANCE SERVICES, NON-SACRAMENTAL

In the revised Rite of Penance (1973) for the Roman Catholic church, in addition to three forms for the sacrament of reconciliation, liturgical services without sacramental absolution are likewise recommended for use. In structure these are essentially services of the word. Proclamation from scripture calls the assembly to conversion of heart. There is an examination of conscience led by a lector. People may come forward to speak publicly those things for which they feel the community needs to ask God's forgiveness: healing and liberation. All pray the confiteor, and the service is brought to completion with the Lord's Prayer and some form of blessing (e.g., laying on of hands by the presider).

The intent of such services is clearly stated: "to foster the spirit of penance within the Christian community; to help the faithful to prepare for confession which can be made individually later at a convenient time; to help children gradually to form their conscience about sin in human life and about freedom from sin through Christ; to help catechumens during their conversion" (R.P., 37). How successful these services are in achieving this intent, however, is another matter.

Experience with these non-sacramental penance services seems to show that they are not as satisfying to the faithful as are the sacramental forms. This is perhaps due to patterns of habit; perhaps to the Catholic instinct that requires some sacramental action to respond to and complete the word. The contrast is particularly evident in places where communal sacramental forms (Form II or III) were first experienced, and where non-sacramental services are forced to take their place due to shortage of priest-confessors and/or to increased restrictions on the use of general absolution. In a large American suburban parish, for example, where general absolution was given to assemblies of five to seven hundred people at a time during Advent and Lent, there are but seventy to eighty who attend the non-sacramental service of the word.

Non-sacramental penance services can be both successful and quite helpful if a proper context is provided for them. In parishes, for example, where an order of penitents is established, Lent can provide such a context. All members of the parish may be invited to become liturgical penitents and to confess their sins on Ash Wednesday and carry out a penance of prayer, fasting and almsgiving toward eventual reconciliation with God and the church on Holy Thursday. The Mass of the Lord's Supper is then seen as the goal of the reconciliation process and the completion of its celebration. In such a context, non-sacramental services may provide faithful, formal penitents, as well as catechumens and candidates for entry into the church at Easter, with opportunities for conversion at an increasingly deeper level.

Such celebrations may also be appreciated by groups of engaged couples as part of their preparation for marriage. Since both parties of the marriage are not always from the same Christian community, and since these services can welcome other Christians as well, from the Roman Catholic perspective, non-sacramental services can be very appropriate celebrations of God's reconciling love. They can also help alleviate some of the stress and tension that may arise between the engaged couple and their families as marriage preparation unfolds.

Children can be led to a better experience of sacramental reconciliation by simple celebrations of the non-sacramental rites. In an American culture, teenagers find the non-sacramental rites much less threatening than the auricular confession which they have almost universally abandoned.

Other seasons and feasts can also provide a helpful context for non-sacramental penance services. Advent can offer a welcome ground for them as preparation for Christmas. Pentecost can be a good time to proclaim the victory of Christ over sin and the power of the Holy Spirit coming among us for the forgiveness of sins.

PENANCE, CANONICAL

In its first perception of how the victory of Christ over sin may be offered to men and women, the early church adopted and adapted the water bath; baptism for the forgiveness of sin (see Acts 2:38). In its second perception, it pointed to the "breaking of bread," the Lord's Supper enacted in his memory (see Mt 26:28). In its third perception, the church had to deal with those who, by public acts such as murder, apostasy and adultery, had severed themselves, after baptism, from the communion of the eucharist. Sinners had to be restored to eucharistic communion.

Canonical penance refers to an elaborate form of restoration to communion that developed in the early centuries in tandem with the elaborate form of Christian initiation. It addressed serious public sinners and therefore involved them in public acts of penitence on their path to reconciliation with God and with the church. An order of penitents was established. The whole community, by its own prayer of intercession, was involved in the process of reconciliation. Penitents were publicly reconciled on Holy Thursday (in the West) and Good Friday (in the East). It had one severe drawback which eventually led to its demise as a practical sacramental response to human sinfulness: it was allowed but once. It was therefore put off by many until their death bed.

PENANCE, CELTIC

The church order of the Celtic church differed from the church on the continent in that it was arranged around monastic spiritual centers rather than according to territorial dioceses. In these spiritual centers, beginning in about the 5th century, a different response to human sinfulness took shape. The context was spiritual direction and guidance; private rather than public. The process was confession or acknowledgement of sin, some penitential acts for the reform of life, and forgiveness or "absolution" pronounced in private once the penitential acts had been completed. Its advantage over the earlier form of the sacrament, namely canonical penance, was its frequency. Its disadvantage was its separation of the reconciliation process from the liturgical assembly.

The rise of Celtic penance signified a changed understanding of sin as well as a changed understanding of God's forgiveness. No longer a public act with its own public consequences, sin was regarded as "code violation" and its consequence was the incurring of debt. The "model" was of serf and Lord; it was also called "tariff penance." Debt had to be paid before the debt could be "absolved."

In the earlier form of penance, canonical penance, the prayer of intercession allowed the people of the church a part in one's reconciliation process. This instinct of community support continued in Celtic penance, though in somewhat bizarre fashion. The debt of one could be paid by many (substitutions); the debt of the dead could be paid by the living (remissions); the debt of both the living and the dead could be paid by "tapping" the unused merit of those "holy ones" called "saints" (indulgences); most of all the debt could be completely dissolved by applying to the sinner, living and dead, the fruits of Christ's own sacrifice. The eucharist became once again the sacrament of reconciliation, but in the quid pro quo mindset of economic exchange, rather than the ecclesial mindset of the church gathered for prayer.

The current practice of "private confession" derives from the Celtic form of penance. Where once it was the unwelcome intruder on the normative pattern of canonical penance, it is regarded now as the norm. Contemporary desires for more communal forms of the sacrament seem to reverse the earlier pattern of evolution where Celtic penance wrested priority of place from canonical penance.

PENITENTIAL DAYS

Penitential days refer to those periods in the liturgical calendar when special attention is given to the discipline of ascetical practices such as prayer, fasting and almsgiving. The General Norms for the Liturgical Year and the Calendar (1969) and the revised Code of Canon Law (1983) both absorbed the reforms made by Paul VI in the apostolic constitution Paenitemini (1966). This reorganization of penitential discipline includes the observance of penitential days formerly known in the church's calendar as ember days. However, they are not numbered among the days on which fast or abstinence is required.

By the 8th century in Rome, penitential acts observed on particular days of the week came to be known as the quattuor tempora, the four seasons, and hence ember days by way of the German Quatember. Twelve liturgical days arranged in four triads, i.e., the Wednesday, Friday and Saturday of four weeks of the year, were located approximately at the beginning of the four seasons. Although origins remain unclear, it seems certain that their observance began in the church in Rome and became part of western practice only when the Roman liturgy made its way into other western countries.

The Didache (8:1), an early Christian document dating from the end of the apostolic period, testifies to the observance of Wednesdays and Fridays as fast days. Wednesday marked the day anticipating the Lord's arrest thus beginning the passion, and Friday commemorated the day of his death on the cross. The origin of the penitential character of Saturdays remains obscure. It may have developed because it was the day the disciples fasted while their Lord rested in the tomb. It also followed Friday, the day of pain and sorrow, and preceded Sunday, the day of joy and glory.

The earliest testimony to ember fasts came from the 4th-century author, Pontius Maximus, who affirmed their observance with an appeal to Zech 8:19: "The fasts of the fourth month and of the fifth, the seventh, and the tenth, shall become festivals of joy and gladness." By the 5th century the ember fasts were established and familiar practice as witnessed in the ember week sermons of Pope Leo I (d. 461) who considered them binding moral precepts of the new covenant that originated in OT regulations and in apostolic tradition. He was the first to associate the practice with the four seasons of the year: in the spring a fast during the forty days before Easter, in summer a fast at Pentecost, in the fall during September and in winter during December. The purpose of the cycle of fasting was to learn from the constant and recurring rhythm of the year's cycle that all the baptized were in constant need of purification. At least since Pope Gelasius I at the end of the 5th century, candidates were presented and scrutinized for ordination on Wednesday, presented for public approbation on Friday and ordained at the vigil liturgy on Saturday. The Liber pontificalis which dates from the early 6th century testifies that Pope Callistus I (217-222) ordered a fast on three Saturdays of the year, in summer, autumn and winter, in keeping with the prophecy of Joel 2:15-19, at the season of new grain, wine and oil.

Each ember week ended between Saturday night and Sunday morning with a long vigil mentioned several times by Pope Leo I in his sermons. The Mass of this night vigil counted for the Sunday. However, by the 7th century a special Mass was formulated for this Sunday while the nocturnal liturgy was regularly moved to an earlier hour until it was finally celebrated on Saturday morning. As a result Saturdays in ember weeks also took on a penitential character such as Wednesdays and Fridays.

The custom of seasonal fasting as observed on particular penitential days spread throughout northern Europe with the acceptance of the Roman liturgy. The sending of Augustine and his monks to England by Pope Gregory I (d. 604), the missionary work of Boniface (d. 754) from England to Germany and the efforts of Pepin (d. 768) and Charlemagne (d. 814) extended these penitential practices.

By the middle of the 9th century the observance of the four groups of ember days was widespread in the West. At the Roman synod of 1078, Pope Gregory VII resolved confusion about the exact weeks within which the ember days were to be observed. His decision marked the first time that the exact dates for the church's observance of ember days were determined authoritatively. They were to begin on the Wednesday after the first Sunday of Lent (spring), in the octave of Pentecost (summer), after the feast of the Exaltation of the Cross on September 14 (autumn) and the week after the third Sunday of Advent (winter). These days represented an intense ascetical effort at the beginning of each of the four seasons. The liturgical observance of each ember day included its own proper office. The priest or bishop who presided at Mass wore violet vestments with the exception of red during the octave of Pentecost. The traditional penitential exercises of prayer, fasting and almsgiving were complemented and balanced by days of thanksgiving and gratitude for the seasonal harvests.

The revision of the liturgical year and calendar which followed Vatican II retained the ember days in principle while leaving their date and form to the discretion of episcopal conferences so that observances could be adapted to the needs of the local churches. Paul VI reformed the section of the 1917 Code of Canon Law on penitential days with the apostolic constitution Paenitemini (1966). That same year the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in the United States instructed Catholics to abstain from eating meat on Ash Wednesday and on all Fridays during Lent and to fast on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. A recommendation was also made to the entire Catholic community to abstain from meat on all Fridays of the year; individuals were encouraged to impose a fast on themselves on all weekdays of Lent. The penitential nature of the Lenten season was thus highlighted and reinforced while the Advent season was characterized less by penance and more by expectation and vigilance.

The General Norms for the Liturgical Year and the Calendar (nn. 45-47) acknowledge the traditional observance of ember days and affirm their value. The revised Code of Canon Law contains five canons (1249-1253) which deal with the purpose and particulars of days of penance. They largely echo Paenitemini. The purpose of penitential days, especially all Fridays of the year and the season of Lent, is to unify all Christians in a common observance of penance by way of fidelity to prayer and works of charity, to self-denial and the observance of fast and abstinence. Such practices no longer seek self-abnegation as their goal; rather, they constitute a discipline that enables a faithful and effective response to the gospel mandate of love. The particulars of penitential observances, such as their time, number and purpose, are entrusted to the discretion of the episcopal conferences.

PENITENTIAL PRACTICES

"Repent and believe the gospel" is a call to conversion, but it involves more than just a change of heart. To repent is not merely to be sorry for sin, but to undo the damage caused by sin, to reform one's life, to make the crooked ways straight and the rough paths smooth for the coming of the Lord. In Christian tradition, penitential exercises were absolutely essential for the forgiveness of sins. The link between forgiveness and doing penance was weakened by reducing the "penance" of the sacrament of reconciliation to the recitation of prescribed prayers after absolution had already been given.

Church teaching and practice distinguished four parts in the sacrament of forgiveness: contrition, confession, satisfaction and absolution. The first three are acts of the penitent, and belong together as parts of a single process of repentance. The "satisfaction" was a program of prayer, fasting and almsgiving which gave concrete expression to the inner conversion, strengthened and developed it, and helped to undo the damage caused by sin. During the first eight centuries this was the normal pattern. In the smaller communities of early Christianity the sinner was easily recognized by his sinful behavior and was "excommunicated" from the community, both to teach him a lesson and to protect the community from the contagion of his sin. He was re-admitted only after he had proved the sincerity of his repentance by carrying out the "penance" prescribed by the community. In the case of secret grave sins, the sinner would confess these to a spiritual counsellor who would decide whether they were grave enough to warrant public penance. But absolution came only after the penance had been completed, and it was a solemn reconciliation, usually on Holy Thursday.

In the early centuries the penances were mostly public, and re-admission to the community was allowed only once in a lifetime. By the 8th century frequent confession had become common, but because many penitents did not return for absolution after doing the prescribed penance, the practice developed of doing the penance afterwards. This inversion of the order in the acts of the penitent was meant to be pastorally helpful, but in fact it introduced an artificial break in the natural process of repentance. A more serious consequence of the change was that a new outlook developed in the understanding of penance. It came to be seen as a punishment for sin, and the model for the sacrament of forgiveness came to be the criminal one, the court of law with judge, sentence, punishment. More and more, penance was seen simply as a penalty to be paid for wrongdoing. The system of tariff penances helped this process with its detailed lists of graded penances for different kinds of sins. Prayer, fasting, abstinence from marital relations, pilgrimage or exile were all imposed. Some were for life, others for years, from thirty down to one year. Seven days fasting was the penance for drunkenness, one day on bread and water for immoderate eating. The severity needs to be judged against the general harshness of life in those centuries, and it must be admitted that the penitential books did stress the need for conversion and strove to emphasize the ecclesial and sacramental aspect of penance. Good intentions, however, were not enough. The judicial model is still largely dominant. In spite of the new rites of reconciliation, there is still a crisis about the sacrament. The judicial model needs to give way to more biblical and more caring models, of healing (medicine), of pastoring (the shepherd looking for the lost sheep), of the weak, immature person needing help to grow.

Of the papal documents since the council, Pope Paul VI's exhortation Paenitemini (1966) is the one most in line with Vatican II thinking and contemporary theology. It emphasizes the social dimension of sin, conversion and penance, and makes clear that penance and social responsibility cannot be separated. It takes up the traditional penitential activities of prayer, fasting and almsgiving, but stresses that they need to be developed in line with the needs of today's world. The penitential dimension of all Christian life is underlined as part of ongoing conversion, with a strong emphasis on social responsibility.

Any rehabilitation of penitential practices needs to relate them intrinsically to the nature and effects of sin. They are not punishments imposed for wrongdoing, but medicinal practices to heal the harm done by sin. When seen in this light, the traditional ones make a lot of sense. Augustine listed them as: prayer, fasting, almsgiving, endurance of the sufferings of daily life, forgiveness of insults, works of service, but most of all praying the Our Father in the liturgical assembly.

In religious terms, sin brings about a break in the relationship with God, alienates one from one's better self, from one's fellow human beings and in a certain sense from the environment. The penitential practices work in all of these areas. Prayer can heal the break with God and rebuild the love relationship he offers. But for this to happen, more is needed than the recitation of a few formal prayers. It is not a question of placating an angry God to make up for the offense. God does not need our prayer, but we need it in order to allow God's love to come back into our lives. Sin is basically self-assertion, putting self before all else, deciding for oneself what is right and wrong. To change this attitude we need first to recognize and accept that we have done wrong: "I have sinned against you, you only, O God" (Ps 51:4). We need to admit our need for God: "Create a pure heart in me, O God" (Ps 51:10). But most of all we need to become prayer-full people so that God can put a new spirit in us without forcing our freedom.

Augustine saw the Our Father as most efficacious for repentance and forgiveness. He says: "God has established in his church . . . a remedy which we need to take each day by saying: 'Forgive us our trespasses'" (Sermon 352.8). To pray the words Jesus gave us is not merely to recite a prayer, but to want to take on the basic attitude of mind and heart expressed in the words: that we truly want God's name (his person, his will) to be blessed, respected, honored; that we really want his kingdom to come, a kingdom of justice and peace, of harmony, of mutual love and service; that we recognize God's goodness in the gifts of the earth, our daily bread, that we recognize our dependence on him in meeting our needs. When we pray: "Forgive us our trespasses" we truly want to be healed of our sinfulness, even if it costs, and especially we ask God's help in forgiving others. To the extent that we forgive others, we become more like our heavenly Father who forgives all with equal love. As a penitential practice to enable us to relate to God as we should, the Our Father needs to be more than a formula. It needs to become a basic attitude and outlook, a whole pattern of life. Augustine points to its strategic position in the eucharist, where it is an expression of reconciliation with God and with the community, so that it is both a means for becoming the body of Christ and a preparation for receiving the body of Christ.

Fasting is closely allied to prayer. Jesus speaks of certain demons that can be cast out only through prayer and fasting. From earliest times fasting has been a common religious practice: as atonement for sins, as an expression of sorrow and conversion of heart, as a purification, as a discipline to control the body and facilitate prayer, and as a means of getting God's ear. The church no longer imposes the rigid fasting periods of former times, but devout Christians are rediscovering the benefits of fasting for improving the quality of spiritual life. Although the traditional fast meant only one full meal a day, it is not uncommon now to find committed people who observe a total fast from solid food for a full day each week. The mortification involved (death to the unbridled self) helps to heal the selfishness and internal alienation involved in sin, bringing a new wholeness to one's life. Fasting can be understood in the broad sense also to include restriction or abstinence in all one's appetites.

When sin directly hurts one's neighbor there is need to undo the damage caused to his person, property or reputation, to make restitution if something has been stolen. This is a matter of strict justice. But every sin has a social dimension in so far as the sinner's selfishness lessens the holiness of the body of Christ and also leaves him less capable of reaching out in love to his neighbors. Almsgiving and the other corporal works of mercy have always been the means of overcoming this aspect of sin. But the spirit of almsgiving can be broadened to include all giving of oneself to help others in need. In today's world of refugees, famine and natural disasters there is no shortage of worthy causes needing help. But a special form of almsgiving aimed at overcoming the social effects of sin is work for justice and peace. In his closing address to the 1983 Roman Synod of Bishops, John Paul II spoke of the social dimension of sin and penance, and he stressed that working for peace is an integral part of conversion. It is difficult to trace individual responsibility for sinful, unjust structures of discrimination and exploitation, but we are all involved, however unwittingly. Communal celebrations of penance can heighten awareness of our solidarity in sin, and we can pray for God's healing forgiveness, but to avoid the accusation of "cheap grace" our penitential practice should include some action for social justice.

Alienation from the environment is another effect of sin. The earth God gave us as our home and garden can become a hostile environment, so that we earn our bread in sweat and toil (Genesis 3). But a new form of alienation is taking place at present in so far as we exploit the resources of our planet with no thought for the delicate balance of nature so essential for the common well-being of all God's creatures. Our concern for comfort, luxury, efficiency and profit has raped the earth and poisoned the sea and air so that we have no gift to leave to future generations. Pope Paul VI's call to the church to find new forms of penance to meet the social dimension of sin is a special challenge in this area. The size of the problem should not be an excuse for inaction. Penitential exercises can reach from personal discipline in the purchase and use of certain goods, to involvement in tree-planting, political lobbying, consciousness-raising.

To discuss penitential practices simply in terms of the penance to be done as part of the sacrament of reconciliation fails to do justice to Paul VI's statement: "By divine law all the faithful are required to do penance." It is an integral part of Christian life. Although Jesus had no need of personal repentance, he fasted for forty days. Following the Master, every Christian must take up his/her cross and share in the sufferings of Christ. There are many sins for which the sacrament is not necessary, but none can be forgiven without conversion, contrition; and these need to be externally expressed in penitential exercises. Whether used as remedies for venial sins or accepted as satisfaction for sins confessed in the sacrament, penitential exercises are directed towards a new way of life. Their purpose is to express and develop the ongoing conversion to which all Christians are called.

PENITENTIAL RITE AT MASS

Part of the introductory rites of the revised order of Mass, the penitential rite follows the entrance song and greeting and precedes the Gloria and collect or gathering prayer. It is given as an alternative to the rite of blessing and sprinkling which is not itself penitential in character; its purpose is to express the paschal nature of Sunday and to be a memorial of baptism. In pastoral practice the penitential rite is more often used than the sprinkling rite.

Three versions of an invitation to repentance followed by a pause for silent prayer lead into three forms of penitential prayers. The first option is the Confiteor which all pray in unison. The second is a two-fold exchange between the presider and assembly which acknowledges corporate sinfulness and asks for the Lord's mercy. The third alternative lists eight possible invocations, each one structured around a three-fold litany of praise to the Lord which the presider or deacon invokes and to which the assembly responds after each entry, "... Lord, have mercy, ... Christ, have mercy, ... Lord, have mercy." The eight models offer a pattern for presiders and planners in composing original versions. The invocations are to be addressed to Christ; they are to be brief, direct and adapted to the season of the year, the day's feast or the images and metaphors of the day's scripture readings. They should never be turned into an examination of conscience. (A number of publishers of leaflet missals as well as enthusiastic presiders have unfortunately promoted invitations to the "Lord, have mercy" litany which begin, "For the times we have ... , Lord, have mercy.")

The third invitation to the penitential prayers, "let us call to mind our sins," is more exactly rendered: "let us acknowledge our sins," a translation that yields a subtle though significant difference for a proper understanding of the penitential rite. An acknowledgement of sinfulness and a call for mercy avoid slipping into an examination of conscience or a listing of particular sinful acts. Thus the purpose of the penitential rite at Mass in its various forms is not to replace or be the occasion for the sacrament of reconciliation. Nor is it to drive the assembly inward into a review of sins. Rather, it is to move the assembly outward into an acknowledgement that the community at worship stands before a merciful God.

The presider concludes each of the three forms of penitential prayers with a formula of absolution during which no sign of the cross is required. The Kyrie, eleison or Lord, have mercy has been retained in the first form of the rite, after the Confiteor, but it tends to be disconnected from what precedes and follows.

The inclusion of a penitential rite as a public and communal act at the beginning of Mass is an innovation in the 1969 missal of Paul VI, its one single feature that is without precedent in the Roman rite. Formerly the presider's vesting prayers in the sacristy and the prayers at the foot of the altar were his private penitential devotion. The processional usage of the Kyrie, eleison chant rooted in the movement of the bishop from the altar to his throne in the apse of a church has faded in the missal of Paul VI. The penitential rite has been experienced in its various forms as a disturbance in the ritual flow of the liturgy, an afterthought between the greeting and gathering prayer.

Many pastors, liturgists and liturgiologists note the misplacement of the penitential rite. If the purpose of the introductory rites is "to make the assembled people a unified community and to prepare them properly to listen to God's word and celebrate the eucharist" (General Instruction of the Roman Missal, 24), why run the risk of individualizing members of the assembly in a penitential mode after they have gathered precisely as a worshipping community? While this unevenness is adjusted in baptismal, wedding and funeral Masses where there is no call for the use of the penitential rite and where the introductory rites proper to those liturgies suffice, it remains in other eucharistic celebrations.

In its current position after the entrance song and greeting, the penitential rite carries a semi-Pelagian thrust and seems to imply that people inaugurate their own conversion. The recommendation has been made that the rite be placed at the end of the liturgy of the word prior to the prayer of the faithful since it is the proclamation of the word of God that makes penitence possible. A penitential heart is open and receptive to the word and life of Christ; however, the initiative for such conversion always comes first from the Lord.

Simply because the communal penitential rite at Mass is unprecedented does not imply that penitential forms find no place in the Mass. The use of a Kyrie litany as an acclamation or as an accompaniment to processional movement is a valuable form of supplication when such litanies are called for. Thus, some liturgical theologians find no need for a penitential rite in every eucharistic celebration. Their proposal encourages future revisions of the introductory rites to adjust to the spirit of the liturgical season.

In the season of Lent or on other penitential days that call for more attention to supplication and penitence, a penitential entrance psalm or Kyrie litany would enhance the spirit of the event. Any proposal to revise the introductory rites ought to come, not from a desire to simplify and clarify the rite for the sake of expedience, but as an effort to highlight the most important aspect of the rites which is the gathering of the assembly for worship.

PENITENTS, ORDER OF

The order of penitents is a process of intensive pastoral care for Roman Catholics who have been suffering estrangement or alienation from the institutional church and who feel called by the Holy Spirit to return to practice through reconciliation. It strives to respect the person's own story of constant conversion and the challenges of the gospel as proclaimed by the Roman church.

It is a contemporary pastoral movement that originated in the United States in the early 1980s, in a few parishes, out of a concern for the alienated. It has grown significantly in the United States and Canada, principally, through the efforts of the North American Forum for the Catechumenate's Office of Remembering Church. The Forum has become a network for parishes and pastoral ministers reaching out with gestures of reconciliation and offering a process that ministers healing, liberation, and forgiveness.

The contemporary ministry of the order is solidly based in the patristic church of the 2nd through the 4th centuries, when it was parallel to the ancient catechumenal journey for those coming into the church. Fathers in the age of Tertullian, Cyprian, and Leo welcomed serious sinners into a process of healing called exomologesis. It was considered the heart of the ancient order and brought the penitent, by stages of penitential process, back to full communion with the church. It respected and thrived on the liturgical year with entrance into the order on Ash Wednesday and the joyful celebration of solemn sacramental reconciliation on Holy Thursday. It was a ministry of the whole church with much emphasis on the strength of the praying community. Small groups of faithful would meet periodically with individual penitents, at their request, to pray with them. Similar groups surrounded each penitent to fast for them as well as give alms for the forgiveness of their sins. Bishops, presbyters, and deacons met frequently with the penitents and faithful for simple forms of exorcism, much like those found in the contemporary experience of the R.C.I.A.. These exorcisms were always accompanied by the rite of imposition of hands, as a parting gesture, and the continuing ministry of the church toward reconciliation of the penitents.

While the contemporary version of the order of penitents is a natural parallel to the restored catechumenate, it lacks the severity of the old acts of public penance. It was those acts of penance which eventually brought the ancient order to a close, and the imposition on the church of private, auricular confession at the Fourth Lateran Council. Pastoral creativity has served the tradition well by laying plans for a restored order of penitents that is fashioned on our patristic tradition. It respects the latest research on conversion and aims to cooperate with the movement of the Spirit in the community as well as in the individual penitent.

The process of formal reconciliation is marked by stages of catechesis and moments of inner healing. It begins with a parish effort of evangelization to call back to faith and practice those who are alienated from the community. Each penitent is given a companion with whom to walk the journey of reconciliation. A team of ministers is formed and penitents and companions meet weekly for catechesis, prayer, and Sunday liturgy. The lectionary becomes the basis of the catechesis each week while the formation focuses on the liturgy. As Lent approaches, the penitents, in the midst of the community, are signed with the ashes and begin to journey through the liturgical season serving the community as a witness to everyone's call to repent and reform.

In the parish community, the penitent is a fellow journeyer with the others. As penitents are called to the confession of sins and God's mercy on Ash Wednesday, so are all parishioners. A penance is negotiated with each penitent by the priest and absolution is postponed until after the homily in the Mass of the Lord's Supper on Holy Thursday. Following the absolution the mandatum is celebrated with the penitents and the peace rite anticipated from the communion ritual. Newly reconciled penitents are invited into the action of the eucharistic prayer. At the communion time they are invited to the table for the Lord's Prayer and are the first to participate in the communion.

Like the catechumens, the penitents spend time in reflection on their experience of being forgiven, restored to the table and reconciled with the church at Easter. As the penitents anticipate the Feast of Pentecost and prepare for it, they are called to a commitment of ministry in the parish. This is not to be interpreted as a "reinstatement." Penitents come to the table on Holy Thursday with a new set of relationships with the community of the faithful. Now they are present with the faithful as apostles and witnesses. They share more deeply in the mission of the whole church to preach the word, to care for the poor, to give praise and thanks to the Father. They are a new people in the risen Christ.

I have pastored this process of a restored order of penitents for eight years at St. Ephrem, Sterling Heights, Michigan. The parish now has a team of three couples who are the principal care givers in the order. It is a permanent part of the structure of this large suburban parish and welcomes, for pastoral care, alienated Catholics. In this experience the most crucial issue has been the connectedness of the order with the ongoing liturgical life of the parish at large. Because the order is built around the liturgical calendar, as is the R.C.I.A., penitents are in full view of the praying community and often the object of that powerful prayer.

The community understands well that the small wooden cross given penitents on the first Sunday of Advent is a request for prayer and an invitation for the faithful to express some form of welcome home to penitents upon meeting them. Penitents are part of the entrance procession at every eucharist and enjoy the approving nods and smiles of parishioners as they process behind catechumens on the way to the altar. As penitents gather around the processional cross in the sanctuary, the faithful chant the penitential rite over them, praising God for his wonderful mercy and generous forgiving love. The opening prayer is prayed and all are seated to hear the word. Catechumens and penitents alike are dismissed at the appropriate time after the homily.

On Ash Wednesday penitents and faithful are encouraged to come for auricular confession of sins and negotiate a penance for Lent, of prayer, fasting, and almsgiving. Having agreed upon a penance, all leave without absolution to practice the penance and deeply embrace the Lenten spirit. Holy Thursday, then, becomes the day for celebrating reconciliation with absolution available to parishioners all day beginning at six in the morning until the beginning of the Mass of the Lord's Supper in the evening during which penitents are absolved after the homily. This effort of separating the confession from the absolution provides all with an opportunity toward some form of process in the sacrament. People begin to see the healing and liberating effects of penance. It is more clearly perceived as medicinal rather than punitive.

The liturgical thrust of our Lenten observance is always done in the framework of a universal call to penance. Members of the order are reminded over and over that they are witnesses to all the faithful, that all are called to be penitents. Parishioners are reminded in a Lenten booklet, the Sunday homily, the parish paper, that all are walking the journey of repentance with this small group of formal penitents in their midst, to be a sacrament of God's mercy for all. Holy water fonts at church entrances are drained the day before Ash Wednesday and filled with the ashes. Parishioners are encouraged to use these ashes all during Lent until the sacred triduum.

Evaluation of this ministry is very important. About eighty-five people have been part of the order during the past eight years. Recidivism is a factor but it is very low. It occurs principally in those who have not taken on a ministry in the parish following their reconciliation.

PENTECOST

The term "Pentecost" in the Christian liturgical calendar refers both to the fifty-day celebration of Easter and to the culminating day of the celebration, Pentecost Sunday. The calendar pattern before the Vatican II reform had for all practical purposes lost the sense of "the fifty days of Easter," and Pentecost was considered an isolated feast, celebrating the birth of the church, provided with its own vigil and quite oddly, its own octave. In the post-conciliar reform, priority is restored to the more original sense of Pentecost as a celebration of fifty days; Pentecost Sunday concludes the celebration of Easter, and does not stand on its own as an independent feast. Some ambiguities, however, remain. The octave has been removed, but the vigil remains; and while the Easter vigil is clearly given as the time for the initiation sacraments—baptism, confirmation and eucharist—some provision is made for the delayed celebration of confirmation on Pentecost.

For those in charismatic movements, Pentecost is the day: the day of the Spirit. For those more liturgically inclined, Easter is the day: the day of resurrection and the Spirit. The tension or dispute between the two is not unlike that between those who prefer the unity of initiation sacraments (baptism, confirmation, eucharist in that order) and those who urge confirmation as a sacrament of adulthood, thereby celebrated long after baptism and first eucharist. Both are biblically grounded. Johannine and Pauline theology hold resurrection and Spirit-sending together as one act; Luke-Acts separates them in time. The theological task seems to be first to recapture the unity of the mystery of Christ (a unity ruptured in the West, though preserved in the East) and in the context of that unity to understand the difference. Resurrection and Spirit-sending are indeed two movements. How best to "express the mystery of Christ" (S.C., 2) in this regard remains to be discovered.

POLITICS, LITURGY AND

At its most general level, this issue concerns the relationship between the public worship of a faith community and the organization and regulation of life in a society. Because both are essentially public activities, liturgy and politics, whether of the faith community or the civil society, can influence each other in many ways.

The polity of a faith community will be reflected in its worship. The attitudes and values, norms and structures, goals and concerns of the wider community can also affect public worship, especially the prayers, preaching, and modes of participation in it. When found congruent, elements from political life can be reflected in the form or substance of public worship; when they are seen to be alien or incompatible, the liturgy can take shape in opposition to them. In either case political realities can be significant for liturgical life.

For its part, public worship always makes a statement about human life and the relationship of persons to God and the community. It readily influences participants' activities and judgments in the ecclesiastical and civil communities, particularly when faith, morality, or mission are involved. These effects can originate from the faith or mysteries of faith at the heart of worship. Worship can also be deliberately designed or used to advance particular causes in the community.

In the Roman Catholic church, the liturgy is the full public worship of God by the church as mystical body of Christ (S.C., 7), principally the celebration of the sacraments. In the liturgy, by means of word and sign, the church encounters the Lord who died and rose in human history and will one day return in glory. The liturgy is therefore a powerful source of transformation and understanding for persons and communities (S.C., 5-10, 47-48, 59). Especially when they celebrate the eucharist, the faithful are enriched with divine life and transformed for worship and service as God's holy people (S.C., 2, 7, 10). The church is reminded of its mandate to teach, preach forgiveness, and witness reconciliation to all nations until the end of time (Mt 28:18-20; Lk 24:47). The liturgy thus has decidedly temporal and political effects and implications. The church is part of the human community and must proclaim the gospel, defend the God-given dignity of each person and promote justice and peace in the human community. This religious mission sometimes requires it to criticize objectionable conditions and give provisional support to worthy projects in the earthly city (G.S., 40-43, 76).

To assure that it serves the mysteries of faith and the human community in light of faith, the liturgy is regulated by ecclesiastical authorities. Since Vatican II the church has permitted the liturgy to be celebrated in vernacular languages. Within stated limits and to promote full and fruitful participation (S.C., 11, 14), the liturgy has been opened to adaptation by episcopal conferences, diocesan bishops, and individual presiders. These steps have made the liturgy more responsive to local conditions and influences. Local church leaders must now shoulder a greater share of responsibility for the liturgical life of their communities, including its political aspects. In this regard, liturgical education, planning, and preaching call for particular attention.

For the Roman Catholic community, the relationship between liturgy and politics involves certain other considerations. Among these are the autonomy proper to civil political life; the balance between the transcendent and historical dimensions of the liturgy; the adequacy of the language and signs actually employed in it; and the control, planning, and evaluation of liturgical worship in light of the purpose and integrity proper to it. In the background is the fundamental issue of the church and its relationship with the world (G.S., 33-36, 53-59, 73-76).

PRAYER, LITURGICAL

Within the common purpose of all prayer to be the expression of communion with God, liturgical prayer is that distinct type of prayer which may be characterized as ecclesial. It is the shared activity of the whole people of God which articulates the faith in which they are united. As a consequence of this ecclesial character, liturgical prayer is usually marked by an official dimension. It involves the authorization through some competent means of established forms or rites which, during the period of their authorization, have a normative status in the common, public prayer of the faith community. Although those forms may also be used as a basis for private or informal prayer, their normative status is most evident when they serve the common prayer of the people assembled for public, liturgical worship.

Prayer is a deeply human activity in which the unconditional authority of God is acknowledged or at least implied. It is thus an activity which grows out of the creature's experience of dependence, and which through disposition and word and gesture ascribes to the Creator the ultimacy which is God's alone. All prayer expresses that relation of creature to Creator, but it is through the multifaceted experience of public worship that the remembrance of that relation is renewed with special power and scope. Public worship may be ascribed that particular importance because of its ecclesial character as the response of a community of believers to their shared experience of God's presence and power in their lives.

The authorization of specific forms to serve such ecclesial acts must always be carried out with an awareness of the primacy of the corporate liturgical act within the faith experience. The use of authorized texts for prayer is not an end in itself, nor is it the essential characteristic of liturgical prayer. This must be said because the historical evolution of the liturgy carried it into a sidetrack of canonical and clerical priorities which lost sight of the ecclesial nature of liturgical prayer, a mutation which will be considered later in this article.

The positive value of such authorized forms for the common prayer of the faith community, however, remains. They foster the prayer of the people when they assemble for public worship, and they strengthen a sense of the unity of faith between the local community and other communities of faith throughout the world. Authorized liturgical forms are an external expression of that unity in which all share through the one baptism. They promote the experience of that unity in common prayer. Yet conformity to a fixed text is not the first priority in liturgical prayer. The forms serve to point the community to the divine reality which infinitely transcends all forms or rites or symbols. The forms used in prayer can direct the mind and heart to that numinous mystery before whom all our words, even our most splendid liturgical phrases, are but the stammerings of infants. The goal of liturgical prayer is to bring us to the threshold of an encounter with the Holy One about whom our words are only hints.

If liturgical prayer has so high a purpose, why is that purpose so often obscured by the familiar models in our liturgical experience? At least in part the answer may be found in the mutation referred to above, namely in the evolution of liturgical models which have eroded the ecclesial nature of liturgical prayer. One of the results of that erosion has been the loss of an understanding of the counterpoint between corporate and individual prayer in the life of faith. Many Christians have been formed to carry the expectations of private prayer into the experience of liturgical prayer. Lack of formation in the life of prayer, both corporate and individual, has obscured for many worshippers the distinctions between liturgical and private prayer. If Christians attend the liturgy with the expectation, conscious or not, that the needs of their individual piety will there be fulfilled, then the experience of the liturgy as a corporate act of prayer will, in the end, be found at odds with their purpose in being there. In positive terms, a new perception of corporate prayer may emerge, but there may also be a resulting disorientation of personal piety with the loss of the familiar model.

This type of liturgical disorientation has been a serious pastoral dilemma during the recent decades of liturgical change not least because, for many of the clergy as well as for the laity, public worship had been the occasion of an intense act of private piety. The gradual recovery of a corporate model of liturgical celebration has disrupted the former pattern in ways which leave the question of the relation of individual prayer to liturgical prayer unresolved. Although liturgical prayer is different from prayer in private or in a small group, it does not negate the importance of these other forms of prayer. There is a deep complementarity between different types of prayer which becomes evident when each is experienced in its integrity; yet they are not alike.

The liturgical prayer which the Christian community celebrates when it assembles is the essential act of its common memory, in which the baptized are reminded through the proclamation of scripture and the homily, and through the sacramental action, of the plan of redemption which God has accomplished in Christ. Through the liturgical signs, the story of salvation is lifted up within the experience of the gathered assembly, and there becomes the focus of a shared offering of praise and thanksgiving. Liturgical prayer is thus the dynamic remembrance of God's act of redemption into which each member of the assembly has been grafted through baptism.

In this perspective, we can assert that our private prayer as Christians is a type of prayer which is derived from our membership in the Christian family of faith and our participation in the common prayer of that community. Our primary experience of prayer is found in the liturgical prayer which is characteristic of the life of the church and is expressive of the common faith professed by all the baptized members of that society.

To speak of private or family prayer as derived from the church's common prayer implies a complementarity which has not generally been explored. It is striking how often manuals of private prayer show little connection to the familiar forms of the liturgical tradition. This may be a carry-over from the time when official liturgical texts were seen as the private domain of the clergy, but it fails to draw upon the natural complementarity which would seem to characterize all types of prayer. If we may take the Lord's Prayer as an example, it is a prayer which Christians have used extensively both in liturgical and in private prayer. This familiar double use offers a model of the interplay between the church's liturgical prayer and more private acts of devotion.

Yet if the Lord's Prayer, because of its preeminence among Christian forms of prayer, finds a natural home both within the liturgical context as well as in private prayer, Christians have, on the whole, failed to apply that double usage to the other great common forms of our liturgical rites. The complementarity between liturgical prayer and private devotion echoes powerfully as we recognize in familiar liturgical texts a splendid resource for private prayer. To take, for example, such a text as "Holy, holy, holy Lord, God of power and might, Heaven and earth are full of your glory . . .," and to interweave it into the framework of private prayer offers a tangible opportunity to experience the union of our personal prayer with that of the church in heaven and on earth. Such a bridge between liturgical and private prayer fosters an integration of the intensity of private devotion with the experience of corporate liturgical prayer.

The German liturgist Balthasar Fischer has commented on this relation between corporate and private prayer in the experience of the faithful during the early centuries of Christianity. "The most important characteristic of common prayer in the ancient Christian family seems to me to lie in the extension, into the home, of public worship . . . (The Church had not come) to the painful dichotomy that is the hall-mark of mediaeval domestic piety, which is obliged to set up a second universe of prayer—easily understood, and so more primitive, more subjective—side by side with the liturgy, since the latter was now incomprehensible and dominated by the clergy” (Fischer, p. 118). With these words, Fischer raises the specter of clericalization as the fundamental cause of the alienation of the church in general from the true spirit of corporate liturgical prayer. The history of the liturgy reveals that the gradual domination of public worship by the clergy is paralleled by the emergence of a private world of lay piety cut off from the normative and unifying influence of the church’s corporate prayer. All in the church, laity and clergy alike, were victims of this development as the life of the ordained came to be seen as radically set apart from the ordinary lives of the people as a whole.

Impact of Clericalization

The emergence of a clericalized understanding of the celebration of the official rites of the church led to a fundamental separation of those rites from the common experience, not to mention common celebration, of Christians. The recitation, for example, of the eucharistic prayer in a low voice, inaudible to the assembly, became a prelude to a changed understanding of the eucharistic action to be essentially the work of the ordained rather than of the whole people of God. What may have begun as a somewhat innocent style of priestly devotion, or a misguided sense of eucharistic mystery, led eventually to a generalized piety of passive participation in which the people lost any sense of their integral role in the celebration of the rites of Christian faith.

Another important expression of the clericalization of the corporate prayer of the church is found in the imposition of a monastic model for the divine office as an expectation for secular clergy. This had the effect of linking the liturgical piety of parish clergy to monastic prayer rather than to the daily prayer of the local church. Since many of the parish clergy did not reside in communities in which the monastic cycle might be celebrated in common, a further result was the eventual privatization of what had once been a significant pattern of ecclesial liturgical prayer.

From the 4th century, a document called The Diary of a Journey by a Spanish nun named Egeria offers us a description of daily meetings for prayer by the local community at Jerusalem. These services of prayer were clearly ecclesial in character, involving both laity and clergy in their celebration. The growth of the monastic movement led to the expectation that the whole pattern of daily prayer would be shared by all the members of the community, and that absent brethren would say in private any hour of prayer which they had missed. This obligation was, however, an aspect of the monastic discipline and not an obligation for ordained clergy. For the latter, daily prayer seems to have been linked to pastoral responsibilities, and it was the prayer of the church community rather than a specifically clerical obligation. Each local community might do only some modest part of the whole cycle of daily prayer; but in large urban churches, with numerous clergy in residence, the complete cycle was introduced, probably under the influence of the monastic mode.

Beginning with the 6th century, the church grew dramatically outside the great urban centers. By this time, however, the monastic model had reshaped the church’s concept of the daily office, and the hours of prayer came to be understood as an expectation imposed upon the clergy. By the late 8th century, legislation on these matters made clear that the recitation of the daily office was required of all clergy. If it could not be said formally, in the church to which they were assigned, then it was to be said in private.

The evolution toward private recitation of the office received added strength in the 13th century under the impact of two factors, the lifestyle of the itinerant Franciscans and the situation of student clergy at the universities. The fact that Franciscans were often on the road in order to fulfil their special ministry, and the absence of clergy from the churches or communities to which student clergy were related while they pursued their studies, encouraged the private recitation of the hours of prayer. Although the choir office continued to be upheld by bishops and councils, private recitation gained ground in what had become by now a narrowly clerical concern. Eventually the obligation of the divine office was linked to ordination to the subdiaconate and higher orders, and theologians, including St. Thomas Aquinas, justified its recitation in private. This movement away from the ecclesial understanding of the office reached a brief official status in 1535, with the publication of the breviary of Cardinal Francisco Quiñones which was designed for private recitation. Although its authorization was eventually withdrawn, the practice of private recitation had found a firm place in the private prayer of secular clergy.

The gradual clericalization of both the eucharist and the divine office which we have observed here, mark a major defection, albeit well intentioned, from the ecclesial understanding of liturgical prayer discussed above. What had been the two primary expressions of corporate prayer—eucharist and office—had been progressively claimed as a separate domain of prayer by the ordained clergy and become the constitutive elements of their own private piety. In regard to the eucharist, the church's insistence upon lay attendance under normal circumstances assured that the Mass continued to be a public act, but one at which lay participation was limited to a passive piety of vision. With the exception of cathedral churches and monastic communities, the divine office became generally an act of private priestly piety. We see here the situation in which liturgical prayer and private prayer lost their distinctive character: the authorized liturgical rites became the nucleus of the private piety of the ordained, and the laity, even while attending public liturgical celebrations, were left with only private devotions or para-liturgical rites.

This historical development shows the importance of our earlier insistence on the ecclesial nature of liturgical prayer as the normative understanding of such prayer. The gradual identification of liturgical prayer with the action of the clergy which is outlined above indicates a shift in which that prayer became more readily defined as "official prayer according to authorized rites," with little concern whether the rites were celebrated by an assembly or by one ordained person. The corporate celebration of liturgical prayer and the church's authorization of prescribed forms for such corporate acts are not mutually exclusive priorities, but when liturgical prayer most fully realizes its intentions, they ought to be but two aspects of a single reality. Such mutuality, however, has been undermined in the history of the church when an over-emphasis upon textual and canonical priorities has led to the clerical domination of the rites.

The latter part of the 20th century has seen a gradual reversal of this clericalized model under the impact of the renewed ecclesial understanding which emanated from Vatican II and similarly within the wider ecumenical context. This renewal has fostered a recovery of an ecclesial understanding of liturgical prayer in which the weekly assembly of all the baptized under the pastoral leadership of the ordained offers a common ground for a shared experience of the community's corporate identity in Christ.

The local assembly thus becomes a kind of icon of the church, the gathering of all the baptized people of God being represented in each of the local assemblies of the faithful, (see, S.C., 2).

As was suggested earlier, the great texts of the liturgical tradition should appropriately flow over into the family and private devotions of Christians as they live their daily lives during the week, and thus form a bridge leading back to the common assembly the next Sunday. This mutuality between corporate and private prayer was, as Balthasar Fischer has suggested, characteristic of the common prayer of the early church, and it offers a model for the renewal of liturgical worship in our own time.

At the heart of such a model of common liturgical prayer is the active remembrance of the shared faith into which all have been initiated and which is the underlying energy of ecclesial prayer. It is essentially corporate prayer precisely because it is expressive of the unity within the body of Christ shared by those who profess a common faith. Through baptism into the paschal mystery of Christ, Christians are committed to a life characterized by prayer in common. That prayer has its source in the trinitarian faith which is the mark of Christian identity, and thus expresses that faith in thanksgiving to God the Father who is the Creator of all that exists; in remembrance of Christ, who in the incarnation united divinity with humanity and thus enabled the members of his body to become Christ to others; and in calling upon the Holy Spirit to unite the church through his power and grace to be God's instrument in the world. This trinitarian foundation of the Christian life is renewed and nourished in the corporate worship of the church. Liturgical prayer is thus the outward manifestation of the common faith into which all in the assembly have been baptized.

Liturgical Prayer and Faith

A traditional way of expressing the relation between the prayer of the church and its faith is found in the adage, "the law of prayer establishes the law of faith." The question which arises at once, however, is how the phrase is to be interpreted with regard to the shaping of the liturgical prayer of Christians. Does public prayer have, in the light of the adage, a didactic purpose? Certainly the liturgy has been exploited at times for this purpose, as though the assembly of Christians for worship must be claimed as a primary opportunity for the teaching of the faith. We observe this phenomenon, for example, in the Reformation of the 16th century when pastoral concern for the ignorance of the laity led to the reshaping of public worship as an occasion for teaching about the faith. Although the state of lay formation during the preceding centuries encourages us to look with sympathy at the situation and attempts to address it, nevertheless, the effect of the imposition of a didactic character upon the rites had far-reaching consequences. The rites came to reflect the polemical debates which separated Christians and thus to be a sign of division rather than unity in faith. Recent decades have seen a recovery of the understanding of liturgical prayer as expressive of the church's common faith. In this perspective, the adage, "the law of prayer establishes the law of faith," has taken on dramatic importance for an ecumenical understanding of liturgical prayer.

The liturgy manifests the faith in a common celebration by God's people assembled for liturgical prayer. The trinitarian faith which is the foundation of this common prayer is celebrated in a corporate act of praise which proclaims that faith as the basis of the common identity which all the baptized share. It is in the eucharistic rite that the proclamation of trinitarian faith has its clearest focus, in the eucharistic prayer. The various forms of the eucharistic prayer in the traditions of both the East and the West offer a rich array of images through which that faith has been articulated down the centuries. We see here a primary expression of the role of liturgical prayer as an act of faith. The eucharistic prayer is not merely a formula of consecration or a definition of eucharistic doctrine. It emerges out of the ground of the Christian experience of God.

The classical forms of liturgical prayer follow a consistent theological pattern shaped by the trinitarian debates which preoccupied the church during the 4th century. At the Synod of Hippo in 393, for example, it was decreed that "at the altar, prayer shall always be addressed to the Father" (Vagaggini, p. 210). This rule was evident in the pattern of address in the collects of the eucharist and in the eucharistic prayer. The address is then followed by a reference to one or more of the divine attributes, e.g., Almighty, Creator. Liturgical prayer thus begins with the naming of the God in whom the assembly places its faith, the One whom Jesus called Abba, Father. It is this name which has taken the primary place in Christian liturgical prayer, and it always echoes with Jesus' personal experience of intimacy with God. It is this term of intimacy, translated as the name of the male parent, which in turn became part of the Christian sacred vocabulary.

The source for the addressing of God as "Father" is found in the Hebrew Scriptures. When God adopts the Israelites, they become, by way of metaphor, the children of God, and God, their Father. It is a title reserved to the chosen people. It is an expression of the covenant relationship. In the NT, as we have observed, it is Jesus who claims this metaphor to express his own intimate relation to God, and who then makes that relation available to those who believe and are baptized. There is a lack of congruence which must be acknowledged: God is neither male nor parent, and yet as a metaphor the term "Father" is a powerful expression of our unity with Jesus in his own relation to God.

As the church confronted the Arian heresy, which denied the full divinity of the Son, the practice grew of addressing prayer to Christ not only in private prayer but also in liturgical prayer. This was a way of expressing the church's belief in the divinity of Christ since, if he were not divine, such prayer would have been idolatrous: prayer might be addressed only to God. By addressing prayer to Christ in liturgical worship, a heresy was denied but a serious consequence resulted. The classical model of liturgical prayer which was affirmed at the Synod of Hippo lost its theological balance. Eventually forms were introduced into the liturgy in which it is often unclear as to whether the prayer is addressed to the Father or the Son. Thus blurring of the Father and the Son led to the loss of a clear sense of Christ's role in salvation history as mediator, a role which was clearly expressed in the classical model of liturgical prayer "through Jesus Christ our Lord."

How is this mediatorial role of Christ in the liturgy to be understood? Liturgical prayer is ecclesial prayer, the prayer of the church, but it is at the same instance the prayer of Christ. It is Christ's body, the baptized community, which assembles for public prayer and thus becomes, according to Mt 18:20, a special mode of Christ's presence: "Where two or three are gathered in my name, there am I in the midst of them." This presence of Christ in the liturgical prayer of the church is one of the foundational principles of the renewal of the church's worship in this century.

In The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican II, this principle was clearly stated. "Christ is always present in his Church, especially in her liturgical celebrations. He is present in the sacrifice of the Mass, not only in the person of his minister 'the same one now offering, through the ministry of priests, who formerly offered himself on the cross' but especially under the eucharistic species. By his power he is present in the sacraments, so that when a man baptizes it is really Christ himself who baptizes. He is present in his word, since it is he himself who speaks when the holy scriptures are read in the church. He is present as well when the church prays and sings" (S.C., 7). The Church is united with Christ through the waters of baptism and thus acts with him and in him in the whole range of its liturgical actions, sharing in an intimate bond of union which is the work of the Holy Spirit. It is thus appropriate to speak of Christ's real presence in the assembly as the means by which the church prays in Christ and through Christ.

The presence of Christ in the assembly is a transformative presence which is signified to the church in every eucharistic celebration as the ordinary material realities of bread and wine are transformed to be the body of Christ for the assembled body of Christ. It is a dynamic personal encounter in which the believing community is challenged to see and claim once again what it is called by God to be. St. Augustine preached this to his people assembled at the eucharist. "If you are the body and members of Christ, then what is laid on the Lord's table is the sacrament of what you yourselves are, and it is the sacrament of what you are that you receive. It is to what you yourselves are that you answer 'Amen,' and this is your affidavit. Be a member of Christ's body, so that your 'Amen' may be authentic" (Sermon no. 272).

This transformation of the community of believers is not automatic or magical, as much as we might wish it were that easy. It is, rather, a gradual process which is begotten in us through baptism. Our incorporation into Christ, our participation in the paschal mystery of his death and resurrection, is the basis of our belief that Christ is truly present in the liturgical assembly and that all our common prayer is offered to God as an outward, ritual sign of the unity of the whole body, head and members. This unity of the church with Christ is an awesome dignity since by it we become "a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people, that you may declare the wonderful deeds of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light" (1 Pet 2:9). Liturgical prayer holds before us the constant reminder of who it is we are called to be.

The role of the Holy Spirit in liturgical prayer has, on the whole, received inadequate attention during the recent decades of liturgical renewal. In the traditional texts of the liturgy, especially in the epiclesis or invocation of the Spirit within the eucharistic prayer, the church prays for the action of the Holy Spirit upon the community and for the transformation of the gifts, although even in this significant context Western Christianity has, in general, given far more attention to the action of Christ than to the activity of the Holy Spirit. This theological focus, namely, the two-fold activity of the Holy Spirit traditionally associated with the eucharistic epiclesis, is a clue to the more general role of the Spirit within the life of the church and within the framework of liturgical prayer. The Spirit is the agent of sanctification and unity. The work of the Spirit is thus, in the deepest sense, complementary to the work of Christ. The two are inseparable.

The liturgical prayer of the church, whatever the focus of the particular celebration or of the feast or season of the year, is always rooted in the celebration of the paschal mystery. As the gathered community of faith, we celebrate not merely the commemoration of the past event, the death and resurrection of Jesus, but the present and dynamic reality of God's saving action. The event which we commemorate is made present so that we may enter into it and share in its power. Through baptism the believer has entered into a lifelong pattern of death and resurrection as the fundamental symbol of religious meaning. Each occasion of liturgical prayer, and with special intensity the eucharist, becomes a re-entry into that basic symbol of Christian identity as the paschal mystery is actualized in the faith-action of the assembly.

Through word and sign, the liturgical rites make explicit the church's experience of the grace of God. The effect of grace is union with God, participation in the life of God. Through faith we become conscious of this gift of God's presence to us, the gift of intimacy with God which is characteristic of the relation of Jesus to his Abba. That intimate relation has now become God's gift to us. God's saving action is an abiding gift, not limited to specific moments in time.

Liturgical celebrations are grace-events within that continuum, specific occasions in which that gift is manifested through the means of a rich complex of expressive signs, offering to the assembled community of faith the opportunity consciously to accept the gift of God's grace. The gathering of Christians for liturgical prayer is thus an event of supreme importance in the life of faith; for in these regular occasions, especially those associated with Sunday as the day of the Lord's resurrection, the church is constituted and manifested as a visible icon of the baptized community which shares a common faith in the Holy One.

New Images in Liturgical Prayer

The church has lived for many centuries with a high degree of liturgical stability. Even allowing for periodic adjustments to new vernacular forms, the basic patterns of Christian liturgical prayer remain closely related to those trinitarian formulas which were worked out especially within the context of the christological debates of the 4th century. The church is understandably conservative in this sensitive area since all of our language for the Trinity is fragile, reflecting the delicate balance which was achieved as the church found a vocabulary to articulate its faith. In the realm of academic theology in particular there is a tendency to require precision of meaning for all technical terms, especially those which are used in reference to the divinity.

Liturgical prayer, as we have observed, is nurtured in the soil of Christian faith, but its language is not that of academic theology and its purpose is not didactic. Liturgical language is that of metaphor and image, as, for example, in our calling God our Father. This language of prayer and sacrament ultimately has more impact upon the common theological understanding of the church than lectures in theology. The only problem with this is an apparent tendency, at least in our culture, to literalize the metaphors and images. With this there results a loss of the awareness that all of our language about God is drawn from words which offer the closest human analogies available to us to express our intuitions about God's nature. We need these words if we are to speak about God at all, and yet they are always inadequate. They always fall far short of the divine reality to whom they point. Our mental pictures may place a crown upon God's grandfatherly head. Such anthropomorphic images have often been nourished by depictions of God which we see in medieval art. Yet, we forget that such images can be claimed only by way of analogy, not as literal depictions of the divine being. When the metaphor is drawn from nature rather than from a human image, as when Jesus says, "I am the vine," we recognize that it is not to be taken literally. When we speak of God or Christ as King, on the other hand, it is evident that the image has been literalized not only in art but in liturgical ceremonial as well.

We considered earlier the tradition of calling God "Father" as an inheritance to the church from Jesus' own intimate relation with God. In an essay like this, it is possible to explain how this name came to be applied to God and to acknowledge that the term does not suggest an association of maleness with God. Yet recent decades have seen a growth in the church of impatience on the part of many Christians with the excessive dominance of male images for God both in our liturgical prayer as well as in the vocabulary of ordinary speech. Historical studies have demonstrated the enormous influence which social norms have had in the shaping of this situation. At the same time, there has developed an awareness of the richness and diversity of biblical images for God which, it would seem, offer an unassailable source for an expansion of our own vocabulary.

The use of masculine images for God developed in the context of Jewish patriarchal society. The models for authority in the Roman world of early Christianity confirmed this cultural bias. Yet in the NT we find the evidence of a radical restructuring of the accepted views of male domination, as when Paul writes to the Galatians that "there is neither male nor female; for you are all one in Christ Jesus" (3:28). The question is not that of the removal of masculine images for God, since many of these are deeply rooted both in scripture and the liturgical tradition. Initial experiments with more inclusive language have shown that the effect of replacing such images with gender-free abstractions results in an impersonal and impoverished language of prayer. What is needed is a recovery of the breadth and richness of images to be found in the full biblical and liturgical tradition.

If the ancient adage is correct, that is, if "the law of prayer establishes the law of faith," then the narrowing of our liturgical language for God to predominantly male images has shaped the way the church thinks about God. We suggested earlier that the metaphors and images which we use in prayer shape our understanding of the faith and that all such metaphors must be approached with caution. It would seem that a rich vocabulary of images would offer a ground for mutual correction for the inadequacy of any one.

The naming of the God of Christian faith as Holy Trinity—Father, Son, and Spirit—stands at the center of the Christian tradition in both its liturgical prayer and its theological reflection. The challenge before the church today in regard to its liturgical language is to find ways in which faith in the Trinity can be professed and articulated in prayer which is consonant with the insights of the church in the early centuries—the patristic era—and which yet embrace an inclusivity of the whole of humanity which faith in the incarnation demands.

New alternatives are being tested in the liturgical prayer of the church, sometimes with authorized texts and sometimes with forms which have emerged within a very specific local situation. If we remember how painfully the church arrived at the classical formulations of trinitarian faith in the 4th century, it will not surprise us that the present search for an expanded vocabulary will be often painful and will require energy and time. As new images are proposed, they will be tested against those which have been found most adequate in the church's tradition of faith. The goal is to find images, either neglected ones from the tradition or new ones which may emerge, which challenge the church to expand its understanding of the Holy One who is beyond what language can describe and yet who lovingly accepts the stammerings of our praise.

PRAYER, TYPES OF, IN THE LITURGY

Introduction

Taxonomies of types of prayer tend to appear arbitrary. Authors, both ancient and modern, who attempt euchological classification use various principles of inclusion and arrive at different lists, sometimes even within the span of a single piece of writing. Origen, for example, in his treatise On Prayer, divides prayer into four distinct categories, that of supplication, prayer, intercession and thanksgiving. He then reorganizes his classifications according to a developmental pattern: supplication for spiritual goods, prayer as self-abandonment to God, doxology in praise of God's glory, and intercession for others. In the conclusion of the same treatise he proposes that the essential parts of prayer are doxology, thanksgiving, and petition. Origen is not being inconsistent; he is approaching prayer in each instance from a different optic (Origen, On Prayer, passim). Others provide a more expansive understanding of types of prayer by the inclusion of physical postures and even prayer's locale as significant in differentiating human response to the God of mystery. St. Dominic, for example, names nine ways of prayer: inclinations, genuflections, prostrations, penance, contemplation, earnest intercession, supplication, thoughtful reading, and praying on a journey ("The Nine Ways of Prayer of St. Dominic," trans. S. Tugwell, Canadian Catholic Review [March 1983], 22/93).

A second reason why a comprehensive taxonomy of prayer may be difficult to achieve is that often particular fixed patterns of prayer participate in several categories at the same time. The words "The Lord be with you," for example, might be classified as a greeting, an invitation to prayer, or a blessing of the community. A collect appears to be both a confession of praise and a petition. The Our Father is essentially a prayer of petition yet also contains praise and confession. And a eucharistic prayer, while obviously a prayer of thanksgiving since that is the meaning of its name, is actually composed of eight different movements: thanksgiving, acclamation, invocation, narration, remembrance, offering, intercessions, and doxology (G.I.R.M., 55).

The following article will attempt to classify and describe types of liturgical prayer from yet another point of view, that of communication patterns within the liturgical event. It will first treat some characteristics of liturgical language as a mode of human communication distinct from that of solitary prayer. Second, it will specify seven different patterns of communication which may be identified within the liturgy, namely: 1) non-verbal communications including silence, gestures, and bodily attitudes; 2) the presider's formal address to the community; 3) the presider's informal address to the community; 4) the presider's personal address to God; 5) the presider's address to God in the name of the community; 6) the prayers of presider and community in dialogue; and 7) the prayers of presider and community in unison. Under each heading, certain fixed patterns of liturgical prayer will be considered.

Liturgical Prayer As a Mode of Communication

Liturgical and solitary prayer are both necessary for the Christian life, each acting as a corrective and enrichment of the other. These two types of prayer may be distinguished from each other in a number of ways. Solitary prayer tends to be informal—sometimes even totally formless. It may be characterized as subjective, intimate, specific, free-flowing, flexible, and spontaneous. The language of solitary prayer is that of first person communication. It employs the singular voice since solitary prayer generally focuses on the individual's relationships with God, self, others and the environment within which prayer takes place.

On the other hand, liturgical prayer as the public worship of the church accomplished in the name of the whole church is communication common to each participant, expressing the worship of all, affecting all who are gathered. Liturgical prayer is, by its very nature, a corporate act which manifests and expresses the church in a highly condensed fashion. Since liturgical prayer is the language of a community its content must be about its shared life in Christ; its structure must include certain devices and the ordering of elements to facilitate communication. For communication to happen, hearers and speaker need to use the same language categories; certain models need to be employed to ensure that communication takes place; certain structured patterns of dialogue, language conventions, and even the cadence of one's voice will invite corporate response. In short, liturgical prayer will tend to be formal, stylized, comprehensive, inclusive, universal, ordered, repetitive and familiar in order to facilitate communication within an assembly gathered for prayer.

Types of Liturgical Communication

Non-verbal Communications Including Silence, Gestures, and Bodily Attitudes. Because of the nature of the liturgical act, silence is a primary and essential form of communication within the liturgy. All worship is response to the presence and invitation of God. This truth is expressed simply in Preface IV for weekdays: "You have no need of our praise, yet our desire to thank you is itself your gift." In liturgical prayer all is gift; all is response. Silence enables a waiting upon and resting in God, a listening posture under the consolation and the challenge of the word, an awesome silence in face of the Mystery who is God. Out of silence worship is born.

The function of silence in the celebration varies according to its location in the rite: it may be a preparatory silence, a silence of recollection, meditation, praise, or silent prayer (G.I.R.M., 23). The Foreword to the G.I.R.M. notes that "the proper use of periods of silent prayer and reflection will help to render the celebration less mechanical and impersonal and lend a more prayerful spirit to the liturgical rite." In addition, this document underscores the necessity of liturgical silence by stating emphatically: "Just as there should be no celebration without song, so too there should be no celebration without periods of silent prayer and reflection."

Similarly, bodily attitudes communicate attentiveness, respect, reverence, wonder, and awe in God's presence. These forms of communication, for such they are, are largely culturally determined. Adoration, for example, might be expressed by a bow in one culture, a genuflection in another, prostration in yet a third. For that reason it is left to national conferences of bishops to determine appro-appropriate liturgical postures within their locales. Bodily postures of standing, sitting, kneeling, and prostration will have different meanings in different cultures—but each posture will be a profound means of communication. As stated in Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (E.A.W.): “The liturgy of the Church has been rich in a tradition of ritual movement and gestures. These actions, subtly, yet really, contribute to an environment which can foster prayer or which can distract from prayer. When the gestures are done in common, they contribute to the unity of the worshipping assembly. Gestures which are broad and full in both a visual and tactile sense, support the entire symbolic ritual. When the gestures are done by the presiding minister, they can either engage the entire assembly and bring them into an even greater unity or if done poorly, they isolate” (E.A.W., 56). The non-verbal modes of communication within the liturgy, reverent silence, actions, gestures, and bearing, are among the means of promoting the community’s full, conscious, and active participation in the liturgy (S.C., 30).

The Presider’s Formal Address to the Community. A second mode of communication within the liturgy is a presider’s formal address to the community, a category which includes greetings, invitations, ritual dialogue, and dismissals.

The presider speaks formally in greeting the assembly. At the beginning of a celebration, a presider may use a Pauline greeting, for example, “The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all,” or, may greet more simply, “The Lord be with you.” Greetings may introduce certain actions: “The peace of the Lord be always with you” precedes the exchange of peace. New forms of greeting have been incorporated into revised ritual books such as The Order of Christian Funerals: “May the Father of mercies, the God of all consolation, be always with you.”

Formal communication includes a presider’s ritual invitations: “Let us pray”; “To prepare ourselves to celebrate the sacred mysteries, let us call to mind our sins”; “Let us proclaim the mystery of faith”; “Let us offer each other the sign of Christ’s peace.” Other forms of invitation include the traditional diaconal commands preceding the solemn prayers on Good Friday: “Let us kneel; let us stand.”

Certain forms of ritual dialogue are instances of formal communication between presider and assembly: “Lift up your hearts.” “We lift them up to the Lord.” “Let us give thanks to the Lord our God.” “It is right to give God thanks and praise.” The liturgy of the hours contains a variety of such exchanges, for example: “O God, come to my assistance,” “O Lord, make haste to help me” or “O Lord, open my lips.” “And my mouth shall declare your praise.”

Dismissals are also instances of formal communication addressed to the community, for example, “Go in peace to love and serve the Lord.” Dismissals may also be addressed to a particular group within the assembly. The dismissal of the elect during Lent is an example: “Dear elect, go in peace, and join us again at the next scrutiny. May the Lord remain with you always.”

Through communication patterns of salutation, invitation, dialogic exchange, and dismissal, the community is invited to active participation through response or ritual action.

The Presider’s Informal Address to the Community. In a variety of situations, after an opening formal greeting, for example, liturgical rubrics provide an opportunity for an informal word, a very brief introduction to the Mass of the day, or a word of greeting and welcome to candidates preparing to receive a particular sacramental rite. Introductory words may precede the liturgy of the word and the eucharistic prayer; informal comments may conclude the liturgical rite before a dismissal. Every liturgical rubric which notes, "In these or similar words," invites a presider's informal communication with the assembly. This rubric provides the opportunity to contextualize the celebration. The Congregation for Divine Worship, in a circular letter of April 27, 1973, offered the following caveat regarding informal introductions and admonitions: "By their very nature such introductions do not require that they be given verbatim in the form they have in the Missal; consequently it may be helpful, at least in certain cases, to adapt them to the actual situation of a community. But the way any of these introductions is presented must respect the character proper to each and not turn into a sermon or homily. There must be a concern for brevity and the avoidance of wordiness that would bore the participants" (14).

The homily may also be regarded as an informal mode of communication with the assembly since the etymology of the word homileo suggests communication which is familiar, personal, and conversational rather than that of a speech or a structured lecture. Fulfilled in Your Hearing, a document of the United States Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, describes the appropriate manner of homiletic communication in this way: "What we should strive for is a style that is purposeful and personal, avoiding whatever sounds casual and chatty on the one extreme or impersonal and detached on the other" (24).

The Presider's Personal Address to God. Occasionally, in the course of liturgical celebrations, a presider addresses God personally. In such instances, the substance of the prayer is a petition that the ministry of the presider may be exercised with attention and devotion (G.I.R.M., 13). Before the reading of the gospel, for example, the priest bows before the altar and says: "Almighty God, cleanse my heart and my lips that I may worthily proclaim your gospel." The washing of the hands is accompanied by the words: "Lord, wash away my iniquity; cleanse me from my sin." The private prayer of the presider before communion is yet another example: "Lord, may I receive these gifts in purity of heart. May they bring me healing and strength, now and forever."

These prayers, in light of the distinction made above between solitary and liturgical prayer, are essentially a-liturgical. They are prayers of private devotion, spoken in the first person singular, and are meant to be inaudible as their rubrics indicate.

The Presider's Address to God in the Name of the Community. The fifth type of communication within the liturgy, and that which predominates, is the presider's address to God in the name of the whole community and with the assent of their "Amen." Within this category, a further distinction is possible, namely, the classification of fixed patterns of prayer according to their essential elements of praise and thanksgiving, petition, or penitence. These elements combine in many instances but one element will generally predominate.

The presider gives voice to praise and thanksgiving, above all, in the eucharistic prayer through which "the entire congregation joins itself to Christ in acknowledging the great things God has done and in offering sacrifice" (G.I.R.M., 54). Particularly in the preface, the presider gives praise and thanksgiving "for the whole work of salvation or for some special aspect of it that corresponds to the day, feast or season" (G.I.R.M., 55a). The prefaces of the Roman Missal, though varying greatly in length, have a uniform pattern. Following upon the Sursum corda, the preface praises the Father, through Christ, by recalling God's fidelity in Christ, in the mystery being celebrated, in the lives of holy men and women throughout the ages, or in the lives of those assembled. This latter emphasis is found particularly in prefaces for ritual Masses. Such narration leads the community "with hearts full of love to join the angels and saints in a hymn of endless praise."

This pattern typifies a dialogic relationship in the liturgy in which the praise and thanksgiving expressed in the name of the community draws forth a community response of praise whether in the "Holy, holy," the acclamations throughout the eucharistic prayer, or before and after the readings.

Doxology generally terminates prayer, whether a particular prayer is one of thanksgiving, petition or reparation, in recognition that the one before whom we stand is worthy of all praise. Particular forms of doxology include the solemn close of the eucharistic prayer, the great doxology, "through him, with him, in him, in the unity of the Holy Spirit, all glory and honor is yours almighty Father, for ever and ever"; the doxology of the Lord's Prayer, "for the kingdom, the power and the glory are yours, now and for ever"; and the conclusion of the collect which functions as a doxology, "We ask this through our Lord Jesus Christ, your son, who lives and reigns with you and the Holy Spirit, one God, for ever and ever" (G.I.R.M., 32). This last doxology expresses, in highly compressed and simple fashion, the theology of Christian liturgical prayer, namely, that it is directed to the first person of the Trinity, through the mediation of Christ, in the power of his abundant and life-giving Spirit.

Praise is that impulse of the human spirit which often precedes (or prefaces) other modes of prayer, particularly prayers of petition. The collect, for example, is essentially a prayer of petition and yet it begins by addressing God and expressing some aspect of God's goodness before begging, yet again, for God's gracious gifts. The structure of a collect, most simply expressed, is a twofold structure: Because you . . . , please do The petition thus is a request rooted in confident hope.

Collects, those prayers which gather and express the silent prayer of the community, are ubiquitous in the rites. They occur in four locations in the celebration of the eucharist: the opening prayer concludes the introductory rites; the prayer over the gifts concludes the preparation of the table and the gifts; the prayer after communion concludes the liturgy of the eucharist and reception of communion (G.I.R.M. 32, 53, 56k). In addition, the prayer voiced by the presider at the conclusion of the general intercessions (G.I.R.M., 47) follows a collect structure, namely, address of God, amplification of address, petition, and concluding doxology. In some instances, the petition is followed by a clause which expresses why the community is asking for this particular grace or what they hope to do once they receive it. In every instance the collect will be more effective if it is preceded by adequate silence so that its function as summing up the silent prayer of the community might be realized.

The content of a collect prayer is fairly well determined by its location in the rite. The opening prayer in most general terms expresses the theme of the celebration. The collect concluding the intercessions asks that our needs be heard and answered in God's wisdom and love. The prayer over the gifts is a preparation for the eucharistic prayer and in it we express the hope that our gifts and we ourselves will be transformed. The prayer after communion is a petition for the effects of the mystery just celebrated.

The collect pattern of prayer is also found in other sacramental rites, particularly in their opening and closing prayers, and, just as with their analogues in the eucharistic rite, such collects in a general fashion express the theme of the celebration or ask that what has just been given ritual expression will now be lived out by the community. The psalm prayers of the liturgy of the hours are other examples of collect prayers. As will be seen below, it is the collect pattern which is imitated in some blessings and in prayers of exorcism.

Blessings are another form of petitionary prayer rooted in praise. In the action of blessing, the community acknowledges that all of creation is gift of God and thus that "there is hardly any proper use of material things that cannot be directed toward human sanctification and the praise of God" (S.C., 61). Blessings are also used to mark various occasions in human life since almost every event "may be made holy by divine grace that flows from the paschal mystery of Christ's passion, death, and resurrection, the fount from which all sacraments and sacramentals draw their power" (S.C., 61).

Blessings are of two distinct types: constitutive and invocative. A constitutive blessing begins with the praise of God and then petitions that God impart a new state of consecration, a new setting aside of a person or a thing wholly for God's service. Included in constitutive blessings would be the blessings of an abbot or abbot, religious profession, the blessing of a church, an altar, a bell, a paten, or chalice or other sacred vessel. Typical blessing language includes praise and thanksgiving for the way God has been source of grace and life through such persons or objects throughout salvation history followed by a petition that this person or object now be set aside for God's service. More solemn constitutive blessings, sometimes accompanied by the use of oil, are called consecrations.

An invocative blessing asks God's gracious favor on those persons who make use of certain objects such as water, oil, or palms. An example of an invocative blessing is the blessing of ashes on Ash Wednesday: "Lord, bless these ashes by which we show that we are dust. Pardon our sins and keep us faithful to the discipline of Lent, for you do not want the sinner to die but to live with the risen Christ, who reigns with you for ever and ever."

Often the petition of a blessing will take the form of an epiclesis, an element of prayer found in every eucharistic prayer in East and West. An epiclesis includes an invocation of God and a petition that God send the Spirit to transform that which is being blessed. The blessing of the oil of the sick, an extended collect-style prayer, contains an example of a Spirit-focused epiclesis: "God of all consolation, you chose and sent your Son to heal the world. Graciously listen to our prayer of faith: send the power of your Holy Spirit, the Consoler, into this precious oil, this soothing ointment, this rich gift, this fruit of the earth. Bless this oil and sanctify it for our use. Make this oil a remedy for all who are anointed with it; heal them in body, in soul, and in spirit, and deliver them from every affliction." The simple and solemn blessings of the concluding rite of the eucharist are examples of invocative blessings of persons.

A particular species of blessing of persons is that of the scrutinies, the rites belonging to the period of purification and enlightenment in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. Scrutinies are patterns of ritual prayer for the third, fourth and fifth Sundays of Lent which invoke God to assist candidates for baptism "to uncover, then heal all that is weak, defective, or sinful in the hearts of the elect; to bring out, then strengthen all that is upright, strong and good" (R.C.I.A., 141). Within the scrutinies, a collect-style prayer called an exorcism asks God to deliver the elect from the power of sin, to heal them, to strengthen them against temptation, and to fill their spirit with Christ the Redeemer. One such exorcism reads in part: "Free (the elect) from the slavery of Satan, the source of sin and death, who seeks to corrupt the world you created and saw to be good. Place them under the reign of your beloved Son, that they may share in the power of his resurrection and give witness to your glory before all" (5th Sunday of Lent).

A final example of a prayer addressed by the presider to God in the name of the community is an absolution. In the eucharist, the absolution is a very brief formula which follows the community's confession of sins. In it the presider asks God's pardon on the assembly in these words: "May Almighty God have mercy upon you, forgive you your sins, and bring you to life everlasting."

Prayers of Presider and Community in Dialogue. The Prayer of the Faithful constitutes a ritual unit of prayer in which presider and community each participate. The prayer of the faithful, also called general intercessions or bidding prayers, provides an opportunity for the whole community to exercise its priestly function, interceding before God on behalf of humanity. The scope of intercessions includes the needs of the church, public authorities, those suffering oppression, and the concerns of the local community (G.I.R.M., 45).

It is the role of the presider, by means of a brief introduction, to invite the community to make known its needs, and, at the conclusion of the intercessions, to offer a prayer summing up the intercessions and asking God's gracious response. The intercessions proper are expressed by the deacon, a lector, commentator, or by individuals within the assembly. The whole assembly participates in the act of supplication through a brief response. The intercessions are one of several forms of litanie prayer in the liturgy.

The litanic prayer is a simple and popular responsorial style of prayer made up of a series of invocations together with an invariable congregational response, for example, "pray for us" or "Amen." Litanies are often, though not always, a form of petitionary prayer. Such is clear from typical litanie responses: "Lord, hear our prayer"; "Lord, save your people"; "pray for us." Psalm 136, an ancient litanie pattern of verse and response in a thanksgiving mode is a notable exception to this general rule: "Give thanks to the Lord, for God is good. God's mercy endures forever."

Chief among liturgical litanies are the Lord, have mercy (Kyrie), the Lamb of God (Agnus Dei), and the litany of the saints. The Kyrie litany is a tiny vestige of a much longer intercessory prayer which can be traced back to the Jerusalem church of the 4th century. Once the diaconal litany of intercession was moved from the end of the Mass of the Catechumens to near its beginning and the petitions had been suppressed there remained only the invocation, Kyrie eleison, and its echoed response. Form C of the penitential rite of the eucharist elaborates this particular litanic pattern and clarifies its true nature as a song of praise focused on the redeeming action of Christ—"You were sent to heal the contrite; You came to call sinners; You plead for us at the right hand of the Father"—rather than on the sinfulness of the community.

The Lamb of God (Agnus Dei) is another traditional litany in the Mass whose petitions each begin with the address: Lamb of God. Gradually reduced to only three repetitions, the earlier use of this litany to cover the action of the breaking of the bread has been restored in the revised rite, with the possibility that other titles for the Lamb of God might supplement the text: Bearer of our sins, Redeemer of the world, Prince of peace, etc.

A more elaborate litanie prayer is that of the litany of the saints, a prayer used on special occasions such as the Luster vigil, and in the rites of ordination and religious profession. The litany of the saints has a five-part structure which includes: introductory verses, "Lord have mercy"; invocation of the saints, "Saint Mary Magdalene, pray for us"; invocation of Christ, "Lord, be merciful, Lord, save your people"; prayer for particular needs, "Give new life to these chosen ones by the grace of baptism, Lord, hear our prayer"; and a conclusion, "Lord Jesus, hear our prayer." A community is encouraged to adapt the litany for its use by adding other saints, invocations appropriate to the occasion, and various needs of the local community.

Prayers of the Presider and Community in Unison. Through the prayer of the faithful and other litanie models, presider and community are in dialogue. There are also a number of prayers which the presider and the community express as one voice. The community prays with one voice: in praise of God in the Gloria; in confession of God's saving acts in the creed; and in response to the teaching of Jesus, in the Our Father.

Known also as the greater doxology, the Gloria "is an ancient hymn, in which the church, assembled in the Holy Spirit, praises and entreats the Father and the Lamb" (G.I.R.M., 31). The Gloria is one of the few extant liturgical prayers addressed, in part, to Christ since a Synod in 393 dictated that at the altar all prayer shall be addressed to the Father. First found in Eastern sources as a hymn of praise at dawn and used as a concluding hymn at morning prayer, the Gloria only gradually entered the celebration of the eucharist, and became a fixed element by the 11th century. Known as the angelic hymn because of the first verses which pick up Lk 2:13, the hymn of the angels at the birth of Christ, the text continues in praise of God and of Christ in a series of acclamations. It is a hymn for the whole community, a festive hymn of praise and thanksgiving.

The community's creed, in the beginning, was principally associated with the preparation of candidates for incorporation into the community and with their baptismal celebration. Immediate preparation for baptism included the "giving over" of the creed to one about to be baptized who learned it by heart and "gave it back" by reciting it before the bishop. At their baptism, members of the elect went down into the baptismal waters and were there interrogated in a triple series of questions modeled on the creed and referring, in turn, to each member of the Trinity. After each of the candidate's responses, the candidate was immersed in the waters.

The origin of the profession of faith known as the Nicene Creed is conciliar rather than liturgical. The Nicene Creed is a summary of beliefs formulated at the Councils of Nicaea 325 and Constantinople 381, a brief synthesis of the fundamental truths of the community in face of particular heresies. This credal statement became a fixed part of the Mass by the beginning of the second millennium in the West. It serves as an announcement of God's saving acts in Jesus and as the community's confession of that which draws us together and unites us. A litanic form of creed is proclaimed by presider and community at the Easter vigil; otherwise, except in Masses with children, the Nicene Creed is used in dioceses of the United States on Sundays and Solemnities.

The G.I.R.M. assigns the creed an important structural role: "The symbol or profession of faith in the celebration of Mass serves as a way for the people to respond and to give their assent to the word of God heard in the readings and through the homily and for them to call to mind the truths of faith before they begin to celebrate the eucharist" (43). The G.I.R.M. suggests that the creed acts as a kind of fulcrum: as response to the word and in anticipating the great mysteries of faith which will be reiterated in the eucharistic prayer.

Another prayer said in unison by presider and community is the Lord's Prayer, whose use in Christian liturgy is very ancient. This perfect prayer was taught to those preparing for baptism and was "given back" by candidates who had learned it "by heart" along with the Apostles' Creed. From very early times, the Our Father entered the celebration of eucharist immediately after the eucharistic prayer and as a preparation for the reception of communion. This prayer is "a petition both for daily food, which for Christians means also the eucharistic bread, and for the forgiveness of sins, so that what is holy may be given to those who are holy (G.I.R.M., 56a). It also finds a place in the celebration of the liturgy of the hours.

The Our Father is a perfect summary of various types of Christian prayer, nearly all of which seem to be patterned on praise, petition and confession. It begins with an address of God hallowed by Jesus: Father. In a series of petitions it asks that God's name be praised, God's kingdom be established, God's will be accomplished throughout heaven and earth. The focus is on God and the work of redemption in all the universe. Then, as confident children rooted in God, the community petitions for its own needs: daily nourishment in anticipation of the end-time banquet; forgiveness of sins; preparation through daily triumph for the great end-time testing. In an embolism on this final petition, the presider begs in the name of community deliverance from the power of all evil, and then presider and community conclude in a final burst of praise.

Conclusion

An examination of types of ritual communication within the liturgy reveals a variety of prayer patterns, a variety of ways the community gives voice to its praise and thanksgiving, its needs, its desire for reconciliation, its faith. In some instances, through silence and gestures, through dialogue, responsorial participation, through prayers proclaimed in common, the community and its presider give voice together to the prayer of the church. In other instances the presider prays in the name of the community. In all instances, the assent of the community is expressed through its "Amen," a word sometimes rendered as the community's assent to that which is said—but it is more. "Amen," interspersed throughout every liturgical gathering, "Amen" at the conclusion of every type of prayer, is the community's proclamation of faith. "Amen" assures that it is the whole community participating in the priesthood of the one and only high priest, Jesus Christ, who alone stands before the throne of grace, interceding on our behalf.

PREACHING AS ART AND CRAFT

This article has for limited scope a basic practical aspect of homiletics: effective communication. Even such a limitation, however, raises a prior question: What is the Catholic preacher attempting to communicate? On broad lines, two replies are proposed in our time.

One approach contends that we should scrap the Vatican II homily and return to instructional sermons. In this view today's critical Catholic problem is abysmal ignorance. Our people do not know "the faith." A trinitarian God and an incarnate Son, original sin and actual sin, one true church and seven saving sacraments, created grace and Uncreated Grace, the Mass as sacrifice and the pope as successor to Peter, the Ten Commandments and six precepts of the church, the immorality of birth control and abortion—this is what our faithful must be taught. Vatican II? Why, Catholics do not know Baltimore Catechism One. Especially these days, when elementary Catholic education is vanishing, there is only one viable way to teach: via the Sunday sermon. Deliver the dogma, the doctrine, and deliver it with consummate clarity, with unquestioning certitude.

The approach I espouse disagrees. It concedes that many a Catholic is distressingly ignorant of God's revelation, does not know what the Son of God took flesh to tell us. Somehow, somewhere the faithful should learn this. But not ex professo in the liturgical sermon. The homily, like the liturgy of which it is part and parcel, should proclaim, re-present, make effectively present "God's wonderful works in the history of salvation"; "the mystery of Christ" should be "made present and active within us" (S.C., 35). But this is not done by instructions on dogmas to be believed, doctrines to be accepted. It is done by an art and a craft.

Concretely, three affirmations. (1) For a preacher, words are all-important. (2) The homiletic word comes alive as a work of art principally through imagination. (3) Imagination demands a contemporary idiom, living symbols. The remainder of this article is an effort to argue those affirmations and to draw conclusions therefrom.

Words

For a preacher, words are all-important. Not only are words a Christian preacher's primary medium of communication; words are the way the Judeo-

Christian revelation reaches us. In the Prior Testament the word is wondrously alive. For the Israelites the spoken word was a distinct reality charged with power: it posited the reality it signified and in so doing posited the reality that spoke the word; it conferred intelligibility upon the thing and disclosed the character of the person who uttered the word. In the NT the word as a distinct reality charged with power is fulfilled to perfection. For in Jesus Christ is fulfilled the word as a distinct, dynamic being; as that which gives form and intelligibility to what it signifies; as God's self-disclosure; as a point of personal contact between heaven and earth.

The word, the Letter of James declares, is a perilous thing. "We use it to bless the Lord and Father, but we also use it to curse men and women fashioned in God's likeness" (Jas 3:9). And still, in Paul's eyes, the word is indispensable: without it, belief is impossible (Rom 10:14).

Words, we learn from experience, can be weapons, and words can be healing. Words can unite in friendship or sever in enmity, unlock who I am or mask me from others. Two words, "Sieg Heil," bloodied the face of Europe; three words, "Here I stand," divided the body of Christendom. Words have made slaves and freed slaves, have declared war and imposed peace. Words sentence to death ("You shall be hanged by the neck") and words restore to life ("Your sins are forgiven you"). Words covenant a life together in love, and words declare a marriage dead. Words charm and repel, amuse and anger, reveal and conceal, chill and warm. A word from Washington rained down atomic hell on Hiroshima; words from an altar change bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ.

A word is real; a word is sacred; a word is powerful; a word is . . . I.

In our context, however, word is not just any word, it is a liturgical word. In mid-century the "liturgy of the word" meant relatively little. A Catholic could miss Gloria and creed, epistle and gospel and homily, and still "hear Mass." For the sole stress was on sacrifice. One word held sway: the consecratory word. Here was the real presence, the efficacious word, objectively infallible, utterly trustworthy, limpidly clear. No need for lips to be touched by live coals; enough that they murmured distinctly, "This is my body." Today's liturgical attitude is refreshingly more balanced. In Vatican II's wake, there is fresh stress on the whole word as a locus where God transpires. Music, readings, homily, dance—God is or can be there, a real presence.

From official declarations two concerns should dominate the homiletic word: this liturgy and this people. This liturgy, because the lectionary and missal reveal the substance of what is to be preached: "the proclamation of God's wonderful works in the history of salvation." This people, because in the liturgy "God's wonderful works" are not just read or remembered; "the mystery of Christ . . . is made present and active within us" (S.C., 35).

The crucial issue: How can words take flesh today? Homilists will not link worship to life unless, as Karl Rahner phrased it, they become translators. The Judeo-Christian revelation, for all its divine authorship, comes to us through human words that carried meanings and overtones from the surrounding world. "Lamb of God" made a strong impression on the earliest Christians not only because the paschal lamb was a venerable religious symbol, but because that symbol struck them where they lived. Jesus was born and bred among people for whom the lamb was a primary source of food and clothing, a fundamental factor in their economy. Transfer that symbol to Papua, where the sacred animal is a pig, where women may nurse piglets at their breast if no sow is around, and the preacher confronts a problem.

Moreover, when revelation is translated into dogma or interpreted by theology, it is not yet the preacher's word: it is jargon-infested and culture-conditioned. The homilist's constant question must be: What do these words say to this people? John Courtney Murray's warning is still valid: "I do not know what I have said until I understand what you have heard." What does this congregation hear when I say "holy mother church"? Institution? Community? Sacrament? Herald? Servant? Disciple? Does its experience of the church conjure up the love and tenderness I associate with my physical mother? Is "holy" too triumphalistic for Christians aware of a community ceaselessly in need of reform?

The homiletic movement from scripture through dogma and theology to the present liturgical moment is a daunting task. The homilist must (1) grasp the genuine meaning of a word as it emerged from the mouth of Jeremiah or the pen of Paul or the contemplation of a Johannine community, (2) touch it to the paschal mystery celebrated by the church, and (3) transform it so that the word takes on the personal and cultural clothes of this moment, of these believers. Here is the agony of preparation, here its occasional ecstasy. A word is not simply an entry in Webster; it is colored by living experience. The eucharist is indeed a bread that gives life. But when I hear the word "life," I hear something quite different from the 200,000 skin-and-bones starving who "live" in the streets of Calcutta, build tiny fires to cook scraps of food, defecate at curbstones, curl up against a wall to sleep—perhaps to die.

But clarity is not enough. A homily is not a catechism or a manual of dogma or a textbook in theology. The word flings forth a challenge; it is a summons to decision; God wants a reply. Living men and women are addressed in preaching, moved to fashion their lives in accordance with what is said. But are they? God's grace, admittedly all-powerful, dashes against two potent Catholic adversaries: a homilist dead below the larynx, and a minimal vocabulary dominated by abstract nouns ending in -tion. If I am to persuade, my whole person should be aflame with what I proclaim. If I am to move, the words I utter must be chosen with care and love, with sweat and fire.

Words can be made flesh today. But only on condition that we take words seriously, handle them sacredly. Every word: the scriptural word, the sacramental word, the secular word, the homiletic word.

Imagination

The homiletic word comes alive as a work of art principally through imagination. What is imagination? The capacity we humans have to make the material an image of the immaterial, of the spiritual. It is a creative power, a fresh way of seeing. It is a breaking through the obvious, the surface, the superficial, to the reality beneath and beyond. It is the world of wonder and intuition, of amazement and delight, of festivity and play.

How does imagination—specifically, religious imagination—come to expression? I mention five primary ways. (1) A vision: e.g., Ezekiel's "four living creatures," St. Margaret Mary Alacoque's vision of the Sacred Heart. (2) Ritual: a group enacts the presence of the sacred and participates in that presence, usually through some combination of dance, chant, sacrifice, or sacrament. (3) Story, especially three types: parable (parables of Jesus), allegory (C.S. Lewis' Chronicles of Narnia), and myth, which, whether fact or fancy, intends to narrate the fundamental structure of human being in the world (the creation myth). (4) Symbol: an externally perceived sign that works mysteriously on the human consciousness so as to suggest more than it can clearly describe or define (a totem, a crucifix, the brazen serpent). (5) The fine arts: painting (da Vinci, Picasso); poetry (John Donne, e.e. cummings); sculpture (the Pietà, Rodin); architecture (Chartres, Frank Lloyd Wright); music (Beethoven's Missa solemnis, George Winston); dancing (David whirling and skipping before the Ark of the Covenant, Suzanne Farrell); and dramatic art (the mystery dramas of the Middle Ages, movies).

From this, two significant conclusions emerge. First, imagination is not at odds with knowledge; it is a form of cognition, a way of illuminating the facts. Not indeed a process of reasoning. Still, a work of our intellectual nature; through it our spirit reaches the true, the beautiful, and the good.

Second, the imagination does not so much teach as evoke; it calls something forth from the person who sees, hears, touches, tastes, smells. And so it is often ambiguous; the image can be understood in different ways. Recall the reporters asking Martha Graham, "What does your dance mean?" Her reply: "Darlings, if I could tell you, I would not have danced it!" Something is lost when we move from imagining to reasoning, from art to conceptual clarity. Not that imagination is arbitrary, that Swan Lake or the Infancy Narrative or Hamlet or the Transfiguration is whatever anyone wants to make of it, my gut feeling. Hostile to imagination is creativity run wild, without roots, tradition, or discipline. Still it is true, the image is more open-ended than the concept, less confining, less imprisoning. The image evokes our own imagining.

What has imagination to do with preaching? Just about everything. Return to the two conflicting approaches to preaching, to my contention that, for communication, imagination is more effective than indoctrination. Why? Because indoctrination plays upon one faculty of the human person: the intellect's ability to grasp ideas, concepts, propositions. It pays little heed to an old scholastic axiom, "Nothing is present in the intellect that was not previously present in the senses." Our ideas are triggered by sense experience. On the whole, then, the more powerful the sense experience, the more powerfully will an idea take hold. If I want to sell you on Veal Marsala or Oysters Rockefeller, I don't hand you a recipe; I let you smell it, taste it, savor it. If I want you to "see" the Holocaust, I won't just say "six million were exterminated"; I'll let you see the gas ovens, the mountains of human bones. It's not enough to show you the score of Handel's Messiah; you must drink it in with your ears. It is one thing to hear "I love you," quite another to experience love's touch.

In short, the homily is a fascinating wedding of the varied ways in which imagination comes to expression: vision and ritual, symbol and story, the fine arts. This is the homily at its best, the homily that makes God's wonderful works come alive, immerses in the mystery, evokes a religious response.

A response—there's the magic word. The sermon might be different if the task of the liturgy were simply to recall God's saving works, simply to remember the mystery that is Christ. Then I might merely explain lucidly what it all means. But if the liturgy must make the mystery "present and active within us," a homily should be evocative. It should help the believer open up to God speaking now. Not a cold assent to a proposition: "Yes, there are three persons in one God." Rather, "What do you want from me, Lord?" And the most effective approach to such a reaction is not ratiocination, not demonstration; it is imagination.

The evidence for imagination's incomparable power surrounds us. We keep saying, "A picture is worth a thousand words." Americans spend billions each year on movies, theatre, concerts. Students study to stereo, skip lectures readily when Bruce Springsteen comes to town. Jesuits too read the comics before the front page, go wild over sports—poetry in motion. Our children's supreme educator, for good or ill, is TV. Its commercials sell us with the greatest array of imaginative talent since the creation story in Genesis and John's vision on Patmos.

The homily is an instrument; God uses it to speak to the soul; God speaks. The external word is indeed the preacher's; but if God is to speak, the homiletic word has to open the way, not close off all avenues save the homilist's. Not, therefore, "When you go back to your kitchen, this is what you must do." Rather, so artistic a presentation of a message that different people hear from God what they need to hear. Like a remarkable piece of music—Bach's church cantatas, full of symbolism, allusion, and word painting in the context of the Lutheran service—the homily will have different meanings for different listeners, will touch them not where the preacher lives but where they live, where God wants them to live.

Here imagination is indispensable. The image is more open-ended than the concept; the image evokes imagining. This is not indifferentism. From a Catholic homily the faithful should not emerge with a Unitarian God, an Arian Christ, abortion on demand. The preacher presumes, or insinuates, or proclaims the tradition. Still, the preacher is not so much exposing as evoking, not so much imposing on the ignorant a revealed truth with specific applications as drawing the already faithful into the mystery of Christ in such a way that they can apply it, can say "yes" to a living God speaking now. The priest, Urban Holmes insists, is "one who incites people to imagine."

How, concretely, is the preacher to achieve this? Specific counsel might include: read storytelling theologian John Shea; immerse yourself in Lewis and Tolkien; tune in on the apocalyptic vision of the TV preachers; shift your language from abstract to concrete; remember that the verb carries the action; listen to the flowers. But there is a more basic need: Catholic homilists require a conversion, fresh insight into their priesthood. Here I wed three elements: the "I," the revelation and the people.

First, I who communicate. Most older priests have been educated to objectivity—by scholastic philosophy, by a theology that lived off magisterial affirmations, by spiritual masters who stressed reason and will, suspected emotion and experience. The subjective had illegitimate parents: Protestantism and Modernism. At the altar, then, and behind the confessional screen, in teaching and preaching, in lecturing and counseling, the "I" was submerged, that Christ alone might appear, that only the truth might transpire. The conversion? I am not an ecclesiastical computer, spewing forth force-fed data. I too am a symbol, a sign that says more than my words can express. In the pulpit I may well be the most powerful image of all.

Second, the revelation we communicate. How was it initially communicated? In earlier days we had no problem: divine revelation consists of truths set forth in the Bible and in authoritative church pronouncements; God has embodied divine self-disclosure in propositional language so that it can claim our unswerving assent. No doubt, revelation can be and has been mediated through true propositions. Still, as Avery Dulles has shown, a richer vision permeates our century: revelation is symbolic disclosure. Revelation is always mediated through an experience in the world—specifically, through symbol. The kingdom of God in the preaching of Jesus is not a clear concept with univocal meaning. It is a symbol that can represent or evoke a whole range of ideas. The point is, our biblical symbols, from the theophanies of Sinai through the cross of Christ to the descent of the Spirit, are too rich to be imprisoned in any single conception. Moreover, the knowledge that symbols give is not cold, abstract information; it is participatory knowledge. A symbol is an environment I inhabit, live in, the way I live in my body; I recognize myself within the universe of meaning and value it opens up to me. And because revelation is this sort of truth, it can transform us, initiate us into a saving relationship with God; it can radically influence our commitments and our behavior; it can give us insight into mysteries reason cannot fathom.

Third, the people with whom the preacher communicates. The faithful do not come to the liturgy primarily to learn—sheep needing to be led. Catholic homilists must grasp why some Protestant pulpits confront the preacher graphically with the request of the Greeks to Philip: "Sir, we would like to see Jesus" (Jn 12:21). How simple a request, and how stunning! Here is the homilist's burden and joy: to help believing Christians to see Jesus—not with his eyes but with their own.

Given conversion on these three levels, the homilist will inevitably prepare and preach imaginatively: (1) be part and parcel of the homily, strike sparks because aflame with the word; (2) be overwhelmed by the many-splendored possibilities within the biblical symbols, their refusal to be imprisoned in a formula, their openness to fresh imaginings; (3) learn to dream dreams and see visions, retell the parables of Jesus in a modern idiom.

Modern Idiom

Scholars tell us that in the middle of the 19th century not only novelists and poets but preachers as well were often exciting and creative. Two linked reasons: discourse in the antebellum period was rooted in a religious tradition and it was built upon popular language. Here I assume a religious tradition: the content of a Catholic sermon is always and everywhere the gospel, god-spell, the good news of Jesus Christ, as understood within the church. The present question is: how to present the living tradition in a style appropriate to history's most remarkable record of God's dealings with humankind—a style of speech that captures an audience, keeps people pleading for more. My basic response, for the United States, is: American words and American symbols, words and symbols that speak to the heart of our age, to the experience of our people.

Symbols come and symbols go. The Sacred Heart was a symbol of love that pervaded American Catholicism before Vatican II; now it is scarcely alive in Catholic devotion. The Beatles are far from dead, but Beatlemania is not the idolatry it once was. I am not suggesting that we empty our rhetoric of all the classical Hebrew and early Christian symbols: abandon "kingdom (or reign) of God" because kings are anachronisms, dictators or figureheads; forsake "suffering servant" because this wedding of words does not appeal to the American psyche. Deep within many ancient images and symbols are powerful forces that need only be intelligently grasped by the preacher and imaginatively presented for hearts to be set aflame.

I do submit that effective preaching, while refusing to sacrifice symbols long and deeply identified with Christ and Christianity, must take place in the context of contemporary symbols. Not only patriotic symbols: the Statue of Liberty, the Stars and Stripes, "America the Beautiful," the Vietnam Memorial with more than 58,000 names etched into black granite. Broader cultural symbols are riding an unprecedented wave. Some fit well together, others are contradictory. Most are secular; some are explicitly or potentially religious.

We have heavy metal and MTV; the computer, car phones, and crack; stretch limos or a Volvo with a baby seat; country, pop, and rock; "We shall overcome" and "Power to the people"; Michael Jackson and Jesse Jackson; Madonna or Mother Teresa; Rambo and Dirty Harry's "Make my day"; a comic-strip Peanuts and a former President's jelly beans; yuppie or Alzheimer; Walkman and the boob tube; Ms. or Playgirl; Sushi or Mexican beer; Super Bowl or Big Mac; pro-choice or pro-life; Kareem and Steffi Graf; a wasted Challenger or a Mars-bound Discovery; Wall Street and Häagen Dazs; the "Army: Be All You Can Be" or the Community for Creative Non-Violence; the recreational hobo or the homeless on Washington's winter grates; black power and ERA; Star Wars and strawberry daiquiris; Marcel Lefebvre or John Paul II; Bill Cosby or "The Young and the Restless"; God as mother, God as lover, God as friend of the earth; AIDS and the compassionate Christ.... Fifty-five and still counting. There is ever so much more—symbols my shortsightedness stops me from seeing, images the younger and more restless than I can surely spy.

Precisely how a given preacher shapes a sermon within this welter of symbols is not within the ambit of this article. But unless U.S. preaching is molded in large measure by our cultural context, homilists will be whistling down the wind—Shakespeare's "sound and fury" perhaps, but "signifying nothing." Preach as part and parcel of this concrete world, aware of its paradoxes and contradictions, attuned to its limitless potential for good, saddened or enraged by so much folly and insensitivity, alive to the grace of God with whom nothing on earth is impossible, start with the real-life symbols that surround and all but suffocate us—and the "American words" will come.

Several specific suggestions. First, focus on film. We Catholics who live with symbols (word, sacrament, church), who play with mystery (spirit and matter, divine and human, nature and grace), should thank the silver screen for tackling more powerfully and profoundly than we the common task that is ours: human experience and its meaning. What makes the movies so unparalleled an expression of experience is that film is now consciously all the arts in one art: sculpture and architecture, painting and poetry, music and the dance, dramatic art. Sermons can be crafted from Chariots of Fire—three succinct sentences of 1924 Olympic runner Eric Liddell: “God made me fast.” “The power is within.” “When I run, I feel His pleasure.” From Amadeus—two men with diverse fatal flaws: the genius Mozart, obscene child who never grows up, self-centered adolescent aware of naught save his music and his pleasure; the moderately talented Salieri, eaten by envy, unable to understand how God can make him mute and gift with genius that foul-mouthed boor with the social graces of Caligula. From The Gods Must Be Crazy—the empty Coke bottle that falls from a plane among Bushmen in South Africa’s Kalahari desert, the single bottle through which Eden becomes Babel, primitive innocence discovers the ways of civilization. From Woody Allen, Steven Spielberg, George Burns.

Second, for American symbols search through songs. The decibels may drive to distraction, but even the decibels are a contemporary symbol. There is a powerful message—heavy or haunting, loving or lustful, tender or raw—all the way from Amy Grant’s “Love of Another Kind” to soft-spoken Randy Travis with his contention that country music “covers everything.”

Third, look to everyday experience for American words and symbols, images, metaphors. They surround us, invade our privacy, circulate in our bloodstream:

on our streets and in our schools, in Newsweek and Rolling Stone, in “M*A*S*H” and radio’s top 40 tunes, in The Yellow Christ of Gauguin and Whoopi Goldberg’s sizzling social commentary, in the scores of men and women we touch each day. All day we hear language that burns or soothes, wounds or heals, frightens or amuses, delights or challenges, murmurs in rapture or cries out in pain. By what sleight of hand do they disappear from our pulpits, become classified information, top secret, or sacred to sacerdotal socials?

Fourth, struggle to recapture in captivating language the rich humor in scripture. Basil the Great’s conclusion from the gospel text that Jesus never laughed despite his “merriment of soul” must yield to a more human interpretation of him who was like us in simply everything save sin. How could he have wept for sorrow and not laughed for joy? How could he fail to smile when a child cuddled comfortably in his arms, or when he saw little Zacchaeus up a tree, or when Peter put his foot in his mouth once again? I refuse to believe that he did not laugh when he saw something funny, or when he experienced in the depths of his manhood the presence of his Father.

Religious writers and scholars have studied scripture specifically for its humor: not only Jesus’ irony, dazzling paradoxes, deliberately hyperbolic statements, but the “comic eschatology” of the Prior Testament itself, notably in Isaac, “the child of laughter.” Perhaps no storyteller has recaptured the gospel as comedy with such insight and felicity as has the Presbyterian preacher and novelist Frederick Buechner. Regrettably, Catholic preachers on the whole have not led the faithful to expect humor as part and parcel of a sermon’s structure, have not themselves recognized what Buechner calls the “preposterous meeting” of sin and grace, of God’s absence and presence, “as the high, unbidden, hilarious thing it is." A grim gospel, excessive seriousness, is not only soporific; it keeps the gospel from coming through as good news, the best of news, a preposterous God preposterously saving God's preposterous image.

A final word. The wine of the gospel is always and everywhere new. But "new wine must be put into fresh wineskins" (Lk 5:38). A homilist's risk and joy is the effort to do for God's people in our time what preachers like Jeremiah and Joel, Peter and Paul, did for God's people in their time: express God's inexpressible word in syllables that wed felicity to fidelity, that flare and flame, that capture minds and rapture hearts, syllables charged with the power of God.

Such an art falls under Bonhoeffer's "costly grace." If Catholic preaching remains at a low ebb, an overriding reason is that homilists either see the sermon as a product that comes cheap or, conceding its high cost, are reluctant to pay the price. Effective preaching is not an option, not primarily a privilege; it is a vocation that may not be refused.

PREACHING BY LAY PERSONS

When one remembers that the Council of Trent anathematized anyone who would say that all Christians have the power for the ministry of the word, it is easy to understand how slowly any subsequent change would come about. What was needed was a shift in the dominant image of the church, from hierarchical institution to the pilgrim people of God. Only as the implications of this self-understanding gradually became clear did the basis for preaching come to be recognized as residing in baptism. As the people of God, all are called to share in the priestly, prophetic, and kingly roles of the risen Lord, ever made present in today's world.

The theology of the Second Vatican Council is a given succinct expression in the revised 1983 Code of Canon Law which states that "all the Christian faithful have the duty and the right to work so that the divine message of salvation may increasingly reach the whole of humankind in every age and in every land" (can. 211). Furthermore, "in virtue of baptism and confirmation, lay members of the Christian faithful are witnesses to the gospel by word and by example of a Christian life; they can also be called upon to cooperate with the bishop and presbyters in the exercise of their ministry of the word" (can. 759). More recently, in November 1988, the U.S. bishops approved "Guidelines for Lay Preaching" (G.L.P.), further delineating how lay preaching would be advantageous to the faith community. We have obviously moved a distance from the mind of Trent.

The Tradition and Lay Preaching

Sandra Schneiders persuasively presents NT evidence which indicates that not only were women called to the ministry of the word in the first communities but that preaching was not restricted to any office or group (see Foley, 60-90). The stories of the Samaritan woman (John 4) and of the commissioning of Magdalene on Easter Sunday

(John 20) point to the understanding that Jesus himself entrusted this ministry to them. Furthermore, in both the letters of Paul and Acts a number of instances are presented in which women are seen to function as prophets and teachers. Such figures as the daughters of Philip, Prisca, and possibly Junias are some of those named. The prohibition against women preaching found in 1 Cor 14:33b-35 is thought to be an interpolation from the later 1 Tim 2:11, a document more interested in protecting the community from controversy than in protecting its members' freedom. Indeed, in 1 Cor 11:5, Paul insists on women wearing head covering when they pray and prophesy, which could refer to praying the eucharistic prayer and prophetically preaching the sermon.

At the heart of Paul's message is a tremendous affirmation of the power of the Spirit, of the gifts of the Spirit that need to be discerned and used for the good of all, and of the gift of the word generously given to all Christians. "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly, as you teach and admonish one another in all wisdom..." (Col 3:16).

While preaching shortly became linked to the local offices of bishop, priest, and deacon, still there were isolated instances recorded during the times of the Church Fathers in which bishops themselves noted they had called on laity to preach. In the Later Middle Ages, especially the 12th and 13th centuries, theologians speculated on the basis for proclaiming the gospel. Edward Schillebeeckx notes four: (1) the vita apostolica, founding the right to bear witness in a life given over to the evangelical imitation of Jesus; (2) the missio, the fact that one was "sent" by an appropriate authority; (3) the ordo clericorum, the clerical rank, or at least the reception of tonsure; and (4) priestly ordination (in Foley, 16-17). The controversies waged over preaching during these times centered mostly on the tension between the monks and the canons regular in the 12th century, and then between the mendicants and the diocesan clergy in the 13th. The issue was resolved by Gregory who forbade non-ordained monks and laymen to preach, no matter how educated they might be. The end result was the clericalization of preaching until today.

By the present theological shift which grounds preaching in missio, the call to mission given to every Christian at baptism, new possibilities arise. Schillebeeckx eloquently speaks of this: "The real norm and justification for competent proclamation of the gospel message is the praxis of Jesus himself embodied in the life of the preacher. The Christian who is really competent to preach today is one who, in his or her faith, is able to enter into the sequela Jesu fully. The competent preacher is one who can be totally concerned with human situations, one who can set in motion the processes of admiration, joy and liberation that Jesus himself set in motion and continues to initiate today" (Foley, 37).

The U.S. Bishops' Guidelines on Lay Preaching

The introduction to G.L.P. begins by providing a rationale for restricting the homily to those in orders, a point which shall be taken up later. It then proceeds to name some of the other forms of preaching in which the laity may take part in the ministry of the word: retreats, revivals, spiritual exercises, missions, gatherings of the faithful for public reflections and public assemblies.

The guidelines themselves are noteworthy for several aspects:

(1) They provide general and specific criteria which offer reasonable safeguard of the quality of preaching. Thus, the preachers should be persons of good standing, who live good Christian lives, are active members of the church, familiar with the needs of their community, and faithful to the leadership and teaching of the magisterium. More specifically, they should have solid grounding in scripture, theology, tradition, and liturgy, in addition to suitable communication and language skills. In a society often caught up in frenzied behavior, lay preachers are to have the time, ability, and intention to prepare properly; in this way they might serve as models for many clerical preachers.

(2) They acknowledge that on the local level the work of the Spirit is evidenced by the increased participation of lay men and women in various apostolates and in a deepened knowledge of scripture and theology. Furthermore, circumstances can arise when persons can be called on to "supplement" the preaching of the ordained for the common good. Might one even say "complement"?

(3) They recognize that some may have the gift of preaching on a continuing basis, others on a frequent basis, and still others for a specific occasion. This allows greater latitude in discerning those through whom the Spirit has elected to speak.

(4) There is a sensitivity not only to the competence of the preacher but also to assuring that the community is prepared to welcome the preacher.

The Lay Preacher and the Homily

While these guidelines are proposed only as a means "to assist the individual diocesan bishop" and "not intended to serve either as a pastoral exhortation or as a comprehensive theological treatment of lay preaching or of the ministry of the word," still in light of the overwhelming support they received by the bishops, being approved by a vote of 195-42, attention is deservedly given to them. Most likely they will play some role in establishing diocesan policy regarding lay preaching. Particularly unfortunate, however, is the decision in the guidelines to restrict the liturgical homily to those in holy orders.

Liturgically, it is argued that the one who presides is the one who preaches. But if the eucharist is the act of the entire people of God, the one presiding might see the responsibility of this office to assure whatever collaboration is necessary so that a worthy, life-giving celebration will come about. Certainly, a major area of concern is who can best preach the homily on this occasion. This seems to have been the approach taken in drawing up the "Directory for Masses for Children," in which it states that there is no reason for one of the adults not to give the homily in these instances if the priest has difficulty communicating with children. Oddly, the guidelines refer to preaching in Masses for children as being a preaching form other than a homily. That's one way to handle an uncomfortable precedent.

Historically, when one looks back to those earliest preachers, one finds listed apostles, prophets, and teachers. It seems that the present liturgical homily continues to be perceived primarily as a form of teaching. The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy said that "by means of the homily the mysteries of the faith and the guiding principles of the Christian life are expounded from the sacred text during the course of the year" (S.C., 52). Furthermore, Inter Oecumenici, which implemented the constitution, saw the homily as the exposition of some point in either the readings from Sacred Scripture or in another text from the ordinary or proper of the day's Mass, keeping in mind the mystery being celebrated and the needs of the listeners (I.O., 54). Both of these understandings of the homily are quoted in G.L.P. Both see the homily as a teaching moment. And the traditional teacher has been those called to that office as bishops, priests, and teachers.

Still, the question arises, granted that the homily is approached as an instructional moment, is there no opening for a lay person to preach in light of the reality which G.L.P. itself notes, namely, "the deepened knowledge of scripture and theology which many lay persons possess" today? Certainly, authorization would be required in order to assure that the people will be appropriately nourished. With that precaution, however, an opening does exist.

The U.S. Bishops' Committee on Priestly Life and Ministry offered a different paradigm for the liturgical homily. "Fulfilled in Your Hearing: The Homily in the Sunday Assembly" (1982) proposed an understanding of the homily as "a scriptural interpretation of human existence which enables a community to recognize God's active presence, to respond to that presence in faith through liturgical word and gesture, and beyond the liturgical assembly, through a life lived in conformity with the Gospel" (29). Rather than seeing the homily as an exposition of the scripture text or an expounding of mysteries and principles, the key words here are "to provide a scriptural interpretation of life." Scripture is employed to interpret life today, to name God's presence now, to name grace, to point to how God is challenging, calling us. One does not preach on scriptures but from and through them. We find this approach resonant with an early statement in the Constitution on the Liturgy which speaks of the homily as "the proclamation of God's wonderful works in the history of salvation, which is the mystery of Christ ever made present and active in us, especially in the celebration of the Eucharist" (S.C., 35.2). This emphasis on pointing to what is happening now is one of the earliest forms of preaching.

This type of preaching is quite in line with what was called prophecy in the early tradition, the charism given to those men and women who brought the gospel into immediate contact with the present life of the community. Certainly those in orders are not the only ones who can see how the scripture speaks to the life of a particular community. Is it possible to carefully discern if others in a particular community might be called to address the community and offer the homily out of their vita apostolica?

Conclusion

In the first days of the Christian community, Paul asked, "how can they believe unless they have heard of him? And how can they hear unless there is someone to preach?" (Rom 10:14). More recently, can. 225.1 acknowledges the obligation of laity to work for the spread of the gospel, especially "in those circumstances in which people can hear the Gospel and know Christ only through lay persons." It seems clear that the ministry of the word, in all its forms, is the primary arena to which the Spirit is calling all of God's people. It is a work requiring humility, trust, and courage, and an abiding in the Spirit who is given for the building up of the church.

PREACHING THE LECTIONARY

The church, throughout its history, has produced a variety of systems for the choice of scripture to be read and expounded in its worship and for use in private devotions. These are known as lectionaries. There are two basic varieties of lectionaries: lectio selecta, a system in which readings from scripture are selected from all the biblical books according to theme or calendar concerns, and lectio continua in which readings follow one another Sunday by Sunday in a continuous sequence through a book or books of the Bible. This second system was the one used in the earliest centuries as indicated by the writings of Justin Martyr and others. But a different method finally came to prevail in the Roman rite of the West, and this is the one we call lectio selecta. During the Reformation these two methods came to divide the various churches, Reformed and Roman Catholic. The Reformed churches adopted the continuous reading from scripture early on in the Reformation. However, Reformed churches today have generally abandoned anything like the "in course readings" and its ministers often choose a particular scripture reading for each or follow the Common Lectionary.

The word "lectionary" refers to a book or list of readings of scripture for the church year. It is derived from the Latin, lectio, meaning an act of reading. An individual reading is called a lection or more commonly a pericope. A pericope is a selection from a book and in liturgical language it refers to a specific reading from a book of the Bible. The word is derived from Greek and literally means "an act of cutting." A pericope is a passage "cut out" of a book of the Bible for use in worship. The function of the lectionary readings selected for each Sunday is to relate the time of the church as it lives "between the times" of resurrection and the return of Christ (narrated in the cycles of Christmas and Easter) to the time of salvation which is spelled out in the reading and preaching of scripture.

The Common Lectionary of Protestant churches and the Roman Catholic Lectionary produced by the Second Vatican Council are very similar and provide three readings for every Sunday over a three-year period. There are other lectionaries which follow a two-year cycle or other time frame. But the three-year cycle known as Year A, Year B and

Year C, respectively, is the one this article will deal with in regard to preaching.

Following the lectionary can give both a focus and discipline to preaching and to the church's life. When Sunday church school curriculum follows the lectionary this prepares the hearers for the sermon. Announcing the lectionary readings a week in advance and requesting members of the congregation to read and reflect on them during the week also prepares the hearers' hearts for the homily based on the lectionary readings. However, the preacher should reserve the freedom to respond to world and local crises and to pressing congregational needs as led by the Holy Spirit, and to depart from the lectionary if needed.

One of the chief benefits of preaching the lectionary is that this systematic proclamation of scripture enables both preacher and congregation to follow through the seasons of the church year, preparing for and celebrating the central events of the Christian faith. Thus, preaching from the lectionary channels the energy and study of the church, enabling members to relate their faith to the world in which they live.

In preaching from the lectionary one should be aware of the two cycles which make up the Christian calendar: the weekly cycle of Sunday to Sunday, and the annual cycle which deals with two major festivals of the church: Christmas and Easter. The weekly cycle is the older and is the foundation and kernel of the church year. For instance, Easter is a "big Sunday" since Sunday is the day on which the early church celebrated Christ's resurrection and for this reason it is called "the Lord's Day."

One advantage in preaching on the lectionary is that preaching by necessity takes on a christological center. The two foci of the church year are Christ-celebrations: Christmas which celebrates the incarnation, and Easter which celebrates redemption. Examining these two foci more closely we see that the church year begins with Advent which prepares for the Christmas celebration (including Christ's return) and Epiphany which reflects the Christmas celebration. In a similar fashion, Lent serves to prepare for Easter and the fifty days following Easter are a reflection of that celebration. The fifty days climax in Pentecost. Thus we see that preaching from the lectionary leads the preacher and congregation in an annual rehearsal of the history of our salvation accomplished in the life, death, resurrection/ascension and return of Jesus Christ. The time after Epiphany, and after Pentecost and before Advent is really not a season but is made up of ordinary Sundays. Thus the Christian year is, strictly speaking, only half a year, extending from Advent through Pentecost.

The time from Pentecost to Advent offers the preacher an extended period of time to structure preaching on passages or books of the Bible other than those of the lectionary if one desires. A happy compromise might be found in reading OT and gospel lessons from the lectionary and preaching on the epistle for a period of time, preaching on some gospel passages omitted from the lectionary, or preaching on the minor prophets or other portions of the OT which are given little or no place in the lectionary.

Slavish following of the lectionary can, after a period of years of preaching, create for preacher and congregation a new canon of scripture. This can be avoided by seeking to balance the lectionary readings with other passages not included in the lectionary. One of the chief criticisms of the lectionary is that it too carefully avoids many of the abrasive and hard texts of the Bible. The preacher should read and reflect not only on the pericope chosen but on the larger section of scripture in which it is found, especially on verses omitted or occurring immediately before or following the pericope. Unfortunately the lament and complaint psalms are not at the center of the lectionary readings. While a reading from a psalm is specified for each Sunday, these are seldom laments. The result of omitting most of the hard sayings dealing with judgment, hell, etc., the minor prophet material and the lament psalms, is that the lectionary creates a romantic view of life over against the reality of the culture in which we live and over against the abrasion which is an integral part of the biblical faith. The preacher should be aware of this serious fault of the lectionary and work to remedy it with substitutions during the non-festival six months of the church year and also by including before, in and after the pericope, key verses which were omitted by the shapers of the lectionary.

One of the main advantages for both preacher and congregation of preaching from the lectionary is that over a period of three years the preacher will have either read, or read and preached on, many of the central themes and key passages of scripture. For example, Year A usually takes the gospel lessons from Matthew; Year B uses passages from both Mark and John since Mark is the shortest gospel. Year C takes gospel passages from Luke. The gospel of John is used also in Cycles A and C on occasion. During the fifty days from Easter to Pentecost, readings from the book of Acts are used in the place of OT lessons to stress the ongoing ministry of the church in the world by the power of the risen and living Christ.

Preaching which does not follow the lectionary or some other plan of systematic preaching through scripture can easily fall prey to the preacher's own whims and favorite themes and texts. One prominent preacher was well known for attacking his favorite targets of psychology, education, nationalism and Marxism. Following the lectionary in preaching can help avoid focusing either on a pietistic, individualistic form of Christianity, or stressing, on the other hand, only the social and political aspects of the Christian faith. Following the lectionary in preaching can help avoid riding theological hobbyhorses found in a selected few passages of scripture. These are themes to which the preacher keeps returning rather than covering the full sweep of scripture.

Another strong argument for following the lectionary in preaching during this period of growing biblical illiteracy is to better acquaint congregations with the books of the Bible and their message. Also, as the same passages recur every three years, following the lectionary can offer an opportunity for the preacher to study these passages in greater depth and then develop sermons on the same passages but from a fresh perspective. Because of the growing use of the lectionary in preaching there is a vast volume of exegetical, liturgical and homiletical literature available to the preacher.

The lectionary provides an integrative role for worship in three particular aspects of the church's life: liturgical, educational and ecumenical. Preaching from the lectionary allows the preacher and church musicians to plan the theme of each worship service some months in advance. Congregations appreciate the fact that other churches are dealing with the same lections. The lectionary enables church-school and church-worship to become integrated through the use of the same lections. Thus, the lectionary is playing an increasingly important and visible role in the ecumenical movement, bringing Roman Catholic and other Christian churches closer to one another as they read and hear scripture from the same passages each Sunday. This has enabled preachers to gather for small group study of the lectionary passages early in the week as they share exegetical and homiletical work. Some church musicians are playing the same anthems and hymns, sometimes going to different churches on the same Sunday to do so. Thus, the preaching of the lectionary can enhance the whole worship service and give visible evidence of the unity which exists around the scriptures, even if churches are not yet united at the holy table.

Underlying the lectionary is a basic principle which asserts that the New Covenant and the Old Covenant are related. This is sometimes indicated in the maxim that the NT is latent in the OT, and that the OT lies open in the NT. A word of caution should be given in preaching the lectionary texts, however, and seeking to relate OT and NT lessons. The preacher should not deprive the Hebrew Bible of its true and original meaning in an effort to force lections into a Christian mold. Nor should the Hebrew Scriptures be used only as a quarry for prophecies of Jesus Christ and the time of salvation. The lectionary texts from the OT and NT sometimes relate to each other by a common theme or allusions to themes. Sometimes they do not. During ordinary time the Lutheran version of the lectionary chooses OT lessons to relate to the gospel lessons. But the Common Lectionary does not. It provides a continuous reading, for example, of the life of David in Year B. Sometimes the NT passage reinforces the message of the OT and carries it further. On other Sundays the OT and NT lessons may contrast with each other. Or the OT event or miracle or teaching may foreshadow a similar one in the NT. Whenever these ways of relating the passages occur the preacher should make use of them to enrich the reading and preaching of the pericopes.

No one knows how or when lectionaries came into use in the Christian church. There is little evidence of lectionaries before the 4th century. However, in Judaism after Jesus' time there was a fixed lectionary in which there were two lessons for each Sabbath. One was from the Torah and the other from the prophets. Some Jewish scholars claim this system was in use even as early as the time of Jesus. The earliest Western lectionaries date from the 5th century. The Greek Orthodox adopted a semi-continuous reading of scripture in the 9th century. It was only natural that certain books and texts would come to be associated with the Christmas and Easter cycles and with the seasons of the year. In the early spring when fields and vineyards were being cultivated appropriate passages such as the parables of the Laborers in the Vineyard, and the Sower were read. Certain pericopes came to be associated with saints' days. While two lessons, one always from the gospels, were standard practice in the West, sometimes there were more lessons.

It may be that Luke assumed Jesus was using such a lectionary reading when he preached in the synagogue of Nazareth (Lk 4:18f). After reading from the prophet Isaiah, chap. 61, Jesus sat down and spoke to the congregation. He said, "Today this scripture is fulfilled in your hearing." This is one of the purposes of preaching the lectionary passages: to let a selection from an ancient book speak directly to the hearers.

One of the surprises reported by preachers who follow the lectionary is the amazing way in which the prescribed texts speak to the particular needs and events of the congregation.

Preaching from the lectionary has several benefits for the preacher such as eliminating the nagging question which recurs each week: "What shall I preach about this Sunday?" It gives direction to the preacher's study of the scripture if the preacher follows the gospel or OT or epistle pericope for a period of time. The preacher is more likely to study the gospel of Mark, for example, in greater depth if the preacher plans a number of sermons from that book than if the preacher merely "dips" into Mark for a text for one Sunday alone. This also benefits the congregation who can gain a sense of continuity in the sermons based on a particular book of the Bible.

A number of objections have been raised to preaching from the lectionary. They can be summed up briefly: 1) The freedom of the pulpit and of the preacher is hampered; 2) Scripture orders time, rather than time ordering scripture as in the lectionary; 3) The world sets the agenda for selecting scripture if the preacher is to speak to the world and its needs; and, 4) The needs of people should set the agenda for text selection, rather than an impersonal system of text selection. Space does not permit the refutation of each of these objections, but the preacher who considers following the lectionary should be aware of these objections.

Some other objections are the lack of sufficient OT passages illustrating the role of women in sacred history, the simplistic use of prophecy-fulfillment themes in the selection of OT passages, an insufficient number of OT passages and the breaking up of OT books into short snippets. Other problems arise in a close examination of the lectionary. The Common Lectionary is not a fixed entity but is subject to change by the Consultation on Common Texts. As the Roman Catholic lectionary was revised by the Second Vatican Council, so it is likely that future councils will make further revisions.

Never before in the history of the church, Catholic and Reforming, has there been such a potent instrument and symbol as the lectionary to enable preachers to work toward expressing unity in the word and the calling to mission. Perhaps this is the greatest strength of the lectionary and the chief motive for preaching it.

PREACHING THE SCRIPTURES

The practice of preaching on scripture is deeply rooted in the Christian tradition. The OT was the Bible of the early church, and one of the first exercises in Christian theology was to make manifest the relation between the biblical texts (usually in the Greek Septuagint version) and Jesus Christ. The units that make up the synoptic gospels and the long discourses in the fourth gospel are sometimes traced back to early Christian preaching ("In the beginning was the sermon," according to M. Dibelius). Paul used the rhetorical devices and logical patterns developed by Jewish midrashists as well as the techniques of Greek and Latin rhetoricians. Among the NT documents it is customary to classify the letter to the Hebrews as a sermon (see Heb 11:22, "my word of exhortation").

In the patristic period and indeed throughout Christian history the biblical homily or sermon has been a principal vehicle for expressing the truths of Christian faith and showing their relevance for the lives of believers. The line of great biblical preachers runs from John Chrysostom and Augustine through Martin Luther to Karl Barth and Martin Luther King.

Why the Bible should be the starting point for Christian preaching follows from what the church believes the Bible to be: "the words of God expressed in the words of men" (D.V., 13). The Bible is divine revelation because in it God "chose to show forth and communicate the eternal decisions of his will" (D.V., 6). The Bible is inspired in that God made use of the human authors to teach "firmly, faithfully, and without error that truth which God wanted to put into the sacred writings for the sake of our salvation" (D.V., 12). As the authoritative collection of sacred writings the scriptures function as the "canon," that is, as the measure by which the church's faith and life can be assessed. These traditional theological affirmations about the Bible (revelation, inspiration, inerrancy, canonicity) indicate the great authority of the Bible within the church and help to explain why it is the starting point for Christian preaching.

The documents of Vatican II affirm the pre-eminent position of scripture in Christian preaching. The Constitution on Divine Revelation insists that "all the preaching of the church must be nourished and ruled by Sacred Scripture" (D.V., 21). The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy instructs that "by means of the homily the mysteries of the faith and the guiding principles of the Christian life are expounded from the sacred text during the course of the liturgical year" (S.C., 52). The General Instruction of the Roman Missal directs that the homily should develop "some point of the readings" or of the other prayers connected with the eucharistic liturgy (G.I.R.M., 41). The table at which the bread of life is offered to the faithful is constituted by both the word of God and the body of Christ (D.V., 21).

In the revised lectionary of the Roman Catholic church (which has been accepted and adapted by major Protestant denominations) the preacher finds an array of biblical texts and faces the task of showing how these texts may illumine the lives of God's people today. The arrangement of texts in the liturgical cycle leads the church each year through the dynamic of Christian life from Advent to Christ the King who reigns forever. On Sundays the OT, psalm, and gospel readings are usually correlated around a common theme, with the selection from the epistles or Revelation running on a separate cycle. On weekdays the OT epistle and gospel readings proceed on separate, continuous tracks, and the psalm often ties in with the first reading. There is a three-year cycle for Sundays and a two-year cycle for weekdays. Thus the lectionary is a kind of anthology from which the preacher may choose what speaks best to the experience and situation of the particular congregation.

Biblical Criticism and Preaching

The modern approach to scripture study is a combination of literary and historical methods that is often referred to as "biblical criticism" or the "historical-critical" method. The goal of biblical criticism is to learn as much as possible about the meaning of a text in its original historical setting; that is, what the human author sought to communicate to the original audience in the 5th century B.C. or the 1st century A.D. Biblical critics try to establish as much as possible the original Hebrew and Greek texts, and then base their modern translations on them. They apply literary methods to biblical texts in order to understand their style and content, and historical methods in order to learn about their origin and setting.

Though historical criticism presents the preacher with some challenges, it also performs important services. An appreciation of what the biblical text may have meant in its original setting protects the preacher from fanciful interpretations and applications today, from using the biblical text as the mere occasion or pretext for putting forward prejudices or pet theories. On the other hand, application of the various critical methods can help the preacher to generate themes and strategies for preaching. Without the serious work of textual critics and translators the preacher would not have a reliable text on which to preach. The Bible is literature, and the preacher reads and interprets biblical texts on behalf of the congregation. By attending to the concerns of general literary criticism (word study, context, literary genres, characterization, plot development, structure, etc.) the preacher finds clues toward an imaginative application of the text for today.

Even the more recondite procedures of biblical criticism can help the preacher. Form criticism seeks to determine the literary genre of a text (narrative, legal statement, parable, proverb, hymnic fragment, etc.) and what the genre says about the history of the community. Without a clear idea of the nature of the text that one is preaching, the preacher risks mistaking parable for historical narrative, or admonition for law. Moreover, through form criticism the preacher comes to recognize that many biblical texts arose out of the experience of a faith-community (setting in life) and met its needs—precisely what the preacher today does. Likewise, redaction criticism, which gives special attention to the unique views or unusual emphases that the biblical writers placed on their sources, enables the preacher to identify the distinctive perspective from which the ancient author viewed an event or person in response to a problem facing the community.

The material culture and spiritual atmosphere of the biblical world have been greatly illumined by archaeological excavations and textual discoveries. These enable us to know far more about the setting in which the biblical writers worked than our ancestors ever knew. These findings allow the preacher today to understand the cultural assumptions and modes of expression current among people in antiquity. Thus the preacher can discern where a biblical text is merely repeating "what everyone knows" and where it may be challenging the commonly received wisdom in the light of the perspective of faith.

Thus the historical-critical method need not be viewed as inimical to faithful preaching within the church. The methods themselves are ideologically neutral. The Christian preacher can profit greatly from applying them in the context of faith.

For many preachers the OT presents a special challenge. They sometime find its content and manner of expression strange and difficult. In the Sunday lectionary the OT selection usually supplies the "background" to the gospel text and has been chosen in light of a promise-fulfillment theology. The OT is seldom taken on its own terms.

Vatican II insisted on the importance of the OT for Christians. The OT according to D.V. 14-16 is not only the complement to the NT and the preparation for Christ's coming but also the witness to God's plan of salvation and treasury of divine pedagogy. Though the OT is said to contain some things that are "incomplete and temporary" (D.V., 15), the Christian story reaches back to Adam and Abraham, and would be incoherent apart from the Hebrew Bible. When the preacher's focus is the OT text, it is often possible to view the gospel in a fresh way. The psalms, with their open and metaphorical language, are particularly helpful in promoting an identification between the ancient text and the modern reader, thus accounting for their perennial popularity.

Hermeneutical Challenges

The term "hermeneutics" (interpretation) is applied sometimes to the whole process of determining what a biblical text meant in the past and means now, sometimes primarily to express what it means now. The chief hermeneutical challenges that have arisen from biblical criticism concern the differences between the biblical world and today's world, and the variety of theological perspectives and ways of expression in the Bible. How does the preacher move from the world of the Bible (there) to a congregation today (here)? How does the preacher find meaning in biblical texts and make them meaningful for a congregation today?

Fundamentalist preachers operate on the assumption that there is no real difference from the biblical world and that scripture's divine origin guarantees uniformity of teaching within the Bible. The Fathers of the church frequently resorted to the allegorical methods developed in pagan circles to make the Greek epics (Iliad and Odyssey) more meaningful and serious for a later age. The Fathers interpreted biblical narratives (especially in the OT) and parables in terms of the Christ-event, and discovered in each detail an element in the central story of salvation.

Most biblical preachers today seek out parallels between the biblical situation and their own. For example, they may find symmetries between the community divisions in 1st-century Corinth that Paul addressed and the factions within their own church. In drawing parallels between the biblical text and the life of the congregation today the preacher may urge people to identify with biblical characters such as the man who was robbed and left for dead in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10:30-35), or with those who stood at the foot of Jesus' cross ("Were you there when they crucified my Lord?"). Or the preacher may provide an imaginative recreation of the biblical scene and bid the congregation to see and feel what Peter or some other character experienced. Many preachers "spiritualize" a text by substituting a spiritual reality (spiritual obtuseness or obduracy) for a material one (physical blindness). Or they may draw a universal lesson out of a particular text, as some have derived a doctrine of church and state from Rom 13:1-7 (often with unfortunate consequences). One rather extreme example of this kind of substitution was Rudolf Bultmann's program of demythologization in which he interpreted scripture in light of Martin Heidegger's existentialist philosophy and turned mythical or theological terms into statements about the human condition (anthropology).

The chief problem with drawing parallels between scripture and today's situation is the risk of turning the texts into allegories and ignoring the real difference between the world of the Bible and the present situation. Moreover, there are important issues not covered directly by the biblical writers such as the morality of nuclear warfare, birth control, abortion, the ethical problems connected with "test tube" babies, and so forth. In these cases the preacher can draw general principles and guidelines from the Bible, but not direct and explicit advice on the matters at hand.

The preacher's task is to listen to the biblical texts and to bring them to bear on the life of a specific community today. The preacher must try to remain faithful to the biblical tradition and to the community's situation. The act of preaching is personal (depending on the gifts and limitations of the preacher) and concrete (depending on the particular situation of those who are addressed—their problems, educational level, etc.). An effective homily might range from seven minutes to an hour, according to local custom. It may be largely an exposition of the biblical text with applications along the way. Or it may simply develop a point in the text in a wholly new imaginative framework.

Biblical preaching cannot be reduced to abstract principles or even practical guidelines. Nor is it merely the performance of an articulate or highly educated person. Rather it must flow from the Christian theology of the word. So Paul described his ministry: "When you received the word of God which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men but what it really is, the word of God, which is at work in you believers"

(1 Thess 2:12-13). Likewise, Heb 4:12 calls the word of God "living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword." And it is surely not accidental that the prologue to John's Gospel celebrates Jesus the revealer and revelation of the Father as the Word of God (Jn 1:1-18). The power of God's word makes biblical preaching possible.

PREACHING, CATHOLIC, IN THE UNITED STATES

While historians from many ecclesiastical disciplines have frequently relied upon the evidence of sermons to supplement their research, little scholarly attention has been given to historical homiletics. For this reason, few definitive conclusions can be offered about nearly five hundred years of Catholic preaching in the Americas, particularly in those territories and among people of the United States. From the arrival of Spanish friars to the New World in 1493, the gospel has been continuously proclaimed and preached among us, yet the character of that preaching and its effect upon the Catholic body remains relatively unknown. This condition need not persist. In fact, the U.S. Catholic bishops gave special impetus to the search for our preaching heritage in their 1982 document, Fulfilled in Your Hearing: The Homily in the Sunday Assembly. In the absence of a body of critical literature on the subject, we can begin to construct our homiletic history out of a myriad of sources, especially out of sermons themselves.

The surviving remnants of U.S. Catholic pastoral preaching, when pieced together, reveal the multiple patterns of worshiping communities at prayer. In their variety of design and expression, homiletic artifacts contribute to the portrait of our faith communities in all their catholicity. As historical documents, sermon manuscripts, outlines, and notes chronicle the formation of the church in North America. As rhetorical texts, homiletic literature captures collective concerns and attitudes of local assemblies that have helped shape the national and global character of Catholicism. From the perspective of history and rhetoric, sermons tell us more than about the faith or preoccupations of an individual preacher; they reflect the ethos of the entire community.

For every regional, social, or theological expression of the ecclesia, there is a corresponding homiletic. This is most evident when sermons are considered as the voices of a religious community's self-understanding about such things as faith and culture. In this way, the corpus of this country's Catholic sermons reflect the predominant stance of the church toward the socio-political context in which it finds itself. In another way, our preaching is remarkable only for the peculiar ways in which it imitates ancient patterns of proclamation. Humanist preachers of the past like Bernard of Clairvaux or Charles Borromeo find their counterparts in U.S. homiletic history. More commonly, our preachers have adopted the formal, didactic tradition first explicated by Augustine and later canonized by scholastic theologians at Trent. Epochs in our national and religious history have been shaped by or have given shape to a homiletics that has attempted to explain or interpret life's ambiguities in light of the gospel. This essay provides only a faint sketch of our preaching profile, highlighting some distinctive features of parochial, liturgical homiletics from the birth of the Republic to the present.

Maryland's small and homogeneous band of English Catholic colonists began to think of themselves as Americans well before the outset of our national period. Their preachers, too, revealed a fermenting republicanism and an effort to integrate into their sermons expressions so important to the Enlightenment: "civil and religious liberty," "rights of conscience," and "freedom of determination." At its best, this Catholicism and its preaching, personified by Bishop John Carroll (1735-1815), was Enlightened and self-consciously "American." This relatively short-lived period of Enlightened Catholic preaching had a two-fold agenda. First, it aimed to build up the community of faithful through an eloquence of adaptation, one that accommodated a predominantly French cultivated rhetoric and spirituality to the needs of the infant republic. Since it was not until 1791 that the United States had its own seminary, Catholic clergy relied upon Europe, especially France, for their education. Seminary students bound for America discovered no national idiom in the sermons of their baroque French models, Massillon and Bossuet; they had to discover this on their own. Second, Enlightened Catholic preaching became a vehicle for social acceptance by the more powerful forces of Protestant America. Catholic preachers like Carroll, understanding themselves as a minority, used eloquence to enhance the church's reputation among the majority and to persuade both Catholics and Protestants of their mutual concerns as Christians and as neighbors. Thus, for example, did Carroll's preaching reflect ecumenical sensibilities, since Protestants often attended Catholic services. That Carroll frequently addressed his congregation as "Catholic Christians" or "citizens" is typical of an irenic strategy intended to underscore the reality of America's religious pluralism.

Enlightened Catholic preaching fostered Christian humanism by stressing the harmony of nature and grace, the church and state, the person and society. But even among those small communities of prosperous colonists, such preaching was also frequently apologetical, voicing the Anglo-American Catholic gentry's lingering sense of its own political and religious disenfranchisement. These concerns only intensified and resounded from the pulpits of burgeoning immigrant communities in the 19th century.

The humanist, liberal character of Enlightened Catholic preaching found muted expression among Americans during the "brick and mortar" age of the church. Preachers like Paulist founder Isaac Hecker (1819-1888), Bishop John Lancaster Spalding (1840-1916), and Bishop John J. Keane (1838-1918), were atypical promoters of a manifest destiny Catholicism, emphasizing the church and nation's mutual contributions to civilization and progress. More widespread were religious, social, and political currents that formed a steady stream of preaching that is best described as "formalist." A formalist homiletic offered order and stability by emphasizing the role of preacher as teacher and by promoting the continuity of the church's devotional life. Inhospitable forces from within and without the predominantly immigrant Catholic community moved preachers to explicate, preserve, or defend the constants and universals of Catholic identity.

Aside from their regional or ethnic distinctions, Catholics experienced in common varying degrees of persecution, alienation, and isolation during the first sixty years of the last century. Preachers contended more or less successfully with the outside challenges posed by ethnic discrimination, political nativism, and cultural estrangement. They preached a message of assurance and comfort to people who had escaped European conflicts and famine only to find abject poverty and civil war. Their sermons provided the community a momentary refuge from a bewildering and threatening society. By content and design, the Sunday sermon rarely commented on contemporary events but lifted the listeners up or away from their social or personal turmoil. This explains, in part, why so few references to the Civil War exist among the homiletic artifacts of the 1860s.

The proliferation of ethnic parishes throughout the 19th century made it possible for a mostly immigrant clergy to formalize, and thus preserve, both the cultural and religious identity of their communities. At the same time, such preaching often advanced a view of humanity and society that favored pessimism and acceptance of this "vale of tears." New York's first archbishop, John Hughes (1797-1864), warned his congregation: "There is reason to fear, that when God permits men or nations to prosper to the extent of their desires, it is a mark of his disfavor. . . ." Preachers like Hughes used the pulpit as a medium for assuaging the suffering of impoverished immigrants and for maintaining their Catholic ethos throughout the slow process of Americanization. In a less polemical way did the first archbishop of Santa Fe, Jean B. Lamy (1814-1888), preach a gospel of assimilation. For example, he began his episcopacy in Santa Fe with a series of sermons in Spanish that sought to move his Hispanic congregation away from their native spirituality. In its place, he presented to them Anglo-European religious art and devotions to encourage their more rapid religious and social acculturation.

We know more about the preaching of the American hierarchy because their sermons have been preserved. But we also know that, in many cases, bishops set the standard and the tone for local churches. Hughes insisted that his priests preach regularly, even if the sermons were not of their own composition, and threatened deportation for those who refused. The sermon collections of several priests of Hughes' diocese vary little from the archbishop's except in the inferiority of their eloquence. To compound the problem of sheer resistance to the pulpit, preachers were themselves mostly ill-prepared for their task.

Those few pulpit orators who gained prominence among American Catholics did so in spite of their severely limited access to homiletic resources and education. The 1829 emancipation of Catholics in England signalled the first real opportunity to create or translate manuals of preaching in English. It was not until the 1866 Plenary Council in Baltimore that the bishops actually required the teaching of homiletics in the nation's seminaries. Needless to say, homiletic education did not arise as an immediate priority. Instead, seminary professors and their students continued to rely on the fine, but not always pertinent, French Sulpician-Vincentian methods. Immigrant clergy in America, if they preached at all, often continued the practice of reading the sermon texts of continental masters. Most pastoral preaching, regardless of the language in which it was delivered, focused primarily on catechetical topics. Since preachers feared great "leakage" from the church brought on by ignorance, their sermons stressed the knowledge of doctrine and the necessity of proper religious practice to insure one's Catholicity.

Untrained preachers, uncatechized congregations, pervasive anti-Catholicism, and a hierarchy made defensive by papal edicts like the 1864 Syllabus of Errors took their toll on the nation's preaching. Such conditions produced a curious blend of preaching and teaching that rarely considered the liturgical context during which the sermon occurred. A random sampling of some sermon titles preached in New York in the later 19th century is fairly representative: "On the Temporal Power of the Pope," "Sanctifying Grace," "The Uncanonized Saints of Ireland," and "Freemasonry." The gap between preaching and worship simply widened as the century progressed. In 1884, during the Third Plenary Council, the bishops endorsed Irish Vincentian Thomas MacNamara's Sacred Rhetoric (1882) as an official preaching textbook. While not widely used in seminaries, this text reveals the collective mentality of those responsible for the country's preaching. MacNamara's book simply collates and promotes for preachers tenets of the popular elocutionary movement that had been recently imported from France. The textbook features a fold-out series of posed figures dressed in cassock, surplice, and biretta modelling the orator's proper stance and gesture for emotions like horror, pity, and shame.

MacNamara's text was eclipsed by another Irish cleric's works, Thomas Potter's Sacred Eloquence (1866) and The Spoken Word (1869). Potter's works, while highly derivative, put forth a stunning collection of instruction and example from Cicero to Newman that influenced homiletic instruction well into the 20th century. The popularity of these excellent books indicates that, by and large, seminary professors provided their students with the best resources available.

Living memory continues to inform, if not prejudice, our characterization of 20th-century preaching. The periodical literature on preaching from the early 1900s to the 1950s in Ecclesiastical Review (later The American Ecclesiastical Review), The Homiletic and Pastoral Review, and Orate Fratres (later Worship) corrects the temptation to dismiss the efforts of preachers caught between Modernism and Vatican II. The impressive attention given to preaching and the recurring themes covered by these journals provide some insights into American Catholic homiletic theory. First of all, throughout an era known for its neo-Thomist biases, many homiletic contributors had a strong affinity for Potter's use of Ciceronian rhetoric. These authors rarely advanced new theories or techniques; rather, they adapted for preachers the enduring prescriptions of classical rhetoric. For example, where the ancients would select the matter for their discourses from a list of topoi, the American priest found in his journals topical outlines for an entire year's worth of Sunday sermons. Secondly, in spite of the plethora of sermon suggestions and rhetorical instruction that experts provided, the evidence of actual pastoral sermons contributes to the homogeneous and predictable reputation of American Catholic homiletics. That is to say, for the most part, preachers delivered for their assemblies Sunday after Sunday short courses in doctrinal or moral instruction. This focus on the perennial questions and universal concerns of Catholic life extended the formalist, didactic character of U.S. Catholic preaching into the 1960s.

The impulse to explain, teach, or defend the Catholic faith inspired many forms of preaching that, to date, have received minuscule scholarly attention. Even less accessible than the history of our parochial preaching, then, is that of special preaching outside of the eucharistic liturgy. It is beyond the scope of this article to comment on the effects of sermons heard from farm fields, street corners, or televisions. But noting this rich variety of preaching acknowledges how colorful is the fabric of our homiletic history.

Before the national period, Maryland Jesuits, along with Dominican and Franciscan friars, had spent themselves evangelizing the indigenous people of America. From the early 19th century, mission bands of Redemptorists and other congregations made the circuit from coast to coast reviving the faith of thousands in urban parishes and rural communities. By the 20th century, clerical and lay street preachers brought religious apologetic into greater prominence. Lay members of movements like the Catholic Truth and Evidence Guilds criss-crossed the country with their revival repertoire between 1917 and the 1940s. Simultaneously, Catholic clergy and laity cooperated in developing a flourishing retreat movement that generated special forms of conference preaching. The electronic media enticed Catholic preachers from the start. The 1940s and 1950s featured several nationally broadcast radio and television preachers, most notably Bishop Fulton J. Sheen. Throughout the waxing and waning of these preaching movements reside the same tendencies and tensions as in liturgical preaching, namely, the effort of these preachers to interpret or explain how one can be both Catholic and American.

The explicit connections between liturgy and preaching are themselves too recently emphasized to be taken for granted by most U.S. Catholics. The birth of the liturgical movement in the United States, starting with the 1926 publication of Orationes Fratres, initiated a limited series of articles on liturgy and preaching. But it was the 1943 encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu that opened the doors to Catholic biblical scholarship and, subsequently, to that form of biblical preaching we call the "homily." The conciliar reforms initiated by the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963) and the adoption of the Lectionary of the Roman Missal (1971) encouraged liturgical, biblical preaching. More than this, it signalled a renewed pulpit humanism reminiscent of Bishop John Carroll's era in which Catholics and Protestants preach today, not from common pulpits but from a common lectionary.

The homily, by taking its life both from a particular liturgical moment and from the special concerns of the assembly, fosters the integration of the gospel into every aspect of Christian life. This implies more than advocating from the pulpit the lived expression of Christian values; for Americans, in particular, this integration promotes the shared expression of the gospel. Not surprisingly, the emphasis on the communal nature of the homily raises the issue of "equal access" to the pulpit. So, while U.S. bishops wrestle with the question about who might properly preach the homily, liberation theologians teach from the homilies of our Third World poor, uneducated and unordained brothers and sisters. These perspectives are metaphoric for that persistent tension in American Catholic preaching between the humanist and formalist, the interpreter and teacher. Such tension mirrors the social, cultural, and religious diversity that has always described our preaching. In no small way does it also describe the very character of American Catholicism.

PREACHING, LITURGICAL MINISTRY OF

Vatican II set as one of its principal goals "to impart an ever-increasing vigor to the Christian life of the faithful" (S.C., 1). Having sounded the call to renewal, the constitution continues: "the liturgy daily builds up those who are in the Church, making of them a holy temple of the Lord, a dwelling place for God in the Spirit, to the mature measure of fullness of Christ" (S.C., 2). The liturgy concomitantly increases the power of the members of the church "to preach Christ and thus show forth the Church" (S.C., 2).

Since the liturgy is an action of Christ and his body the church it surpasses all others (S.C., 7); worship is both the summit of Christian life and the source of Christian living (S.C., 11).

Critical to the insight of the conciliar framers is the notion that it is the assembly which is the subject of the liturgical act. No body of mere spectators, the assembly itself joins with Christ in offering a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving (cf. S.C., 7, 14, 26; G.I.R.M., 54.2).

The liturgical homily is an integral part of the worship celebration (S.C., 52). To open up the mysteries of redemption in such a way that God's power and mercy is present to the body of believers is central to the liturgy itself and therefore central to liturgical preaching (S.C. 2, 102). Like the liturgy itself, preaching is a necessary source of nourishment of the Christ-life (G.I.R.M., 41).

The presentation of the mystery of Christ, dead and risen, within the preaching event is to be articulated for the building up of the particular community (G.I.R.M., 41). Liturgical preaching, like worship itself, glorifies God and sanctifies people, renewing baptismal commitment to service of God, neighbor and world. Preaching is thus a genuine liturgical ministry to be carried out with utmost care and fidelity (S.C., 35).

This ministry of preaching continues the earthly mission of Jesus "to gather into one the children of God who are scattered abroad" (Jn 11:52). In the preaching event God's active word renews and empowers God's people for mission.

Preaching and Faith

If liturgy builds up the community for its mission to the world, it does so by articulating and embodying the believers' faith in Christ. Through word and song, gesture and action, the liturgy incarnates faith, expressing the mystery of an ever-present God, revealed in Christ Jesus and shared in his Spirit.

Preaching witnesses to faith in Christ Jesus. "We cannot but speak of what we have seen and heard" (Acts 4:40; cf. Acts 2:32; 3:15; 10:39). If Jesus preached the reign of God and the church preaches Jesus, then Christ as the advent of God's reign—the autobasileia as Origen phrased it (in Mt 18:23)—is what the church preaches. The historical Jesus preached God's reign in existential terms, e.g., the blind see, the lame walk, etc. The modern preacher needs to preach this Jesus, the incarnation of God's reign, in similarly existential terms.

In worship, then, preaching is directed toward an embodiment of the mystery of faith. Liturgical preaching makes present the mystery celebrated rendering faith palpable for the hearers. "Today this scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing" (Lk 4:22). Standing at one with the assembly, the preacher proclaims the good news of Christ, dead and risen, not as an abstraction, but as experiential. This proclamation is not of a past reality, but of an ever-present and continuing reality. "Today, when you hear his voice, do not harden your hearts" (Heb 3:7). In other words, the paschal mystery of Christ is the continual experience and constant life pattern of faithful Christians. Preaching contextualizes this mystery and unfolds it as a way of living the Christ-life.

Preaching As Prayer

If worship is a corporate expression of praise and intercession shared by the assembly, its heart is prayer. So too must preaching itself be prayer-in-word. As part of a ritual event, preaching operates in a ritual mode. Expressing and incarnating through the symbols of word and gesture, preaching gives voice to corporate yearnings for the graced life. As the preaching event rehearses the great deeds of God on behalf of God's people—not as past, but as present paradigmatic realities—it elicits response, just as the other ritual moments in worship elicit response.

In a eucharistic setting, the homily also serves a ritual function of bridging the gap between the liturgy of the word and the liturgy of the table. Leaving the hearers with a renewed faith and a desire to render thanks, the homily calls for completing the word-service in eucharistic table fellowship. Effective preaching, eliciting wonder at God's goodness, moves to the great thanksgiving prayer of God's people.

Preacher As Presider; Presider As Preacher

"The homily should ordinarily be given by the celebrant" (G.I.R.M., 42). Thomas Aquinas identified preaching as the officium principalissimum sacerdotis, the chiefest sacerdotal duty. Vatican II echoed the same idea: "... the first task of priests as co-workers of the bishops [is] to preach the Gospel of God to all" (P.O., 4).

One of the earliest descriptions of the Sunday eucharist, given by Justin, relates how the presider preaches: "When the lector has finished, the president addresses us and exhorts us to imitate the splendid things we have heard" (1 Apol., 67). After the presentation of bread and wine, Justin continues, "the president then prays and gives thanks according to his ability," a succinct description of the eucharistic prayer.

This early account shows the unity of word and table. The presider, having broken open God's word in preaching, now proclaims the eucharistic prayer, "leading the people in offering sacrifice" (G.I.R.M., 60). This blessing prayer, while not in homiletic form, is also Christian preaching. The public rehearsal of the charter events of Christ within a context of praise and thanksgiving is truly an act of homiletic: a faith-embodiment ritual proclamation. Breaking open the word leads to the ritualized thanksgiving prayer, culminating in a communion shared in the bread broken and cup outpoured.

If the eucharistic prayer is a kind of preaching, it is not the same as the homily, for in the eucharistic prayer the presider leads the assembly in a corporate proclamation of ecclesial faith. An epitome of the gospel, the thanksgiving prayer enunciates not a personal witness of the presider's faith, but the "mystery of faith" to which all respond "Amen."

Deacons and Others

If there is a certain unifying of the celebration when the presider both preaches and proclaims the eucharistic prayer, it does not follow that only the presider should preach. The presider, also a member of the gathered assembly, is charged with the responsibility for insuring the faithful proclamation of God's word in reading, in preaching, and in the table prayer.

"The deacon . . . sometimes preaches God's word" (G.I.R.M., 61). While the bishop's address to the candidate for diaconal ordination admonishes: "Never turn away from the hope which the Gospel offers; now you must not only listen to God's word but also preach it," the prayer of consecration refers to the appointment of deacons for table service (cf. Acts 6:1-6), works of charity and holiness of life; it relegates the preaching task to the apostles. Controversy over whether historically deacons' ministry specifically included preaching seems to be reflected in the ordination rite. Nonetheless what is clear is that diaconal service in any form is modelled after Jesus' own ministry: "I am among you as one who serves" (Lk 22:27). If charitable works are a chief element of diaconal ministry, history does attest to deacon's service at the liturgy.

It is consonant with the diaconal charism of charitable service for deacons to preach on those occasions when God's word calls the church to work on behalf of others, especially the poor. Additionally, of course, the deacon preaches at those rites in which he leads the community in prayer, e.g., baptism, marriage, etc.

The Directory for Masses with Children asserts that "one of the adults may speak to the children after the gospel, especially if the priest finds it difficult to adapt himself to the mentality of the children" (D.M.C., 24). This sound principle focuses on the necessity of being able to hear the word proclaimed and preached. What is critical for faith-building is a proclamation that is adequate to the hearers.

Thus, while the presider has a genuine responsibility for leading the assembly in their corporate prayer, the responsibility for preaching is not necessarily a presbyteral function.

Conclusion

If in the present dispensation preaching is generally reserved to priests and deacons, perhaps because preaching is seen as part of the church's teaching office, the changing physiognomy of parochial life and the publication of Guidelines for Lay Preaching signal a new opportunity for other Christians to be actively involved in this ministry. "So we are ambassadors for Christ, God making his appeal through us" (2 Cor 5:20).

The Decree on the Laity noted particularly the Holy Spirit's action of moving the laity to greater responsibility to service to Christ (see A.A., 1). Prophetic may be the words of that document: "in the hearts of all should the apostle's word find echo: 'Woe to me if I do not preach the Gospel' (1 Cor 9:1)" (A.A., 6).

PREACHING, SPECIAL OCCASION

To preach on special occasions is to utter a word which illuminates an event and transforms it into an experience. It is to weave a tapestry of words that bids the eye to focus and rejoice in what it beholds. Preaching on special occasions enables a gathered group to become a community which can proceed into the heart of the mystery being celebrated, whether that mystery is a celebration of ritual feast, or festive event.

The special occasion preaching considered here takes into account: (1) preaching which occurs within liturgical settings other than Sunday and weekday eucharists in ordinary time (e.g., baptisms, weddings, funerals, penance and anointing services); (2) preaching which takes place on feasts, whether christological, Marian, or sanctoral; (3) preaching which occurs at the celebration of special events such as religious professions, anniversaries of weddings and ordinations, gatherings for special groups with a particular focus. Some comments will now be offered on each of these three areas.

Preaching During the Rites

Each of the rites calls for a homily, offering some direction as to its purpose. The rite of baptism asks that the homily explain to those present the significance of the readings, trying to lead the gathered community to a deeper understanding of the mystery of baptism and encouraging both parents and sponsors to accept their responsibilities stemming from this sacrament. The rite of marriage calls the preacher to draw from the texts to speak about the mystery of Christian marriage, the dignity of married love, the grace of the sacrament, and the responsibilities of married people. The rite of anointing asks the preacher to speak to the meaning of illness within the plan of salvation and of the grace this sacrament provides. The rite of penance calls for motivating penitents to examine their consciences and renew their lives. Finally, the rite of funerals notes that the homily should include an expression of gratitude to God for his gifts, especially the gift of a Christian life to the deceased. The homily should link this death to the paschal mystery. All of these descriptions can be found in The Rites of the Roman Catholic Church (Pueblo, 1976). Since these rites were promulgated between 1969 and 1973, the common understanding of the homily points to an instructional moment. In light of the N.C.C.B. document, Fulfilled in Your Hearing (1982), one might revision this approach and see the homily as an interpretive moment, one which biblically interprets the action of God in the life of the community celebrating a particular rite.

What must be kept in mind is that on all these occasions the preacher is trying to touch the hearts of the congregation so they can enter prayerfully into the subsequent ritual and go on to live in a way that supports this event in their daily lives. The goal is to transform observers into active participants.

The homily must always be addressed to the gathered community, directly or indirectly. It is not only for the parents and sponsors of those to be baptized or for the bride and groom or for the immediate family of the deceased. Rather, it is addressed to all those assembled so that their lives are more fully understood as being the arena in which God is graciously present, calling us all more deeply into communion with the Trinity and with one another.

In ritual moments, it is appropriate to allow the scriptural texts to interpret these events for the life of the entire community. The homily is meant to be both an interpretive and an enabling event. The question is: how does this text bring meaning to the event that is being celebrated by this community today? How does the pericope of Jesus with the children (Mk 10:13-16) help the community understand what is happening in this baptismal event in which all are participating? How does it metaphorically mediate its meaning to those present and enable them to take part in this event and assume their responsibility in relation to those baptized? How does the Pauline hymn to agape (1 Cor 12:31-13:8) provide a perspective to interpret what is happening here and now for this community when two of their members vow their love? How does the meeting of Jesus and Martha (Jn 11:21-27) allow the preacher to interpret a particular death so that the community in faith and hope can give thanks and praise to God for this particular person and his/her participation in the paschal mystery? How do healing and forgiveness texts interpret communal anointing and penance services, revealing God's presence now in the lives of this group with its need for such graced moments? In other words, the homily preached on these special occasions must go beyond an instructional exercise and interpret this particular and unique event in the life of this particular community. It must be a poetic act that shapes understanding, elicits response, and calls the gathered community to go hopefully into a future in which God will increasingly become all in all.

Preaching on the Feasts

In a similar fashion, preaching on the great feasts like Christmas, Pentecost, Trinity Sunday, or the Immaculate Conception is not to be an occasion to lecture on the theology of the feast, or even to apply the theology of this feast to our lives. Instead, one must ask this question: how do the readings provide access to this feast in such a way that the feast can interpret the lived experience of this community of faith? How does the mystery of incarnation speak to what is happening in our lives by way of these readings? How does the poem that images the light shining in a darkness that cannot be overcome reveal how God is being enfleshed in our world today? How on Easter is the present community to understand its life in the risen Lord through the story of those who go to the tomb? How does the Immaculate Conception speak to our existence, shedding light on it through the story of the annunciation to Mary, a tale that images freedom, grace, and abiding love?

Unfortunately, the most boring preaching often happens on the feasts with the greatest theological importance. Sometimes it is due to this felt imperative to provide instructional material from the tradition that rarely rises above the bewildering terrain of theological jargon. Or the preacher works with all three texts as discrete units, providing a series of mini-homilies. As with the preaching that takes place during the liturgical rites, this homily must remain integral to the eucharist. It should function to move people to praise and thanks.

The preaching task is to bring an assembly to such an affective state that when the preacher says, "Lift up your hearts," the assembly can truly respond, "We have lifted them up to the Lord." Its role to stir up the faith of the people is achieved by bringing them to see how this feast, by means of these readings, helps them to understand their own lives as the arena in which God is working.

Then, too, there are the feasts of the saints honored during the church year, those men and women who are our family, our ancestors in the faith. One of the great needs for many believers is contact with people who have struggled to live the Christian life, who have sought to know and serve God in the ordinary settings of life. While there are few lay men and women who have achieved this status, still those saints whose lives have been documented often reveal common areas of identification in their attempts to love God and neighbor. Great saints like Teresa, Francis, Ignatius, to name but a few, continue to motivate and speak to contemporary lives.

One mistake in preaching on the feasts of the saints is to see it as an opportunity to provide a brief history lesson, thereby leaving the saints in the past, removed and often elevated above us. But, as with the feasts, the readings assigned to a particular saint can allow access to an incident or saying or aspect of the saint's life that functions as a link for identifying God's call, challenge, action in our lives. Here, too, the end of the sanctoral homily is not knowledge of the saint, but insight into the dealings of God with this community. The saint can be a means of achieving this, serving in some way as a metaphor for God's dealings with us. That aspect of the saint used to function metaphorically is determined by its connection with the assigned or suggested biblical text. In this way, sanctoral preaching remains biblically grounded.

Preaching at Special Events

Special occasions like anniversaries of marriage, religious profession, and ordination can become opportunities for sharing humorous anecdotes about those involved or premature eulogies. Such events can more fittingly be occasions to celebrate how the divine has interpenetrated the human in the course of a long period. Time is recognized as sacred time. Such moments provide an invitation to contemplate how such periods of fidelity help the community to know itself and what it is called to. To be a homily, the preaching must use the biblical text(s) to provide a lens through which such occasions are interpreted.

Finally, preaching at gatherings for special groups with a particular focus is also an occasion to allow the work of the group to be biblically grounded and celebrated in the act of eucharistic thanksgiving. The preacher can take advantage of the occasion to select those biblical passages that call the group to rededicate themselves in a spirit of confidence and hope, trusting in the God who has called them to this work.

PREACHING, THEOLOGY OF

The need for a contemporary theology of preaching from a Catholic perspective has been reaffirmed repeatedly since the time of the Second Vatican Council. In 1962 Charles Davis commented that even the phrase "theology of preaching" was new to the Catholic community and in the same decade Karl Rahner remarked that the crisis in preaching required "a theology of the annunciation of the Word of God" that went beyond the psychological and pedagogical insights of rhetoric and homiletics. Since the time of the catechism of the Council of Trent, a systematic presentation of Catholic doctrine had been presumed to provide the best guide to preaching. In the post-Reformation era the NT understanding of preaching as announcing the good news of salvation and the patristic and medieval practice of preaching as exploring the "spiritual sense" of the scriptures had given way to a view of preaching as doctrinal instruction. At its best, this neo-scholastic approach that reflected an underlying propositional model of revelation, preserved the Thomistic insight that "faith ends not in propositions, but in the reality" [of union with God] (S. Th. II-II, q. 1, a. 2, ad 2). Priests (the presumed preachers) were encouraged to explain the church's doctrines in a pastoral way that would draw believers more deeply into the whole mystery of faith. As early as 1936, however, Josef Jungmann noted that preaching had become "the vulgarization of theological tracts" and called for a return to the biblical understanding of preaching as the proclamation of the good news of salvation.

Return to the Sources

A return to the scriptures and to the liturgical preaching of the early church highlights key dimensions that need to be retrieved in any contemporary reformulation of a theology of preaching. The preaching of Jesus as pictured in the gospels stands within the prophetic tradition of announcing the saving power of God active in human history here and now. Especially in Luke's gospel Jesus is portrayed as proclaiming "good news" in contrast to John the Baptist's call for repentance in the face of the coming disaster of the end of time. The salvation of God is already at hand in the person of Jesus—as the "signs of the kingdom" reveal: the blind see, captives are set free, prisoners are released, and the poor hear good news proclaimed (cf. Luke 4). In the parables he preached in word and deed as well as in the parable he was, Jesus reinterpreted the living tradition of faith handed on to him in his Jewish tradition and in the scriptures, and announced the unlimited compassion and forgiveness of the God he knew as Abba. The proclamation and manifestation of that mystery of salvation called forth a response of gratitude and conversion to a life of discipleship on the part of those who heard and believed.

Recent studies have linked the Matthean and particularly the Johannine Jesus with the figure of Wisdom, the prophetic street preacher from the book of Proverbs who proclaims God's message of reproach and promise in the market place, who reaches out her hand to the needy, who clings to truth, decides for justice, and orders all things rightly. Jesus enfleshed the word (dabar) of God that brings about what it signifies as well as the wisdom (sophia) of God who gathers her children around bread and wine at the eschatological banquet.

During the time of his ministry, Jesus gathered a band of disciples whom he sent to proclaim the good news of salvation trusting in the power of the Holy Spirit and the fidelity of the God of their ancestors. After the experience of the death and resurrection of Jesus, the apostolic proclamation of God's fidelity and promise centered on what God had done in Jesus. Jesus, the messenger of salvation, became the message. Early Christian preaching as described in the Acts of the Apostles drew on both the story of Israel and the story of Jesus to testify to God's fidelity in the past, God's power in the present, and God's promise for the future. The apostolic preaching events also included healings, exorcisms, and other manifestations of the power of the name of Jesus and the presence of his Spirit. The proclamation of the gospel identified by Paul as "the power of God for salvation" was in itself a call to conversion (metanoia)—radical turning away from sin towards the God of Jesus; hence the call to baptism as incorporation into the community of the church, the body of Christ. Paul, who describes his life's vocation as "a compulsion to preach" summarizes the impact of the preaching of the word of God on both preachers and hearers: "Our preaching of the gospel proved not a mere matter of words for you but one of power; it was carried on in the Holy Spirit and out of complete conviction . . . while still among you we acted on your behalf. You, in turn, became imitators of us and of the Lord, receiving the word despite great trials, with the joy that comes from the Holy Spirit" (1 Thess 1:5-6).

In the early church a variety of ministries of the word were exercised by male and female prophets, teachers, and apostles within diverse local communities. By mid-2nd century there is evidence (in the First Apology of Justin Martyr) of liturgical preaching (the homily) as an integral part of the Christian eucharist. While the ministries of preaching and teaching were not sharply distinguished since both were directed toward drawing others more deeply into the mystery of faith in Christ Jesus, eventually the issue of false prophecy/teaching emerged. Concern that the authentic tradition and not "some other gospel" be handed on resulted in a growing emphasis on bishops as the official preachers/teachers of the faith, although gifted and educated lay preachers such as Origen, head of the catechetical school at Alexandria, were known to preach even in the liturgical assembly.

Since the theologians of the early church were both preachers and pastors, their sermons and writings on preaching provide a rich source for a theology of preaching. The sermon was integrally linked to both scripture and sacrament reflecting a profound theology of the word of God as revealed pre-eminently in Christ (hence the predominance of christological interpretations of even the Hebrew Scriptures); but also in the Sacred Scriptures and in the community of faith and worship. Mystagogical preaching emphasized that the sacraments continue in the present the great works of God recorded in the scriptures, or as Leo the Great expressed it: those things which were conspicuous in the life of our Redeemer here pass over into the worship of the church (Sermon 74, 2).

Preaching in the early church was rooted in a pastoral approach to theology that involved an integration of the study of scripture, prayer and spirituality, and the use of human reason in the kind of search for wisdom that led ultimately to a contemplative union with God. Since wisdom was viewed as both practical and theoretical, the link between pastoral care and preaching was also clearly evident. Gregory the Great, for example, in his Pastoral Care, gives advice on how to preach to 36 different types of people and Augustine in On Christian Doctrine proposes as the hermeneutical key for the interpretation of any scripture passage the core of the gospel: love of God and love of neighbor.

Seeing themselves as essentially interpreters of the word of God in diverse human and ecclesial situations, the early Christian preachers plumbed the literal meaning of the scriptures in search of a deeper "spiritual sense" (the sensus plenior intended by the Holy Spirit). Convinced that the same Holy Spirit who inspired the authors of scripture continued to inspire the church in their day, they probed for patterns of promise and fulfillment in typological and allegorical interpretations of the scriptures that opened up hope in God's continued fidelity in the struggles of their own time.

Emphasizing that it is the word of God who speaks through the mouths of preachers, Augustine spoke of Christ as the primary preacher/teacher of the mystical body: "It is Christ who teaches; his pulpit is in heaven . . . and his school is on earth, and the school is his (mystical) body" (Sermo de disciplina christiana, ML 40, col. 678). Augustine further provides the basis for later sacramental theologies of preaching in writing of the sacrament as the verbum visibile (visible word) and preaching as the sacramentum audibile (audible sacrament). The role of the preacher or catechist was to interpret the "signs" or footprints of the Trinity that are to be found throughout creation and history and in particular in salvation history culminating in Christ. For such a task rhetoric is helpful (hence the guide to homiletics in Book IV of On Christian Doctrine), but wisdom is essential.

While early medieval preaching (e.g., Bernard of Clairvaux) remained pastoral and mystical in tone, the eventual shift of theology to the university context during the medieval period resulted in more formal commentaries complete with definitions, divisions, and arguments aimed at teaching university students to penetrate the literal meaning of the text in such a way as to discover the deeper meaning of the biblical symbols. Preachers were to comment on the spiritual senses of scripture in a way that exhorted their hearers to live a more faithful Christian life, or as Alan of Lille suggested "to offer instruction in matters of faith and behavior" (The Art of Preaching, ch. 1). Lay preaching bands committed to intense living of the apostolic life (vita apostolica) were officially permitted to preach words of exhortation, but not doctrine concerning faith and sacraments since the latter presumed knowledge of scripture and theology.

The medieval understanding of preaching remained grounded in the early Christian theology of the word as sacrament and ultimately in the mystery of the incarnation: in the divine economy all of creation and in a unique way every word of scripture speaks of Christ (cf. Hugh of St. Victor's De verbo Dei and the sermons of Bonaventure). The trinitarian foundation of Aquinas' understanding of preaching is evident in his explanation that conversion requires a twofold action of God: the inner word of grace (the anointing of the Holy Spirit) and the outer word of the preacher (S. Th. II-II, q. 1, a. 4., ad 4; q. 6, a. 1; q. 2, a. 9, ad 3). Within the context of his discussion of prophecy, Aquinas describes a "grace of speech" that enables one not only to instruct the intellect, but also to move the affection so that others willingly hear the word of God, and may love what is signified by the words and want to fulfill what is urged (S. Th. II-II, q. 177, a. 1, reply).

The continued emphasis that in preaching it is the word of God—and not some human word—that is communicated was expressed in images of preachers as the channels through which the voice of God passes, tongues in which God speaks, cases that contain the seed of the sower God, or interpreters and instruments of God, culminating in Aquinas's scholastic terminology: God is the principal cause of preaching, while the apostles and all preachers are the instrumental cause through which God preaches (In Ep. I ad. Thess., c. 2, lect. 2). In the polemical context of the Reformation, however, in order to defend the validity and necessity of the sacraments against adversaries who emphasized the power of the preached word, most scholastic theologians began to make a new distinction: the principal cause in preaching is a human cause, while the principal cause in the sacraments is God; therefore, only the sacraments can be said to "confer grace." Disputes about the efficacy of preaching (preaching brings about faith, but not sanctifying grace) and the relationship between the sacraments and preaching (preaching is not an eighth sacrament) dominated theological writings about preaching well into the 20th century. Creative resolution of the impasse required broader understandings of sacramentality, grace, faith, symbolic causality, word as symbol, and sacraments as "words of the church" to be developed later by Karl Rahner and others.

Vatican II Shifts: Implications for Preaching

The liturgical reforms of the Second Vatican Council combined with fundamental shifts in ecclesiology and theology of revelation provided new foundations on which to build a theology of preaching. The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy emphasized the active role of the gathered assembly in the entire liturgical celebration, described preaching as a call to faith and conversion (S.C., 9; cf. Rom 10:14-15), and highlighted the intimate connection of word and sacrament speaking of the "real presence" of Christ not only in the consecrated bread and wine, but in the gathered community and the proclaimed word as well (S.C., 7). Now explicitly claimed as an act of worship—"part of the liturgy itself" (S.C., 35, 52)—the homily is described in terms of ancient liturgical homilies: "the proclamation of God's wonderful words in the history of salvation, that is, the mystery of Christ, which is ever made present and active within us, especially in the celebration of the liturgy" (S.C., 35). Since faith is born of the word and nourished by it, the preached word is an essential part of the celebration of the sacraments (P.O., 4). While the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy emphasized that the homily was to be drawn from scriptural and liturgical texts of the day (S.C., 35), the Decree on the Life and Ministry of Priests highlighted a second essential dimension of the homily—the necessity that it "apply to concrete circumstances of life and particular needs of hearers" (P.O., 4).

The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church underscored that the priestly people of God form the church—the body of Christ is made up of all the baptized. Emphasizing the primacy of preaching in the mission of the church (L.G., 17; cf. A.G., 3) it both restored the primary importance of preaching in the ministries of bishop and priest (L.G., 25, 28; C.D., 12; P.O., 4) and provided the ecclesiological foundations for the active role of all the baptized in the preaching mission of the entire body of Christ as called for in other documents of the council (A.A., 2; G.S., 41).

The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation's move away from the pro-positional notion of revelation that had predominated in Roman Catholic theology since Vatican I toward a sacramental and trinitarian approach to a theology of revelation centered on the word of God demanded rethinking of earlier approaches to a theology of preaching as doctrinal explanation of the mysteries of faith. The mystery of revelation is ultimately the mystery of God's self-communication to humanity in the interrelationship of word and deed through all of creation and human history, climaxing in salvation history and culminating in Christ who is the Word made flesh. That one mystery of the Word of God has been entrusted to the "entire church in union with its shepherds" (D.V., 10) and is to be handed on in every age and culture. The return to the early Christian understanding of tradition as the transmission of the one mystery of faith, the word of God, provides a context for understanding preaching as a fundamental mode of the transmission of the gospel. The opening quotation of the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation suggests the pattern of the entire revelatory process which continues in the mystery of preaching. "What we have seen and have heard we announce to you. . ." (1 Jn 1:2-3).

Taking a new stance in terms of the post-Reformation separation of word and sacrament, the Constitution on Divine Revelation insisted that "The Church has always venerated the divine Scriptures just as she venerates the body of the Lord . . .; all preaching of the Church must be nourished and ruled by sacred scripture" (D.V., 21). While the concern has been raised in recent years about the role of doctrinal preaching in the Catholic tradition, as Gerard Sloyan has noted, true biblical and liturgical preaching does communicate the doctrinal tradition of the church, but in the mystagogical mode appropriate to liturgical celebrating ("Is Church Teaching Neglected When the Lectionary is Preached?" Worship 61 [1987]: 126-40).

Contemporary Theological Resources

Vatican II's recognition and encouragement of biblical scholarship bore fruit in a number of biblical resources on the power of the proclaimed word along with studies of the prophets and apostles as preachers. The recovery of the liturgical context of preaching further contributed to a renewed theology of word and sacrament. Still a specifically theological understanding of the preaching event in light of post-Vatican II theological perspectives has not yet been fully developed. From an ecumenical perspective, Karl Barth and the new hermeneutic (word-event) theologians (notably E. Fuchs, G. Ebeling) have made major contributions toward a fuller understanding of the power of the proclaimed word, yet the underlying understanding of theological anthropology in both cases remains decidedly negative: the image of God has been destroyed or fundamentally distorted in human beings as a result of sin; neither can grace be viewed as a radical transformation of the human person. Hence the theology of preaching that emerges from the Reformation traditions remains a law-gospel approach to sinful human beings who are nevertheless redeemed in Jesus Christ (cf. Richard Lischer, A Theology of Preaching (Nashville: Abingdon, 1981).

Drawing on the resources of the later Heidegger as did the new hermeneutic theologians, but with a typically Catholic emphasis on creation and human existence as graced, Karl Rahner wrote powerfully of the word as symbol and of the event character of "grace come to Word." While he did not develop a systematic theology of preaching, numerous essays in his Theological Investigations (notably "Priest and Poet," Vol. III, and "Word and Eucharist," Vol. IV) suggest an approach to the proclaimed word as sacrament in which grace (i.e., God's offer of self-communication) is embodied in the explicitness of word. The preacher names the depth dimension of the mystery of human existence as God's self-offer and thus draws the hearers of the word into a deeper relationship with God. Like all free personal self-communication, grace requires the word to re-veal (un-veil) definitively the offer of relationship. This explicit, social, historical mediation of grace is necessary precisely because human beings are constituted as body-spirit (spirit-in-the-world) and the spiritual (or transcendental/depth) dimension of human existence can be experienced only insofar as it is mediated. God's self-offer which has remained anonymous/ambiguous throughout creation and human history became definitive and irrevocable in the incarnation when the word became flesh in Jesus Christ. The trinitarian foundations of a theology of preaching according to Rahner are evident here: the one God who freely chooses to go out of self in relationship with humanity is made known in the depths of the human heart (in/through the Spirit) and in the concreteness of human history (in the incarnation of the word in Jesus).

Just as the church is called to be the abiding presence in the world of the primal sacramental word of definitive grace which is Christ, preaching and the sacraments function as the self-expression of the church, naming, proclaiming, and celebrating the deepest truth at the heart of reality: God's self-offer in love. In this incarnational/sacramental view of reality, the interdependence of, rather than the distinctions between, word and sacrament are emphasized. Basically Rahner develops Augustine's insight that a sacrament is a "visible word" and the proclaimed word is an "audible sacrament." All the words of the church, and preaching in a particular way, are oriented toward the sacraments and specifically toward the eucharist, "the highest word of the church" in which the church locates its deepest identity in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

Reflecting further on preaching as a means of mediating God's word to human beings and a distinct form of address, William J. Hill has emphasized that the purpose of preaching is to arouse the response of faith and conversion of life ("surrender to the unconditional claims of God"). As God's offer of salvation/reconciliation, the proclaimed word is itself a saving word since the proclamatory act achieves symbolically (through the mediation of meaning) the actual encounter with the living word of God. In the preaching event, it is not the preacher, but the word of God that confronts the hearers and makes an unconditional summons to conversion. Taking the NT preachers as models, Hill suggests that the task of the preacher is to render salvation history present and operative in the world today. Yet this process of "kerygmatic reinterpretation" of texts and events from the past history of our faith tradition is not possible except from the perspective of our contemporary cultural milieu. New questions and experiences on the part of the preacher and the community of faith will elicit dimensions of the text not previously recognized—a genuinely new word.

This kerygmatic reinterpretation requires both personal conversion and serious theological reflection on the part of the preacher. Drawing on the resources of Bernard Lonergan, Hill observes that preaching can be viewed as "a moment" in the theological process in which the preacher attempts to discern the meaning God intends and the human response required in this new 20th-century context based on the normative expression of God's word located in the NT read in the church. Thus meaning "incarnates itself" in the words and deeds of the preacher. The word inaugurates conversion in both preacher and community. The preacher mediates God's meaning in a way that constitutes the preacher as one enabled to announce the message of Christ and through this shared meaning the community is constituted as "the place where the word takes root."

Edward Schillebeeckx' recent contributions toward a theology of revelation made yet a further contribution towards a contemporary theology of preaching. Moving beyond his earlier distinction of revelation-in-reality from revelation-in-word, Schillebeeckx now emphasizes that there is no uninterpreted experience and that revelation occurs only within human experience, although the two cannot be identified. Arguing that all experience has a narrative structure (occurs in the context of a tradition that provides a framework for interpretation), Schillebeeckx claims that the question of whether faith comes from hearing (Rom 10:17) or faith begins with experience is a false dilemma. The Christian story originated as an experience of salvation in Jesus. Now as an explicit message the Christian story offers a new possibility of life experience to all who hear and follow.

The new insight that comes to the fore here is that the "good news of salvation" which the preacher is called to announce is not only the past history of God's fidelity as recorded in the scriptures but also the present workings of God's Spirit in ordinary human life. The preacher's task is to interpret the human story in light of the story of Jesus or conversely, to tell the Christian story in such a way that people can recognize the experience of grace—God's presence—in their everyday lives.

Further, Schillebeeckx along with contemporary liberation theologians emphasizes that the "good news" to be announced in the proclamation of the gospel is for most people of the world today in the context of radical suffering, a "liberating grace" (L. Boff) that is discovered only "on the underside" of their experience and in eschatological hope. If the Christian community is to announce that hope they can do so only after listening to people's concrete experience until it "yields an echo of the gospel" and then retelling the story of Jesus in deed as well as word. The narrative that the Christian community proclaims is a "dangerous memory" (Metz) that calls for conversion at the level of political action as well as inner heart. While the preacher speaks in the name of the community, the whole community is involved in "retelling the story of Jesus" that requires ultimately the "writing of a fifth gospel with our lives." Preaching remains the announcing of the good news of salvation proclaimed in the scriptures in a way that draws people more deeply into the living of the Christian life, but Schillebeeckx and other contemporary theologians expand our understanding of what salvation is, where it is to be discovered, how and by whom this good news is to be proclaimed, and what conversion will require.

PRESBYTER

In Roman Catholic church order (L.G., 28), and in many other Christian churches, the presbyter is co-worker with the bishop in ministry to the local church, and the presbyteral ministry is in fact an extension of the episcopal ministry.

Presbyters, therefore, likewise embody the threefold ministry of Christ: to teach, to lead in prayer, and pastorally to govern the church. Presbyters who are local pastors in fact present and represent the episcopus to their local assembly, and serve as such in communion with both the bishop and all other pastors in the diocese. Presbyters, in this communion, form with the bishop a "unique sacerdotal college" (ibid.) and provide in the many faces of their ministry the many faces of the priesthood of Christ. The Roman Catholic ordination rite reminds the presbyter that the ministry assigned is to "teach in the name of Christ," to "sanctify in the power of Christ," and to share "in the work of Christ"; presbyters should "seek to bring the faithful together in a unified family and to lead them effectively, through Christ and in the Holy Spirit, to God the Father" (Homily-instruction).

PRESENCE, PASTORAL

This article treats first the prerequisites of pastoral presence, and then a variety of forms or types this presence may take.

Prerequisites

In the Christian tradition pastoral presence has always been seen as a continuation of the ministry of Jesus through the inspiration of the Spirit. For one person, therefore, to be pastorally present to another presupposes a conscious faith in the risen Christ who is always actively available to those who believe in him. The desire to demonstrate the love of Christ by offering care and concern for an individual is the starting point of any type of pastoral presence. One's intention then is to act not just in his or her own name but in the name of Jesus Christ.

More specifically, the ongoing ministry of Jesus through pastoral presence is based on the gift of compassion, the same attitude that allowed Jesus' heart to be touched by the joys and sorrows of everyone he encountered. Compassion is the ability to enter somewhat into the experience of another and to respond with actions or words that communicate authentic concern. To be compassionate toward another person means that, like the Good Samaritan, a disciple of Christ opens his heart to the plight of a sister or brother and reaches out positively to offer assistance. Without compassion there is no truly Christian pastoral presence.

In most circumstances, however, compassion needs to be supplemented by skills and training in order to enhance the quality of pastoral presence. Some of these skills and training include the capacity for listening attentively, intellectual understanding of the dynamics of faith, a practical knowledge of the psychology of the human person, a flexibility in communicating effectively and a facility for reflecting productively on one's experience. Depending on the type of pastoral presence, the necessary skills and training can be acquired through informal or formal pastoral education. Usually Christians who wish to be as effective as possible in their pastoral presence require some professional guidance by those who are more experienced. Learning to respond pastorally often involves the art of compassion that is honed by both practical skills and competent direction.

Recognition by the community of faith is also needed to validate an individual's pastoral presence to others. Whether through ordination, religious profession or lay missioning, the personal identity of Christians who offer pastoral presence must be confirmed by some form of public acknowledgement and acceptance. Acting as representatives of the community of believers and not just as individuals allows pastoral ministers to situate their presence in the context of the church's mission and speaks to the recipients of the whole community's pastoral care for them. Finding creative rituals for commissioning pastoral ministers, especially the non-ordained, and providing for their support and encouragement represents an important challenge for local churches today.

In addition to the desire to participate in the pastoral ministry of Christ, to the gift of compassion, to acquired skills and training, and to validation by the faith community, Christians who offer pastoral presence benefit greatly from regular supervision. Either with one other person or in a group setting, pastoral ministers need opportunities to reflect aloud about their experience, to clarify their feelings and insights, and to become revitalized to continue their involvements. Many people who receive such supervision also value the chance to pray with other pastoral care-givers, invoking the Spirit's help and blessing on their efforts. Without some sort of regular supervision it is easy for pastoral ministers to become overburdened and isolated, resulting eventually in withdrawing emotionally from those who need their pastoring and sometimes from the ministry itself. The quality of pastoral presence often depends on good supervision.

Types of Pastoral Presence

Liturgical forms of pastoral presence are very varied. Celebrations of the sacraments, particularly when they are tailored to the needs of the participants, individual or communal prayers with or for those receiving pastoral care, selective readings from scripture, the use of music and dance to communicate one's deeper feelings to God, symbols, such as candles, incense, and water, which help create an atmosphere for prayer and reflection—all of these liturgical expressions are attempts to render the presence and love of God more palpable. Every liturgical celebration can be an opportunity to highlight the pastoral ministry of Jesus if it calls attention to and evokes in the participants a personal encounter with God and with one another. In leading or facilitating liturgies that are truly pastoral, therefore, a ministering person has to be aware of the specific struggles and hopes of all those who participate and try to use the words, symbols, and gestures to help people experience God's loving care.

Counseling is another valuable type of pastoral presence, especially when it includes exploring one's relationship with God, as well as intrapersonal and interpersonal dynamics. Individual psychotherapy, marriage counseling and group therapy are examples of methods that seek deeper self-knowledge and adaptive behavior; they become forms of pastoral presence when the counselor is identified as a person in ministry and when the counselor encourages the discussion of the dimension of faith. Spiritual direction, one specific mode of pastoral counseling, focuses on that faith relationship with God as it affects all the aspects of a person's life and vice versa. Whether counseling involves one session or many, the goal usually is to help an individual achieve a more satisfying sense of self in relationship with others. A pastoral counselor operates from the premise that a person's relationships with self, with others and with God are interconnected.

Education can likewise be a form of pastoral presence when its aim is to assist people to discover how God wants them to live. Sometimes education encompasses direct study of God and God's revelation; at other times the subject relates more to humanity itself with implicit attention to one's relationship with God. Frequently education becomes pastoral when the teacher is viewed as engaging in ministry; the contours of the teacher/student relationship are attempts to mirror the love of God and to guide the students toward understanding and choosing a way of living that is pleasing to God. Education becomes most pastoral when it provides students, whether children or adults, with the knowledge and skills to discern God's Spirit at work in their lives.

Companionship frequently represents a form of pastoral presence when the expectation centers not so much on accomplishing a task but on being with another person(s). In hospitals and nursing homes, with prisoners and addicted individuals, at parties and dinners, in silence or in conversation, pastoral companionship looks toward the nature of the presence of one person to another. A recognition that someone offers presence in the name of Christ and of the church is often sufficient to make the companionship pastoral. While this companionship is neither formal counseling nor task-oriented, it remains open-ended enough to include moments of socializing, listening, and discussing dilemmas of faith. More often than not it is the way in which a ministering person is present that makes this companionship truly pastoral.

Recently another form of pastoral presence has been emerging: a structural approach to ministry that seeks to change unjust procedures and systems and laws. Anyone who participates in pastoral ministry even for a short time becomes keenly aware of the structures in society that oppress people, particularly the most powerless. Some ministering people chose to devote much of their time and energy trying to change these unjust structures in order to assure greater fairness and compassion for those who are most in need, economically, socially and emotionally. It may be in courtrooms, state houses or city halls, with advocacy groups or lobbying personnel, by peaceful demonstration or civil disobedience, through letter-writing campaigns or speaking out to the media that pastoral ministers are found boldly defending the rights of those victims of inhuman and unjust policy and attitudes. Their courageous voices summon all pastoral ministers to make working for justice a part of their presence to God's people.

Conclusion

In a very real sense all Christians are invited and even commanded by Jesus to be pastorally present to one another. Any and every interpersonal encounter holds possibilities for revealing the love of Christ alive and active in our relationships and in our world. Learning how to respond pastorally to others depends primarily on our ability to appreciate how we have received valued and valuable pastoral presence ourselves.

PRESIDENTIAL STYLE

Presidential style refers very simply to the way in which the presiders of worship pray in the midst of the liturgical assembly. Because liturgy is ritual, that is, patterned symbolic activity, it requires leadership. To lead the liturgy, which is to lead the community in prayer, is a task assigned to public ministers, both lay and ordained. What is said of the style of prayer leadership refers to all liturgical ministers such as lectors, cantors, and communion ministers. In an ecclesial climate where liturgy no longer equals rubric more is demanded of the liturgical minister than fidelity to the required gestures and sequence of prayers. Such competence now is but the basic point of departure for adequate style in presiding, much in the same way as technical proficiency at the keyboard is but the starting point for the musicianship of the pianist.

The change in the practice of presiding is primarily one of quality of style. What at one time was considered a virtue, namely, an impersonal manner of relating to the congregation, is now a serious deficiency to be eschewed. Because liturgy is now understood to intersect with ordinary human experience and is not to be divorced from daily life, the expectation is that the presider will promote that connection by a more personal manner of leadership. Rather than adopting an overly objective stance before the congregation, presiders are expected to be transparent in what they believe about the actions they are performing.

The desired more personal style of the presider is not reducible to just a friendly way of celebrating. Such friendliness, especially when it suggests artificiality, can place the leader of worship outside of the ritual context in isolation from the praying community. The most fundamental meaning of this more personal style is that it must be obvious to the worshippers that their leader is really praying, not in front of them, but in their midst. For only when the presider is part of the primary symbol of the liturgy, that is, the gathered assembly, can full participation of all be fostered by creating a sense of community and an experience of genuine prayer. But because this more prayerful and personal style of leading worship is not easily delineated in terms of strict rules such as the liturgical legislation of former times, only general observations can be proposed which would be true in most cases. These more open ended guidelines might well be summarized under the phrase, "celebrational presence."

The presider manifests a committed and transparent faith. Unless personal commitment to the belief system and symbolic structure of Christianity is evident in the way the leader of worship functions in the liturgy, all else is pointless. The most fundamental experience upon which any summoning of the assembly to prayer is based is the personal commitment that the gospel and the liturgy are indispensable for the life of the Christian. This commitment will be most clearly manifested in the prayerful attitude of the presider. It means that the leader must manifest a faith in God at all times in the liturgy, even when humanly speaking the assembly does not seem to be responsive.

In order to radiate a faith appropriate to good liturgy, the presider needs to communicate: 1) that the God being worshipped cares for humankind, 2) that the paschal mystery, the coming, dying, rising, and returning of Jesus Christ is real and able to be experienced, 3) that salvation history is being accomplished now in the concrete present moment, and 4) that what God did once and for all in Jesus Christ is now continued through the sacramental life of the church. Such a presider is able through genuine and manifest prayer to teach the worshippers how their love of God must move into the areas of social concern, how the Kingdom of God can and is being accomplished in their own time, and how the bringing about this Kingdom should be characterized by a thrust into the future as well as an attitude of openness to the present. Many of the techniques of good prayer leadership are simply ways of letting one's faith show through unambiguously.

One way in which the presider's own faith comes through clearly in a liturgical celebration is the acknowledgement that s/he experiences doubt and ambiguity in the area of belief, whether it be central affirmations of the biblical tradition or specific teachings of the church. It would be a mistake for the presider to engage in agonizing soul-searching in front of the congregation, but on the other hand presiders should not attempt to establish an objective atmosphere of faith which is not grounded in their own commitment. In preaching it is important that the presider deal with the doubts and questions of the congregation honestly.

It is unfortunate but true that at times presiders and preachers continue to function liturgically after their own faith commitment has vanished. It is imperative that such a situation be remedied by church leadership as soon as possible.

The presider places a high value on personal communication, respect for others, and the principle of subsidiarity. This guideline begins with the basics of human communication. Can the priest, the lector, the cantor be heard? Audibility is a necessity, not a luxury. Audibility relates intimately to effective proclamation. The latter presumes proper preparation and adequate understanding of what is to be proclaimed. The congregation has the right to hear. It is the responsibility of the presiders to transform texts and sounds into living prayer that become the transforming expression of the community. This cannot be done without practice beforehand.

Communication in liturgical presidency takes on the forms of reading, preaching, and proclaiming. All readers need to be acquainted with the many liturgical aids for lectors that are available. There are some general practical suggestions to be followed: read the text several times beforehand; act as if the congregation does not have the texts in printed form before them; clearly pronounce obscure names and words; never read while the congregation is moving; create the climate for the reading; make affective use of the pause; be aware of the acoustics of the building; and maintain poise. Readers are called upon to be good storytellers in the liturgy.

Preachers are advised to take to heart the following suggestions: do not use "canned" homilies; do not read from a text; be concise; maintain poise; be direct and clear; avoid religious jargon or a "preacher's tone"; and do not speak in a complicated fashion. Storytelling in the homily is not for the purpose of illustrating a point, but it is an integral part of the way a homily preaches. In proclaiming specific parts of the liturgy, presiders should be aware of the different styles of liturgical language, e.g., greetings, prayers, invitations, the eucharistic prayer, and prayers which are to be silent. In proclaiming it is especially important that attention carefully be paid to how words and gestures go together. Presiders must become fully human in word and in action.

Respect for others can be shown in many ways. There are the obvious attributes of the respectful presider: warm and friendly, modest about self, positive in dealing with others, dignified in bearing, and confident in the ministry. All these will put the worshipper at ease. These qualities are especially demanded of priests because they can assist them in their role of bringing the other liturgical ministries together in a unified way. A less obvious characteristic of presiders who respect others is their good taste. Sensitivity to what is liturgically appropriate will prevent a trivialization of the liturgy and so of the worshipper. Presiders who are familiar with poetry or other art forms have an opportunity to open up the symbols for the assembly. This is a high form of respect for others. Presiders who train their aesthetic sensitivity will be less tempted to explain the symbols of the liturgy. Finally, presidential style of any minister will be only as good as the attention of the minister. Attention to the liturgical deed and to the assembly itself is one of the chief ways of attaining that presence upon which good liturgical leadership is based.

The principle of subsidiarity here means that while the presider has responsibility for the overall rhythm and dynamic of the liturgy, s/he achieves this end through the proper facilitation of the other liturgical ministers in their respective roles. The requirements of subsidiarity are not fulfilled through the careful observation of the rubrics alone. Whatever will promote the full awareness and active engagement of the assembly falls within the domain of the subsidiarity. Subsidiarity is the concrete effect of responsibility to the community rather than only to the law. It means in the area of liturgical planning that the priest will be an equal participant in the process of preparation, will not pre-empt the judgment of others, especially those with special competence, will manifest an abiding attitude of flexibility, will be noted for a care for the quality of worship, and will be at home with the symbols.

The presider is a person of the church, a bearer of the Christian tradition, and a leader of prayer. Presiders, of whatever kind, perform a public office in the church. This has certain implications for the manner in which they lead the congregation in prayer. On the one hand they are called to embody the faith of the local congregation so that it will be enlivened and enhanced. On the other hand, they represent the local leader of liturgy in the diocese, the bishop, as well as the larger church. They are not free to conduct themselves as private individuals in the course of worship. That means that they demonstrate a respect for liturgical procedure and etiquette, but even more it demands that they do not pray merely as individuals. It would be inappropriate for presiders to give the impression that they are praying in front of the congregation rather than in the midst of the congregation. For instance, the manner in which the person presides at the eucharistic liturgy is not simply a matter between him/her and God. The purpose of presiding at the eucharist is to help create an ecclesial experience of union with God through the ritual. Since the liturgy is the expression of the church, establishing its identity in Christ through the ritual experience, the priest must also act in dialogue with the congregation and the other liturgical ministers so that it is the faith of the church and not one's own individual faith which is being brought to symbolic articulation. Leading people in prayer is creating a space where people can enter into the presence of their God as community, and recall the depths of that relationship.

Presiders, as bearers of tradition, do not unthinkingly accept the past. Nor do they presume that all ancient symbols are meaningless. To communicate the tradition of the church is to search for the depth of the Christian life and inspire others in that same dimension. One cannot preside well if one "presides" over the destruction of one's symbol system. One brings the tradition to the assembly in one's preaching of the word of God by interpreting what has been handed down in the liturgical texts and structures and by imaginatively recreating in any particular liturgy the experience of the church at prayer throughout its history. One does not bear the tradition by becoming authoritarian or bureaucratic. The president of the assembly is truly traditional when s/he bears self in a Christ-like way through posture, walk, dignity, personal humility, and freeing gestures. One is not traditional if one is embarrassed by the wearing of vestments or if one pays more attention to the physical elements (e.g., book, bread, wine) than to the members of the congregation.

The role and style of liturgical presiding is rooted in the personal experience of God of the one presiding. In good ritual there is a two-fold structure which requires presiders to assume the role of the person of faith at the same time that they are aware of their limitations in believing. However, the leader of worship cannot be play-acting in the sense that what is done in the rite is only loosely connected to the personal life. As a person of prayer, the presider must be one who is pervaded, if not overwhelmed, by the presence of God. Authenticity here does not imply that one forces one's spiritual life to fit the texts of the liturgy, but it does demand that in the action of presiding the congregation senses here, not a person self-conscious about role, but one who lets God shine through in all actions, words, and bodily movements.

The presider ritualizes and symbolizes in an embodied way. The spirituality of the church is enfleshed in the liturgy. By means of patterned symbolic activity, that ritual called Christian liturgy becomes the place where the visible and invisible meet. The celebration of the imperceptible reality of Jesus Christ takes place through perceptible liturgical symbols. The way these symbols are handled, dealt with, and performed matters immensely to the quality of the celebration and makes a difference regarding the manifestation of that imperceptible paschal mystery. The presider is the one most called upon to coordinate those symbols into a unified experience of ritual. Moreover, the presider is a liturgical symbol also. Therefore, how s/he performs symbolically and conducts others through the symbol system of Christian worship is of primary importance. Liturgy does not work on its own. The phrase ex opere operato implies that the embodiment of worship is of tremendous concern. Good liturgy depends upon good presidential style.

The most difficult of the many challenges that confront presiders today is that of befriending the body. While the notion that the body is the manifestation of the spirit flows logically from the incarnational character of Christianity, in fact the mind/body dualism has been more characteristic. But listening to bodily experience need not be in competition with rationality and discursive thinking. Rather the body through its language of movement and gesture can make our lives fuller epiphanies of God and so more sacramental. However, if we consider the body a foe, as many presiders seem to do, we experience a separation from our body which automatically separates us from others. For the presider whose vocation is to bring symbols together in the formation of community, such separation can render him/her dysfunctional.

Befriending the body is not to be confused with the cultural pursuit of the body beautiful. While the contemporary practices for obtaining health and fitness can be appropriate for the presider to gain a more holistic sense of self, the purpose would not be to conform to fashion trends, but to rediscover the body sacramental.

The experience of the body sacramental is the antithesis of the kind of dualism which has found its way into Christian spirituality. In achieving wholeness through awareness of one's body, presiders can experience their whole self as the place of God's presence. In their bodiliness and sensuality these leaders of worship celebrate the glory of ongoing creation and the unity which all have in Christ. Presiders are those who tell the story of the paschal mystery in the liturgy. By attending to themselves as bodies, and getting to know themselves as bodies, they are able to let the story of Jesus Christ come to light by means of their own story which may have remained hidden had they maintained the body/mind division in themselves. When one does exercises aimed at getting in touch with one's body and when they are done in the context of one's relationship with God, they become examples of what can be called body praise. The presider who has been healed in this way and on this level will be qualified to lead the Christian community in praise of its God, which is what liturgy is.

PRESIDING, MINISTRY OF

The title of this article is not "the ministry of celebrant." Many of our liturgical books (e.g., Sacramentary, R.C.I.A.) continue to use the term. It is both infelicitous and poor because it restricts the ministry of the presider to the cultic and it sets the presider over against, and in isolation from, the entire assembly which is the true celebrant in liturgical action.

The presider is a baptized person ordained to a pastoral office of service. The ministry of presiding is one of mediating the high priesthood of Jesus Christ in the midst of a priestly people. Thus the presider is charged with the task of animating, overseeing and ordering the gifts of the priestly people in order that the church might be built up in its life of holiness, in its ministries, and in its mission to herald the reign of God. Because of this leadership ministry in the midst of God's people, he presides at the eucharistic table where the church is most clearly visible as church (S.C., 7-10) and where the assembled body of Christ manifests its various gifts in offering the eucharist.

The ministry of presiding is not one of quasi-divinity, nor is it one of power personally residing in the person of the presider. It is one of service; its model is that of Jesus, shepherd and martyr. The origins of this ministry are not easy to trace in NT texts. The term "priest" is used to describe Christ and his church. While various gifts flourish, such as prophet and teacher, there is Pauline evidence that some kind of unifying ministry was needed in moments of conflict. The pastoral letters indicate overseeing ministries, but one would be chary to translate them into the current ministries of bishop, presbyter and deacon.

What does emerge as definable presidential ministry from the 2nd century onwards is due, in large measure, to the church's situation in the late ancient Roman Empire. P. Brown (The Making of Late Antiquity) points out that both Christian and Roman religious systems vied for allegiance. In the end, the question became: who is friend of God, who has access to the divine? For the Christian system, the martyr became imitator of Christ in the most graphic way possible. But also the bishop emerged as another heroic symbol of Christ, especially when local churches were beset with Roman persecution. Ignatius of Antioch not only articulated ecclesial unity, he also incarnated that by his martyrdom, a martyrdom expressed in eucharistic imagery (Ad Rom 4:1-2). Ignatius presided over the sacrifice of unity and he provided one of the most beautiful images for this role. "Consequently it is right for you to run together with the purpose of the bishop, which you indeed do; for your worthily reputed presbytery, worthy of God, is attuned to the bishop like strings to a cithara; therefore, in your concord and harmonious love, Jesus Christ is sung" (Ad Eph 4:1). H-M Legrand points out that presidency was not left to happenstance. The presider pastored the entire life of the church, was a symbol of and articulate spokesperson for its unity, and shepherded the church as it entered into mystery through its celebrations of initiation and eucharist. Justin indicated that the presider functioned by being present in the midst of the community and with its consent.

Cultic presidency required that the presider oversee the reading of the memoirs of the apostles and that the presider might offer the prayer of thanksgiving with skill, some spontaneity and according to a pattern that had assumed an oral shape. Irenaeus and Anicetus indicated that the bishop presided at the table. Tertullian indicated that the bishop presides at the table because he has care for the life of the community, not because of a sacerdotal quality. It is only with Hippolytus and Cyprian that presidency is expressed in terms of priesthood. The former noted that the bishop, presiding over the church by an ordination conferring apostolic charism, presides at the eucharist as high priest. The latter saw the bishop as both the bond of unity as he presided at the table and, as president, functioning as sacerdos symbolizing Christ, the high priest (summus sacerdos).

The presider was a type of Christ and functioned in imitation of Christ. The ministry shaped the presider so that he began to act with the inner intention of Christ, the holiness of Christ. As presider he also taught as Jesus did. If the bishop delegated this presidential role, the presbyter was also to be shaped in the spirit and style of Christ, the high priest. As J.D. Laurance has stated: "The power or authority of the sacerdos is based upon the same foundation as the authority found in the gloria of the martyr: the passio of Christ. . . . To the degree that the sacerdos individually (auctoritas) and as an office holder in the church (potestas) has power in the church, he has that power only by virtue of his imaging and therefore making present Christ in his saving deeds. . . ." There is for Cyprian no division among these titles regarding their ultimate significance. "One is episcopus, presbyter, or sacerdos only by virtue of representing the holiness of the church through representing the holiness of Christ's passio (gloria). This alone is the basis both for his holding office and for his authority" (Laurance, pp. 214-215).

Presidency might be extended to a vision as a mark of affection, respect and admiration for the visitor's charism. Presidency shared was a manifestation of ecclesial unity and hospitality. It eventually is a pastoral office that is delegated as the church moves beyond urban centers into the country regions of the empire.

In short, the picture of presidency is one of pastoral office which oversees the life of the local church, fosters its unity internally and with other ecclesial communities, functions sometimes to represent Christ (summus sacerdos), and acts to extend or deny eucharistic hospitality and charity. Later historical developments will sacerdotalize and clericalize the office, thereby swallowing up other cultic, charitable and diaconal ministries of service. The picture of the 2nd to 4th centuries is more germane and in harmony with contemporary readings of presidential ministry than its later developments.

Presiding Today

The ministry of presiding today requires that office holders in the church look to four areas for direction: theology, style based on praxis, ecumenicity, and lay leadership.

Theology. Those called forth to preside are called forth from an assembly, presented by the assembly to the bishops, and prayed for by the assembly. Ordination is "an act of Christ who is present in and as the assembled church, and who acts when and as the church itself acts" (Fink, p. 485). The presider serves among sisters and brothers called church. This is clear from the words of the bishop: "accept from the holy people of God the gifts to be offered to him." The presider acts in such a way that the assembled church invokes the Spirit, already present in the church, to act now in Bible proclamation and preaching, eucharist, initiation, reconciliation, anointing the sick, etc. The presider, as one who animates, oversees and orders the gifts of this priestly people in its life of holiness, its ministries and its mission, leads this assembly and calls it to prayer.

Both the priesthood of the ordained and the priesthood of the faithful manifest the one priesthood of Jesus Christ. The sacrament of Christ is embodied in the liturgical assembly and its activity. The ordained summon the faithful to go beyond what it is, to become more fully the church. Fink identifies this becoming as largeness. "It is because of this largeness of both gospel and eucharistic prayer that the ministers who proclaim them have come to be appointed by the college of bishops. . . . To serve the largeness of Christ and church the ministers themselves must manifest and be rooted in that largeness. The ordained . . . embody and manifest this largeness of Christ so that the assembly may see in someone living among them what they themselves are summoned to become. No one takes on this ministry by virtue of baptism which, by incorporating one into Christ, entitles one to be a member of the assembled church. Because such an embodiment involves a transformation and a mission this church once again in its prayer invokes the Spirit of God. The transformation is to be a sacrament of the ecclesial Christ; the mission is to exhibit in life, in action, and in the specific ministries which the church assigns, the identity and destiny of the church itself" (Fink, p. 491).

Therefore there is established a mutual relationship between the ordained presider and the assembly. Fink describes the relationship beautifully as mutual iconography. "The ordained person is commissioned to be an icon of the church in its identity as the sacrament of Christ. In the life and ministry of the ordained the church asks and expects to see a manifestation of its own identity and vocation. . . . The assembled church is itself the icon of the priest's identity and vocation" (Fink, p. 491). The ordained presider is called to listen and to call forth, to summon the church to be itself more fully. "The ordained embody in sacrament the as yet unfulfilled destiny of the entire church. The principal ministry of the ordained . . . is to activate and thus call forth the priesthood of the church" (Fink, p. 492). Both the priesthood of the ordained and the priesthood of the faithful rise and fall together.

Style Based on Praxis. The ministry of presiding will make great demands upon those ordained to serve in this way. It requires energy expended. In turn, the presider is energized by the assembled church in cult and its witness of holiness. What keeps one energized? One avenue, little explored to date, is to learn images that can energize. The following images are rooted in presidential action. The presider is mother. Anyone who takes a person out of the womb like waters of the font or who consoles those in grief knows what it means to be a mother in the mater ecclesia. The presider is mediator of story because he listens to others' stories of salvation, he is attentive to prayer text and biblical text, and is asked to be a wordsmith crafting homiletic and prayer word. The presider is medicine man because he is asked to console the sinner, comfort the afflicted, heal the wounded. The medicine man of the tribe attends to the power of ritual form and movement. He puts on and internalizes the affective sentiments and qualities of the rites. The presider is martyr because he is called to stretch if he is to embody what the assembled church is to become and because he witnesses how Christ touches the hearts of a people. Finally, the presider is a melodist because he sings, as voice of the assembly, the great deeds of God done in history and in this assembly.

Ecumenicity. Because other churches have admitted both men and women to this ministry at their tables, male presiders in Roman Catholic and Orthodox tradition will find themselves learning what women do in this ministry, how they preside and how they reflect on its meaning. An ordained female presider is going to function according to her rhythms and sensitivities as a woman. She is going to embody Christ and his priestly praying according to her charisms, her experience and even her vulnerability. What images energize her ministry might be a blessing in an all male presidential ministry.

Lay Leadership. Not only is the presider to animate and encourage the gifts and ministries of the assembly, but, more and more, the ordained presider will be called upon to share presidential ministry with lay leaders who likewise preside at public worship. This development will demand a cooperative and collaborative style, a sharing of prayer and insight, and a respect and reverence for lay presiders. In turn, the entire church, the priestly people, will be enriched and faithful to its life of holiness, its ministries and its mission to proclaim the reign of God.

PRIESTHOOD

In English the term priest connotes two distinct religious functions: (1) a cultic, or hieratic priesthood, which mediates the presence of God through ritual, especially through sacrifice, and (2) the oversight of the Christian community exercised by the presbyter/bishops in the NT and by their successors. As the structures of Christian ordained ministry evolved these two senses of the term blended theologically.

Among the pagan nations in the ancient Middle East, the hieratic priesthood played an important political function. In Mesopotamia and in Egypt, for example, the king secured the religious function of the cultic priest but in the expectation that the priestly caste would endow royal authority with religious sanction.

Among the Jewish patriarchs we find no evidence of a politicized hieratic priesthood. The Hebrew patriarchs who built altars and offered sacrifice (Gen 12:7 ff; 13:18; 22:31, 54; 26:25; 46:1) exercised instead a familial priesthood also common among the peoples of the ancient Middle East, a kind of priestly ministry which continued to shape Hebrew worship even after the emergence of the levitical cult (Judg 6:18-29; 13:19; 17:5; 1 Sam 7:1).

We do not know for certain whether the tribe of Levi exercised a hieratic function within Israel from the beginning or whether it acquired that function over time. Moses, called a priest only once in the OT (Ps 99:6), consecrated Aaron and his sons high priest (Exod 29:20-21; Lev 8:23-24). After the conquest of Canaan, however, levitical priests certainly presided over cult in sanctuaries throughout Israel in a way that paralleled and sought to replace Canaanite sanctuaries of pagan worship (Judg 17-18; 1 Sam 1-4; 22:9-23).

A number of historical events during the period of the Hebrew monarchy tied the levitical priesthood to the throne of David: David's transportation of the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem; his appointment of Abiathar and Zadok to preside over worship in the capital city (2 Sam 6:1-23; 8:17); Solomon's construction of the temple in Jerusalem in the 11th century B.C. (1 Kgs 6:1-14); and King Josiah's abolition of local shrines in 621 B.C. and centralization of all cult in Jerusalem.

In 587 B.C. the Babylonians deported the priestly class into exile along with the other inhabitants of Jerusalem, razed the temple and put a temporary end to its cult. In the post-exilic period, however, the Zadokite priestly aristocracy reasserted its control of temple worship. As a result of the political machinations of the Zadokite priesthood, the Hasmonean rulers of Israel ended its domination of temple cult by appointing their own priests. By the time of Jesus the high priesthood had degenerated into a political appointment with no claim of genealogical legitimacy.

Levitical priests functioned above all as men of the sanctuary. They offered sacrifices to God (Exod 29:38-42). Once a year the high priest functioned as supreme mediator between God and Israel by offering a sacrifice of atonement for the sins of the people (Lev 16:1-34). Priests also presided over rites of consecration and purification (1 Kgs 1:39; 2 Kgs 12:1-8; Lev 14:1-33). Until David's time priests delivered oracles through the use of the Urim and Thummim (1 Sam 14:36-42; 30:7-8; Deut 33:8). Finally, on feast days and at covenant renewals priests proclaimed and interpreted the Torah (Exodus 1-15; Joshua 2-6; Exodus 24:7; Deuteronomy 27; Nehemiah 8). The priestly caste supervised the final redaction of the Pentateuch, which after its proclamation by Ezra in 445 B.C. commanded obedience as sacred scripture and as law (Neh 8:1-18). Thereafter priests functioned as ordinary interpreters of the law until rabbinic teachers largely replaced them. By the time of Jesus the levitical priesthood functioned primarily as hieratic cult leaders.

Jesus did not belong to the tribe of Levi. Instead he exercised a ministry of teaching that combined rabbinic and prophetic elements. He gave rudimentary institutional shape to the religious movement he headed by choosing the twelve to function as judges of the New Israel he hoped to found (Mk 3:13-19; 10:28-31; Mt 10:1-4; 19:27-29; Lk 6:12-16; 18:24-27). Jesus also demanded of the twelve that they renounce the arrogance of pagan rulers and embrace the way of powerlessness in the image of a servant messiah (Mk 9:33-37; 10:17-20; 35-45; Mt 20:20-28; Lk 22:24-27; Jn 13:1-20). The twelve participated in Jesus' own charismatic authority to proclaim the kingdom by healing and casting out demons (Mk 6:7-13; 11:27-33; Mt 10:5, 8, 9-14; 21:23-27; Lk 9:1-6; 20:1-8).

Jesus called for the purification of temple worship (Mk 11:15-19; Mt 21:12-17; Lk 19:45-48; Jn 2:14-16) and prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem and its temple (Lk 19:41-44; 21:5-7; Jn 2:19; Mk 13:1-4; 14:20; Mt 24:1-3). In instituting the eucharist Jesus described his own impending death as a covenant sacrifice (Mk 14:22-25; Mt 26:26-29; Lk 22:15-20; 1 Cor 11:23-25).

The NT consistently portrayed the death of Jesus as either a covenant sacrifice or a sacrifice of atonement (1 Cor 5:7; 1 Pet 1:18; Rom 3:25; Gal 2:20; Eph 5:2). The letter to the Hebrews, however, transformed these cryptic allusions by proclaiming Jesus the supreme high priest of the new covenant. Unlike the levitical high priest who belonged to a religious power elite, the eternal Son of God became high priest first by the self-humiliation of becoming human and then, in his passion and obedient death, by identifying totally with humanity in its suffering and need. Jesus' glorification reveals the divine scope of his high-priestly authority (Heb 4:12-15; 5:1-6:20). A priest forever of the order of Melchizedek, Jesus through the single, eternally efficacious sacrifice of his death, through his eternal and efficacious intercession for us at the throne of God, and through the new eschatological future which his death and glorification began has ended once and for all any need for a hieratic levitical priesthood (Heb 7:11-28; 8:1-10:18).

Nowhere did the NT portray either the apostles or the presbyter/bishops who succeeded them as hieratic, sacrificing priests, although both 1 Peter and Revelation portray the Christian community as a whole as the priestly people of God (1 Pet 2:4-10; Rev 4:1-5:14; 14:1-5; 19:1-10). Indeed, in contrast to the levitical priest who belonged by ancestry to a religious power elite, the first leaders of the Christian community exercised a charismatic ministry of service and of oversight. Indeed, we discover in the apostolic church a variety of leadership ministries. In the post-apostolic church, however, with the emergence in the 2nd century of the monepiscopos, or single bishop presiding over a local Christian church, episcopal supervision of Christian cult evolved into episcopal control. By the 3rd century we find increasing references to the ordained as clergy: i.e., as "specially chosen" or "set apart." One also finds with increasing regularity references to bishops (and occasionally to presbyters) as the high priests of the new covenant. These tendencies culminated in the 4th century in the theological movement known as sacerdotalism.

Sacerdotalist theology reflected the changed political status of Christianity as it became, first, one of the official religions, then, the only official religion of the Roman empire. Sacerdotalist theologians sought to protect the authority of the bishop from imperial encroachment. Basil of Caesarea laid the foundations for the new theology of Christian priesthood by teaching that bishops participate directly in the priestly authority of Christ in church matters in a manner analogous to the emperor's direct participation in divine authority in secular matters. Such an interpretation of episcopal priesthood endowed bishops with a priestly function different in kind from the priesthood of all believers. Moreover, the sacerdotalist portrayal of bishops as the levitical priests of the new covenant cast them, in what concerned their relationship to the emperor, in a role analogous to the relationship of the levitical high priesthood to the throne of David.

Sacerdotalist theology re-enforced elitist perceptions of the episcopacy in other ways as well. After Constantine's appointment of the episcopacy in A.D. 318 to the post of imperial judges, sacerdotalist theologians sought to protect bishops from the corruption traditionally associated with that office by holding up to them the highest moral ideals. In the dualistic world of Christian Platonism, the imposition of episcopal celibacy endowed the office with quasi-angelic pretensions and vindicated its superiority to the first levitical priests, who incurred ritual impurity through sexual activity (Lev 15:16-18). Christian bishops, who exercised a more spiritual kind of hieratic priesthood, renounced marriage altogether.

The 2nd and 3rd centuries witnessed the temporary eclipse of the Christian presbyterate, as deacons, who functioned as administrative assistants to the bishops, played a more prominent role in the community than its presbyteral elders. In the 4th century, however, presbyters began to preside at eucharists especially in rural areas where the bishop could not. As the presbyterate gained in ecclesial prominence the diaconate declined. By the end of the 4th century, the presbyter, or priest, ranked second only to the bishop in clerical authority.

In the 6th century, a Syrian writer with the pseudonym of Dionysius the Areopagite, an Athenian whom Paul the apostle converted in the 1st century (Acts 17:34), proposed a hierarchical interpretation of the structures of church government. By a "hierarchy" Pseudo-Dionysius meant "a holy ordinance," an eternal, divinely established principle of order which gives intelligible structure to the universe (The Celestial Hierarchy, III, 1). A Christian Platonist, Pseudo-Dionysius believed that the church on earth participated in the order of the three angelic hierarchies. The first angelic hierarchy included seraphim, cherubim, and thrones; the second, dominations, powers, and authorities; the third, principalities, archangels, and angels. Moreover, Pseudo-Dionysius believed that the angelic capacity for grace and enlightenment decreased as one descended the hierarchical ladder (Ibid., V, 1-IX, 2). He divided the church on earth into two similarly structured hierarchies. Bishops, priests, and deacons comprised the clerical hierarchy. Religious, laity, and catechumens comprised the lay hierarchy. Pseudo-Dionysius described the bishop as "a deified and divine person, instructed in all-holy knowledge, in whom the entire hierarchy which depends on him finds the pure means of perfecting and expressing itself" (The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, I, 3).

This quaint understanding of church order made the clergy into the laity's only channel of divine grace, and with the disappearance of the catechumenate left the laity in a position of pure passivity on the bottom rung of the hierarchical ladder. This peculiar ecclesiology exerted little influence at first; but it strongly informed both church reform and theological reflection on the priesthood in the Late Middle Ages, when it was mistaken as a description of 1st-century church order.

By the Late Middle Ages, scholastic theologians were moving to a broad consensus about the meaning of priesthood, a consensus informed not only by sacerdotalist and hierarchical thinking but also by medieval church order and sacramental controversies. The schoolmen saw priests as the principal agents of the Christian eucharistic sacrifice endowed by ordination with the power to change bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ. Ordination also empowered priests to baptize, absolve, and anoint the sick and dying. The character of priestly ordination, a mysterious spiritual mark on the soul, conformed the ordained to Christ the great high priest of the new covenant and enabled them to function as sacramental channels of grace for the laity. The Scholastics saw episcopal ordination as conferring jurisdictional authority and the right to confirm and ordain (Albert the Great, On the Sacraments, Tr. VIII q. iv, a. 3; Bonaventure, Commentary on the Book of Sentences IV, d. xiv, p. 2, a. 1, qq. 1-3; Thomas Aquinas, Summa Contra Gentiles, IV lxxiv-lxxvi, Summa Theologiae, III [Supple.], xxxiv-xl).

The Reformation witnessed the collapse of this medieval consensus as the Protestant Reformers, who took Sacred Scripture as the only norm of faith, correctly realized that the NT offered no sanction for either a sacerdotalist or a hierarchicalist interpretation of priestly ministry. Both Luther and Calvin placed the proclamation of the gospel rather than cultic leadership at the heart of ordained ministry (Luther, Works, 36:113; Calvin, Institutes, IV xix, 22-23), although the Augsberg Confession (16) acknowledged that the ordained do lead worship, as did Calvin (Institutes, IV, xiv, 22-23). Luther also rediscovered the NT doctrine of the priesthood of all believers, but interpreted it as denying any difference in kind between the priesthood of clergy and laity (Works, 36:116). Zwingli recognized no priesthood save that of Christ (Commentary on True and False Religion, 21).

The Council of Trent responded to the Protestant challenge by both defending and reforming the medieval sacramental synthesis. Trent defended both the hierarchical structure of the church and a qualitative difference between the priesthood of the ordained and that of the laity. It insisted that ordination gives the power not only to consecrate and offer the eucharist but also to forgive sins. Trent denied that ordination merely commissions one to preach the gospel. Trent extended sacerdotalist thinking to include the presbyterate but left the sacramental status of the episcopacy vague (D.S., 1767-1769, 1771, 1774).

Both the liturgical and ecumenical movements softened the contrast between Catholic and Protestant interpretations of the character of ordained ministry, as the teachings of Vatican II illustrate. In contrast to Trent, Vatican II made a ministry of proclamation rather than cultic leadership the primary responsibility of the ordained, treating sacramental worship as a special and particularly efficacious mode of proclaiming the gospel. Although Vatican II asserted with Luther the priesthood of all the faithful, it continued to defend a difference in kind between ordained and lay priesthood (L.G., 10; P.O., 4-5). Although the council still employed the term "hierarchical," it refused to portray the clergy as the laity's only channel of grace, as Pseudo-Dionysius had. It also portrayed the clergy as standing within the church rather than over it and as orienting the laity through word and sacrament to receptive openness to the Holy Spirit. While the ordained have the responsibility of evoking, coordinating, and discerning the gifts of the Spirit, they never have the right to suppress the Spirit (L.G., 10; A.A., 3, 30). In retrieving a NT interpretation of the responsibilities of presbyteral ministry, Vatican II also acknowledged its charismatic basis (Optatam totius, 13-14; P.O., 5-6). In the end, however, Vatican II juxtaposed a sacerdotalist and a NT theology of priesthood without attempting to resolve the theological tensions between the two (L.G., 21).

In other words, while Vatican II closed the theological gap between a Catholic and Protestant interpretation of ordained ministry, it left unresolved many of the dialectical tensions in the development of a Christian theology of priesthood. For example, the letter to the Hebrews asserted that Jesus the great high priest of the new covenant has put an end forever to the need for a levitical priesthood; but sacerdotalism portrayed first bishops and then presbyters as the levitical high priests of the new covenant. Similarly, if with Trent and Vatican II one defends a difference in kind between the priesthood of the laity and ordained priesthood, one may nevertheless question whether assimilating Christian ordained leadership to the levitical priesthood offers the best theological explanation of that difference. Finally, both sacerdotalism and hierarchicalism helped rationalize the rise of clericalism, which, when it prevailed, transformed ordained church leadership from a service into a power elite. Clericalism, however, for its part, would seem to contradict the mandate of Jesus to the apostles that leaders in the new Israel must imitate a servant messiah by acting as the least of all and as the servants of all.

Vatican II may, however, have pointed to paths that lead beyond these dialectical impasses. While official leadership of a community of worship necessarily entails not only the responsibility to oversee worship but even the right to lead worship in accord with the accepted discipline of that community, if one distinguishes a hieratic understanding of priesthood from the presbyteral oversight exercised in the apostolic church, one can assert with Vatican II that bishops enjoy the fullness of presbyteral oversight while still maintaining with Hebrews that Jesus enjoys the fullness of hieratic priesthood. Similarly, if with the NT and with Vatican II one asserts the charismatic basis of Christian priestly ministry, then one can explain the difference in kind between the priesthood of the faithful and ordained priesthood without endorsing a sacerdotalist interpretation of that difference. The charisms of the Holy Spirit differ in kind from one another and specify the way in which individual Christians participate in the priestly ministry of the church as a whole. Because the ordained exercise a different kind of charism of service, their priestly ministry differs in kind from the ministry of those who exercise other charisms in the church. Such a charismatic interpretation of the difference between ordained and lay priesthood would not, in the manner of sacerdotalism, portray the ordained as participating directly in the priesthood of Christ in a way that sets them apart from and over the laity. Instead the priesthood of the church, the responsibility of God's priestly people as a whole to mediate Christ to the world, would also mediate between the priesthood of both clergy and laity whose diverse charisms empower them to share in the church's priestly ministry in different ways. Such an interpretation of priestly ministry would also require that the ordained model their ministry on Jesus rather than on the levitical priesthood. By purifying the theological understanding of ordained leadership of the clericalistic connotations of sacerdotalism and hierarchicalism such a theology could better reconcile priestly service with the demands of discipleship.

PRIESTLY SPIRITUALITY

All Christian spirituality flows from incorporation into the body of Christ through faith and baptism. The priest's spirituality is no exception. Basically, then, priestly spirituality is Christian spirituality. However, since the priest has a special role in the body of Christ, it is appropriate to discuss how this role specifies the practice of Christian spirituality. But an integral examination of priestly spirituality must first situate the priest within the body and only then discuss the aspects of spirituality proper to the priest as priest. This article is concerned with priesthood in the Roman Catholic church, hence the terms body of Christ and church have primary reference to this community. By extension, however, it has application mutatis mutandis to the pastoral office in all Christian churches.

Body of Christ: Priest As Member

Priests are members of the body of Christ. Their dignity as members of the body has frequently been obscured by treatment of their special role within the body. The Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests from Vatican II clearly situates the priest's leadership role through ordination within the priest's membership in the body through the sacraments of initiation: "Therefore, while it indeed presupposes the sacraments of Christian initiation, the sacerdotal office of priests is conferred by that special sacrament through which priests, by the anointing of the Holy Spirit, are marked by a special character and are so configured to Christ the priest that they can act in the person of Christ the head" (P.O., 2). Membership and leadership must be seen together for comprehensive understanding of priestly identity and spirituality.

It is significant that Vatican II chose the image of the body of Christ to discuss priestly identity. This image highlights both the equality of all in the body as well as the difference of roles in the body. The equality of all members within the body is clear: "There is but one body and one Spirit, just as there is but one hope given all of you by your call. There is one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, who is over all, and works through all, and is in all" (Eph 4:4-6). Equally clear is the difference of roles within the body: "There are different gifts but the same Spirit; there are different ministries but the same Lord; there are different works but the same God who accomplishes all of them in everyone. To each person the manifestation of the Spirit is given for the common good" (1 Cor 12:4-7). Furthermore, Paul's image of the body of Christ highlights the Spirit as the source of all life within the body. Membership in the body flows from the Spirit received through faith and baptism. Specific roles (charisms) within the body flow from the special gifts given by the Spirit to different members of the body for the sake of the entire body.

Finally, the church as the body of Christ shares Christ's mission. This mission so clearly presented in all the gospels is serving the Kingdom of God. Each member is called by baptism to assume a share of responsibility by accepting ministry according to his or her specific charisms. This ministry is oriented to serving the Kingdom of God within the body of Christ itself as well as beyond the body in the world. The example is, of course, Jesus himself. Jesus ministered to his disciples; the washing of the feet in John's gospel is the most dramatic example of his role of service to his disciples. Still this concern for his own in no way lessened his ministry toward those outside his community of followers; his preaching, healing and love extended to everyone he encountered.

Body of Christ: Priest As Leader

As members of the body of Christ priests have received the Spirit incorporating them into the body and giving them charisms for the service of the Kingdom. What, then, differentiates the priest's ministry from that of other members of the body? Most agree that ministerial priesthood in the church implies a permanent office flowing from charism and formally recognized by the church: "In summary, the holder of an office in the Church would be (1) a person endowed by the Spirit, (2) with personal gifts (charisms), (3) called to a public and permanent ministry and this call is formally recognized by the Church" (As One Who Serves, 20). The fact that this office implies a role of leadership in the community is also agreed upon by the magisterium and by most theologians. Yet there remain theological disagreements on the relationship between the priest's role as head of the body (always with the bishop) to the body itself. The discussion is focused on a passage from The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church from Vatican II: "Though they differ from one another in essence and not only in degree, the common priesthood of the faithful and the ministerial or hierarchical priesthood are nonetheless interrelated. Each of them in its own special way is a participation in the one priesthood of Christ" (L.G., 10). Since this article is concerned primarily with the spirituality of priests as leaders of the body—an identity that is acknowledged by most—it does not seem necessary to treat the doctrinal disputes.

Christian spirituality flows from response to the Holy Spirit, the sanctifier. Priestly spirituality is simply the priest's effort to respond faithfully to the Spirit in living the priestly identity as defined by the church. The church teaches that ordination establishes the priest in three new, distinctive and permanent relationships: with Christ, with the church and with the world beyond the church. This identity today includes—for both diocesan as well as religious order priests—a call to observe the evangelical counsels. Since observing these counsels affects the living out of the three basic relationships, they must be discussed with them. It should be recalled again that this discussion focuses on those aspects of priestly spirituality that distinguish the priest as priest; it does not focus on aspects of spirituality common to all Christians through baptism.

Priest and Christ: Person-Symbol of Christ the Head of Body

Through ordination the priest is established in a new, distinctive and permanent relationship to Christ. The priest becomes the person-symbol of Christ in the church: priests receive an anointing of the Spirit that enable them to act in the name of Christ the head (P.O., 2). Thus priests are empowered to act in persona Christi. A document prepared for the American bishops makes the crucial observation that priests can be the person-symbol of Christ only because of their membership in the body of Christ: "It is only because of the Church that the priest can be said to act in persona Christi. He is called to be an effective sign and witness of the Church's faith in the reconciling Christ, who works through the Church and through the one whom the Church has sent to be the steward of its gifts and services" (As One Who Serves, 22). It is the body of Christ that is holy through the presence of the Spirit. Priests as head of this body are given the gift of the Spirit to act in persona ecclesiae and so also in persona Christi.

Through ordination the priest is established in a special relationship to Christ. As head of the body the priest becomes an "effective sign" or sacrament of Christ's authoritative presence in the church. All aspects of priestly spirituality flow from this relationship. Since it is the role of a symbol to make present what it represents, the priest is called by the church through ordination to make Christ present in all actions for the church. Consequently priestly ministry to the church must be done in a way that awakens faith within the community. This awakening of faith in others is possible only if the priest has a deep relationship personally with Christ. The biggest challenge of priestly spirituality is to become internally one with the Christ who is symbolized externally. To a great extent the effectiveness of priestly ministry flows from a heart transformed by the Spirit that ministers to others.

All Christians desiring to follow Christ fully are called to observe the evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity and obedience within their own state of life. The priest is no exception. However the priest's observance of the evangelical counsels is oriented toward conforming the priest more closely to Christ and so increasing effectiveness as the person-symbol of Christ. In the Latin rite of the Catholic church, the priest is called to celibacy and so to meet personal affective needs in ways consonant with the celibate state. Christ is the model of priestly celibacy in his relationships with the Father, his community and his apostolate. Above all the celibacy of Christ was founded on his relationship to his most dear Father, Abba. From within this intimate and often solitary presence before his Father, Christ's entire life flowed. Christ's relationship to the Father is the model for the priest's relationship to Christ. As Christ's heart flowed instinctively to the Father, so does the priest's heart flow to Christ and the Father. Love unites without obliterating personal distinctiveness. As Christ was able to say "The Father and I are one," and as Paul could say, "I live, now not I, but Christ lives in me," so the priest prays to become equally one with the Father and Jesus. By embracing celibacy the priest imitates Jesus in allowing sufferings of failure, loneliness and isolation to foster even deeper intimacy with God and with Jesus himself.

Christ is the model of priestly celibacy in his relationship to his community. He looked to certain of his apostles and disciples for the personal support he needed to sustain the failures and loneliness of his ministry. So Christ is the model for priests in developing deep human relationships, especially with fellow priests. Finally Christ's affectivity was also directed toward those he served.

We recall how Jesus wept over Jerusalem because he was not able to draw the chosen people of God to himself as a mother hen draws her chicks to herself. In embracing the vow of celibacy the priest strives to imitate Christ in each of these three dimensions of affectivity and so to become a more effective person-symbol of Christ as head of the body.

Priest and Church: Servant-Leader of Body

Through the anointing of the Spirit at ordination the priest is also established in a new, distinctive and permanent relationship to the church; the priest becomes the servant-leader of the church, the "effective sign" of Christ the head of the body. As the preeminent leader of the community the priest also acts in persona ecclesiae. This leadership of the body is marked by four functions essential for the community. The priest is called to serve the church by proclaiming the word of God, by presiding at worship, by pastoral care of the people of God and by facilitating the different charisms within the church. But the priest's leadership will take many differing forms depending on the talents of the priest and the needs of the community. The American bishops highlighted the importance of sensitivity to varying forms of priestly leadership with which the Spirit endows priests: "All priests are endowed by the Spirit in various ways to serve the People of God. These are forms of leadership.... The gifts differ and each must discern in the Spirit how he has been gifted. No one has all the gifts. Some seem to disappear in the history of the Church; some are transient even in the lives of priests" (As One Who Serves, 32).

Christ is the model for the priest's leadership of the church. Just as Jesus' love of the Father impelled him to live for the Father's Kingdom, so does the priest's love of Christ impel the priest to live for the body of Christ. The priest will, furthermore, exercise leadership in the same way Jesus exercised leadership—through service: “The Son of Man has not come to be served but to serve—to give his life in ransom for the many” (Mk 10:45). And through the special anointing of the Spirit in ordination Christ now stands with the priest empowering the priest to be an “effective sign” of Christ in all ministry to the church. Thus the priest can fulfill the vocation to be the sacramental symbol-person of Christ actually making Christ more present through his daily service to the church.

In a new way since Vatican II priests are being called to facilitate service and leadership of others within the church. The role has been compared to that of a conductor of an orchestra: “The conductor succeeds when he stimulates the best performance from each player and combines their individual efforts into a pattern of sound, achieving the vision of the composer. The best leader is one who can develop the talents of each staff person and coordinate all their efforts, so that they best complement each other and produce a superior collective effort” (As One Who Serves, 46). In facilitating ministry of others the priest is not unlike Christ who prepared the disciples and then sent them off on their own. The priest recognizes that the Spirit in baptism both incorporates members into the body and simultaneously gives them differing gifts of ministry for the body. Yet according to the above document the priest remains the one “in whom the mission of the Church, and therefore its ministry, finds focus and visibility” (34); thus the priest acts within the community preeminently in persona ecclesiae.

To enhance the priest's effectiveness as a person-symbol of Christ, the church calls the priest to evangelical obedience through the promise or vow of obedience to their bishops or religious superiors. This promise or vow of obedience places the priest in special union with the universal church and so enhances the ability to act in persona ecclesiae. The priest symbolizes the unity of the entire church in Christ: the local parish, the diocese, the national church, the universal church. In addition the priest symbolizes the continuity of the church through the ages from the apostles and Peter to the present-day Roman Catholic church and the bishops and pope. It follows from this that the priest must fully own the position in the church given through ordination. And the priest must love the church and protect and defend it at every level. And while acknowledging the church's faults and foibles past and present, the priest still believes it is the privileged place of the Spirit's activity in this world for the Kingdom of God: “I for my part declare to you, you are “Rock,” and on this rock I will build my church, and the jaws of death shall not prevail against it” (Mt 16:18).

The model for the priest's obedience is again Christ. Nothing stood between Christ and doing his Father's will. The priest's obedience is to God. The priest is convinced that the will of God is now revealed through the authoritative structures of the church. In obeying these structures the priest is obeying the Father. The priest's obedience to the bishop or religious superiors gives eloquent testimony to the belief that Christ continues to work through the ages within the authoritative structures of the church. By embracing the promise or vow of obedience the priest refuses to allow any personal desire not in accord with God's will as expressed through church superiors to determine actions. The sufferings of obedience to God's will are accepted and offered to the Father in the same manner as Christ's.

Priest and Society: Promoter of Justice in the World

Through ordination the priest is established in a new, distinctive and permanent relationship to Christ and to his church. Contained in this identity is a new relationship to the world beyond the church. Because the priest now acts in persona ecclesiae and in persona Christi, the priest becomes the preeminent witness of the church's and Christ's concern for the world. Recent church documents have put increasing emphasis on this aspect of the church's mission. The statement of the World Synod of Bishops in 1971 entitled Justice in the World is apt: "... action on behalf of justice and participation in the transformation of the world fully appear to us as a constitutive dimension of the preaching of the Gospel, or in other words, of the Church's mission."

The American bishops echo this thrust by presenting their description of priestly ministry under four co-equal divisions: to proclaim the word of God, to preside at worship, to serve the Christian community, to serve humankind. The last-named section begins as follows: "The Church is called to serve all of society: that is its mission and the hope of its ministry. While the priest may have a certain primary responsibility to the Catholic community which he serves, nonetheless he has been sent by Christ and the Church to all people who the larger community in which the parish community exists. The concern for all people gives reality to the presence of the risen Lord" (As One Who Serves, 50).

The priest has a double role in this ministry to humankind. As head of the body the priest is called to be personally engaged in actions on behalf of justice to witness to the church's concern. In addition the priest is called to facilitate action and leadership within the church for the transformation of society. Church teachings acknowledge that time constraints may limit the priest's personal involvement but also point out that the apostolate within society is also most appropriate for the laity: "The apostolate of the social milieu, that is, the effort to infuse a Christian spirit into the mentality, customs, laws and structures of the community in which a person lives is so much the duty and responsibility of the laity that it can never be properly performed by others. In this area the laity can exercise an apostolate of like towards like" (Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, 33). In addition to working for justice throughout society, the priest is called to have special concern for the poor: "Although the presbyter has obligations towards all persons, he has the poor and the lowly entrusted to him in a special way. The Lord himself showed that he was united to them, and the fact that the Gospel was preached to them is mentioned as a sign of his messianic activity" (P.O., 6).

Again Christ is the model of the priest in this dimension of ministry. Jesus' concern for others was not limited to his immediate community of disciples. He continually extended himself beyond his followers to others. His entire ministry is marked with personal compassion for any person who came to him in need. In addition to his one-on-one concern for others Jesus also spoke out against society's injustices. At times the condemnation was marked by actual disobedience to laws when he viewed them as contradictory to the revelation he received from his Father. Indeed his criticism was so threatening to the establishment that it eventually precipitated his death. And finally the gospel reflects that Jesus had special care and concern for the poorest of the poor, the outcasts of society. The parable of the Last Judgment testifies to the centrality in Jesus' eyes of service to the hungry, thirsty, shelterless, imprisoned.

To enhance the priest's effectiveness as a witness of Christ, the church asks all priests to have special concern for evangelical poverty within their own priestly vocation, diocesan or religious. And again the model is Christ himself. Christ was poor. He let no material desire or possession come between himself and doing the Father's will. He was detached from possessions in order to be more free to serve. And Christ chose to live a simple lifestyle, perhaps to be more approachable by the poor or to witness to the sufficiency of the Father's providence for his material needs, taking his cue from the birds of the air and the lilies of the field. Through embracing evangelical poverty the priest refuses to allow any inordinate attachment to food, clothing, shelter, possessions to affect service of the Kingdom either within or outside the body of Christ. With this inner quality of heart the priest thus becomes an even more effective witness of Christ to the church and the world.

Conclusion

Through ordination priests receive an anointing of the Spirit that enables them to be so configured to Christ that they can act in the person of Christ the head. The priest then exists in a new, distinctive and permanent relationship to Christ, to the church and to society. The Holy Spirit stands behind priests enabling them to live this identity. In their relationship to Christ, the Spirit enables priests to be poor, celibate and obedient. In their relationship to the church, the Spirit enables priests to be effective servant-leaders in proclaiming the word of God, presiding at worship, caring for the pastoral needs of community and facilitating charisms of the community. In their relationship to society, the Spirit enables priests to be effective witnesses of Christ in promoting justice in the world and most especially in serving the poor both personally and in their leadership of the body of Christ. The challenge of priestly spirituality is to develop rhythms of living in tune with the Spirit so that the Spirit can indeed animate each aspect of priestly identity and transform the priest into a truly effective person-symbol of Christ.

PSALMS AS LITURGICAL PRAYER

This article will consider the psalms under three headings: (a) the OT: the psalms in Israel's worship; (b) the psalms in the NT; and (c) the psalms in contemporary liturgy.

The OT: The Psalms in Israel's Worship

Yahweh the God of the Psalms. The OT psalms, outwardly like the liturgical poetry of Israel's neighbors, take their distinctiveness from the unique God they confess, "Yahweh alone." Unlike comparable religions, divine activity was not attributed to many deities. Yahweh shaped all and hence is at the center of every psalm.

Monotheism made Israel's worship distinctive. Yahweh, omnipotent and omniscient, did not need human beings' labor. Mesopotamian creation accounts, in contrast, uniformly depict human beings as slaves created to build palaces for the gods and to provide them with food, drink, and honor. OT texts emphasize the dignity and responsibility of human beings. Even in the Mesopotamian-influenced Genesis 2-3, the man is a dignified gardener, not a slave; God asks the man and the woman for their obedience, not their labor. Clearer still is Genesis 1 in which the human couple as the apex of creation encounter God. To the priestly source of Genesis 1 human beings are animae naturaliter liturgicae, i.e., part of the world and hearers of the divine word. "Humans are created in such a way that their very existence is intended to be their relationship to God" (C. Westermann, Genesis 1-11, Minneapolis, p. 158). Genesis 1 aptly prefaces the psalter as well as the pentateuch.

Monotheism also forbids images; no single being adequately represents the creator of all. In Israel's imageless worship the word is privileged: "You heard the sound of words, but saw no form; there was only a voice" (Deut 4:12). The words of the psalms thus bring Israel before the Lord in a special way.

The Temple and the King. The psalms are the "hymnbook of the second temple," and cannot be understood apart from the temple or palace of Yahweh. King David brought the venerable ark of the covenant to Jerusalem, making the city the central sanctuary of all the tribes (Psalm 132). The temple was actually built by David's son Solomon in the mid-10th century B.C.. Destroyed in the 6th-century exile and rebuilt later in the century (afterwards enlarged), it was the place of official worship until the Romans leveled it in A.D. 70.

The temple building was of modest size (90' x 30' and ca. 45' high) but of the finest materials and workmanship. It had three rooms, a porch (30' x 10'), a nave or main room (60' x 30'), and the holy of holies (a perfect cube of 30') where Yahweh was invisibly enthroned upon the ark. The people did not gather inside the temple as in a modern church or synagogue; it was exclusively the house of God. There God was fed and honored by his priests in ceremonies designed for a potentate. Some of the ceremonial was private, performed within God's house by the priests, e.g., the setting out of food and incense before God. The public ceremonies took place in the surrounding open-air court, which was considered part of the temple. The psalms were part of the public ceremonial.

Zion (the favorite psalm name for the temple site) is important because divine presence was conceived in spatial terms. Yahweh is in other places but preeminently present in Zion; only there is Israel "before Yahweh." In Zion Yahweh sits enthroned upon the cherubim to judge or rule, and meets Israel. Zion is the goal of the exodus-conquest and of the three annual feasts of pilgrimage. In a threatening universe it is the one secure place (Pss 46:2-3; 48:3; 76:3). The "Songs of Zion" (Psalms 46, 48, 76, 84, 87, 121, 122 and cf. 137) celebrate the city as the site of the victory over primordial enemies, as the residence of Yahweh and the Davidic king, and the place of divine decrees. In early Judaism Jews began the practice of turning toward Jerusalem in prayer (Dan 6:10; 9:21).

The king played a major role in the psalms since church and state were one; religion pervaded what is considered "secular" in contemporary society. The king was the instrument of God's governance. As son of God he ensured that his patron received due honor; he sponsored the liturgy and, in the early period, celebrated major feasts. Though in Israel royal power was tempered by an egalitarian tradition and the prophetic word, the king plays a major role in the psalms. Psalms 2 and 110 hymned his installation as king; Psalm 45 celebrated his marriage, and Psalm 72, his exemplary fertility. When the king led the army into battle, prayers were offered for him (Psalms 18, 21, and 144). When he returned victorious, the congregation was jubilant (Psalm 118). When he was defeated in battle, the congregation wept, reminding God that the Davidic king was as much a part of the universe as the heavens; his defeat called into question Yahweh's power and fidelity. The embellishments and hyperbolic language of the royal psalms ("court style") also characterize the royal poetry of neighboring cultures. When kings ceased in Israel after the 6th century B.C., people prayed the royal psalms for a future Davidic king. The process illustrates liturgical poetry becoming "text," i.e., lifted up from its immediate liturgical context to a new use. Since God is the author of the psalms, they are valid for new situations.

The Psalms in the Temple Liturgy. The OT gives almost no information on how the psalms functioned in the temple liturgy. Psalm superscriptions contain tantalizing allusions to liturgy, e.g., "for remembrance," "for the dedication of the temple," "according to Lilies (a melody?)," but scholars are nowhere near consensus on their meaning. Rituals concerning sacrifice such as those in Exodus 35-39 and Leviticus 1-16 do not mention accompanying psalms. Some scholars conclude that all sacrificial worship was in silence, with "no sound but the bleating of the sheep," but one cannot conclude absence from non-mention. The rituals direct the correct performance of sacrifice; they are not descriptions of the liturgy. In fact many psalms refer to liturgical action: feasts (Pss 65:1-4; 81:3; 118:26); visits to the temple (Pss 5:7; 23:6; 27:6; 53:9; 63:2; 65:4; 73:17; 84:2, 4; 95:2, 6; 100:4; 118:19-20; 132:7; 134; 135:2); processions (Pss 24:7-10; 42:4; 48:12-14; 68:24-27; 118:26-27; 122:1-2; 132:8); sacrifices (Pss 4:5; 5:3; 27:6; 50:14; 54:6; 66:13-15; 107:22; 116:17-18); oracles (Pss 2:6, 7-9; 12:5; 21:8-12; 60:6-8; 62:11-12; 81:5-16; 82:2-7; 91:14-16; 95:8-11; 108:7-9; 110:4); and priestly benedictions (Pss 115:14-15; 118:26; 128:5; 134:3). Many psalms explicitly mention a congregation (Psalms 20, 21, 45, 91, 110) and some presume two choirs or a choir and cantor (Psalms 15, 24, 118, 120, 122, 123, 131, 132, 134). Psalm verbs of human response—those translated "rejoice," "give thanks," "meditate," etc.—describe not the interior attitude but the exterior expression. They mean "shout joyously," "lift up your voice in praise," etc. Musical instruments are mentioned often: the trumpet (ram's horn, 4x), the kinnôr, a lyre generally accompanying the voice (13x), and the nebel, an angular harp or another kind of lyre (12x). Sirach 50 portrays the beauty and liveliness of temple worship ca. 180 B.C. The evidence thus points to popular, even noisy, performance of psalms.

The high points of the liturgical year were the three festivals of pilgrimage to the Jerusalem temple: Passover and Unleavened Bread in early spring; Pentecost at wheat harvest seven weeks later, and Ingathering (also called simply the Feast, or Booths) in early fall (Exod 23:14-17, 34:18-26; Lev 23:1-44; Deut 16:1-17). The first, Passover, especially commemorated the exodus from Egypt (Exodus 12-13). Hence psalms of the exodus-conquest, e.g., Psalms 23, 105, 114, 135, 136, and 147, were probably sung then. Psalms 113-118, called in early Judaism "the Great Hallel (praise)," were sung at Passover. The second feast, Pentecost (also called Firstfruits and the Feast of Weeks) had become for some Jewish groups a feast of the Law by the 2nd century B.C. and for mainstream Judaism by the 2nd century A.D. The connection to law-giving may be much earlier, however, since Exod 19:1 begins Israel's stay at the foot of Mount Sinai on "the third new moon" [= Pentecost]. Association with the Law would have made Pentecost an appropriate moment for the covenant renewal ceremonies of Psalms 50 and 81; they indict the people for violating the Sinai covenant and prepare them for repentance and recommitment. The third and most important feast was Ingathering, a time of giving thanks for summer fruits and nuts. It was the feast of the New Year in the early period before Israel transferred the beginning of the year to the spring. At the New Year festival comparable religions enthroned their god as king after his creation victory over the forces of chaos. Whether Israel had a New Year enthronement for Yahweh is disputed. Some scholars believe it would have been contradictory for Yahweh, unique and omnipotent, to become king each year. Annual enthronement would have been possible, however, if Israel took Yahweh's becoming king through creation victory as renewal of kingship, with no implication he ever ceased being king. Enthronement, at any rate, provides a good context for psalms of kingship such as Psalms 47, 93, 95-100, and for psalms of Yahweh's cosmogonic victory such as Psalms 29, 46-48, 76, 93, 95-99, 104.

Though many psalms celebrate public institutions and national events, most seem designed for individual or small group rites. The largest formal category (nearly one third of the psalms) is the individual lament, which strictly requires the presence of only the individual and the priest. "Songs of trust" such as Psalms 23, 27:1-6, and 91 are highly personal. "Meditations" like Psalms 49 and 73, which respond to troubling faith problems, do not demand a congregation. Evidently the temple offered worshippers a variety of rituals. Some were for the great public festivals involving the king and the national traditions. Others were for the individual or family: to complain of suffering or disorientation; to give thanks for a rescue; to receive counsel about a vexing problem.

The psalter, like a modern hymnal, embraced widely different types of liturgical poetry—old and new, national and private, formulaic and original. Small collections grew into larger ones until the Psalter of 150 psalms was formed, a process completed at the latest by the late 3rd century B.C., as the Septuagint psalter shows. The collections must have been preserved by the Jerusalem temple.

The rituals of the temple gradually shaped the religious practice of the common people. Temple activity became democratized. Daniel, the pious hero of the Book of Daniel (composed in the 3rd-2nd century B.C.), prays toward Jerusalem three times a day, in synchronization with the oblations in the temple (Dan 6:10; 9:21). The rabbis later declared that every Jew must pray twice daily (morning and afternoon), since prayer corresponded to the Tamid sacrifices and was no less obligatory than the Tamid itself. Passages in the psalms declaring that prayer is superior (Pss 40:6-9; 69:30-33; 51:16-17) or equal (Pss 119:108; 141:2) to the sacrificial cult are probably petitions to God to accept prayers that do not include sacrifice. Sirach (ca. 180 B.C.) equated right living with sacrificial worship: "The one who keeps the law makes many offerings; he who heeds the commandments sacrifices a peace offering" (Sir 35:1 and cf. vv. 2-11 and Rom 12:1). Most important, the psalms became a prayer book for the people.

Literary Analysis of Psalms as Liturgical Prayer. Even within the biblical period the psalms shifted from liturgical scripts to sacred texts, which can be analyzed literarily. Form-criticism particularly has been a successful method for studying the psalms. It is sensitive to the conventions of the poetry and to the dynamics of the main genres, especially laments, thanksgivings, and hymns. Since almost two-thirds of the psalms fall into these three categories, the method has proven to be efficient.

About twenty-five psalms are hymns: Psalms 8; 29; 33; 47; 92; 95-100; 104; 105; 107; 111; 113; 114; 117; 135; 136; 145; 146; 147; 148; 149. The hymn structure is simple: a call to worship, often with the addressees named, e.g., "Praise Yahweh, all you nations," and sometimes even the musical instruments ("praise him with trumpet voice"). The invitational is often reprised in the last section.

The main section of the hymn, usually introduced by the preposition "for (kî)," gives the basis for praise; it is always what Yahweh has done. Divine activity is distinguished by many commentators into "creation" and "history" (or "redemption") but the distinction is not a biblical one. Hymns describe the acts of God either from a heavenly (suprahistoric or mythic) perspective or from an earthly (historic) perspective; the perspectives actually shade into one another. In OT hymns God's action brings into being or protects a human community, which is often depicted with its own land, tradition (legal and narrative), king, and God (Psalms 33, 66, 100, 111, 113, 114, 117, 135, 136, 145, 146, 147, 149). Hymns invite human worshippers to praise God's act of creating or governing and hence enhance God's glory on earth.

The verbs frequent in the hymns merit discussion—"to praise" and "to bless." The Hebrew verb commonly translated "to praise" is hallel (Greek ainō); it occurs in the English word "hallelujah," lit., "Praise Yah[weh]!" Its non-religious usage clarifies its psalmic use; the princes of Pharaoh praise Sarah for her beauty (Gen 12:15); Tyre is a city praised for its wealth (Ezek 26:17); one should not praise oneself but leave that to others (Prov 27:2). To praise therefore means to acknowledge and make public the worth or virtue of someone or something. Usually a group rather than an individual is the subject of the verb. In the psalms God is the object of praise and the temple is where praise is given. "To praise" is sometimes paralleled by "to sing," "to make melody," "to tell," "to thank," and sometimes modified by "with dancing" and "with music"; the verb describes a forceful public act.

Hebrew bērak "to bless" (Greek eulogein) is occasionally a synonym for "to praise" (when paired with it as in Pss 34:2 and 145:2) but has its own nuance. God's blessing brings humans increase (typically children, sometimes wealth and land) and general enhancement of life. Humans' blessing God does not of course increase or enhance the divine splendor. Rather humans acknowledge before others benefits received, thus widening the circle of God's admirers. The phrase "Blessed be Yahweh" is regularly followed by a complementary relative clause describing the benefit ("who did thus and so," e.g., Gen 14:20; cf. Ps 103:1-5). The whole is a statement about God rather than a speech made to him, and is intended for others to hear. God has done a good deed for the speaker, who now returns the favor by making God's glory known on earth.

The individual lament is the most frequent psalm genre (Psalms 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9-10, 13, 14, 17, 22, 25, 26, 27: 7-14, 28, 31, 35, 36, 38, 39, 41, 42-43, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 59, 61, 63, 64, 69, 70, 71, 77, 86, 88, 102, 109, 120, 130, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143). Scholars generally assume its situation in life (sitz im leben) is a transaction between an individual sufferer and a priest of the temple staff, something like that recorded between the priest Eli and Hannah at Shiloh, the predecessor of the Jerusalem sanctuary, in 1 Sam 1:9-18. Hannah goes to the Shiloh to lament a private grief (she is barren and despised by the second wife), speaks with the priest Eli who tells her, "Go in peace, and the God of Israel grant your petition which you have made to him" (1 Sam 1:17). It is now generally recognized that individual laments are deliberately non-specific and stereotyped so that they can serve as prayers for any sufferer.

The genre of individual lament has fixed parts in a flexible sequence. The person lamenting typically begins with a direct and unadorned cry to Yahweh, "Yahweh, help!" The complaint is a vivid description of the affliction, e.g., sickness, unfair legal process, treachery of former friends, or the consequences of sin such as ostracism or the ridicule by one's enemies. Nearly always there is a statement of trust, which the psalmist manages to utter in spite of the troubles, "The promises of Yahweh are promises that are pure" (Ps 12:6). The petition prays for rescue and sometimes for the downfall of the enemy. Scholars generally assume that a priest spoke a word of assurance to the lamenter; it was not transmitted with the psalm (Pss 12:5 and 60:6-8 are the exceptions) because it was apparently considered the priest's part. Finally there was a statement of praise in striking contrast to the turmoil of the rest; the psalmist states the intention to live according to the word of assurance just delivered by the priest.

The lament dramatizes the sufferer's plight in order to persuade God to intervene. There are three actors—God, the psalmist and "the wicked." The appeal is to God's noblesse oblige: Will you, just God, allow me, innocent and poor, to be vanquished by the wicked? God's word of assurance functions like a judicial verdict; it affirms that Yahweh does not allow evil to triumph ultimately and will vindicate the poor person. In the vow of praise the psalmist promises to live in the hope that God will act. The rite of individual lament enables the sufferer to make a devastating experience into a healing encounter with the just and merciful God. The details of the ritual are not known, but it presumably took place in the temple precincts.

The communal lament (Psalms 44, 60, 74, 77, 79, 80, 83, 85, 89, 90, 94, 123, 126) is a complaint by the community that Yahweh has abandoned them to destruction. In some (Psalms 44, 60, 74, 77, 80, 89), the people "remember" the event that brought them into existence (e.g., transplanting a vine from Egypt to Canaan; defeating sea and installing leaders in the new land). They thus pose the question to Yahweh: will you allow another power to destroy what you once created? The Hebrew word "remember" (zākar, Greek [ana]nimmēskesthai), important in these psalms, does not mean suddenly to bring to mind something forgotten, but to recite publicly, to make the event verbally present before God and the community. Psalm 77 illustrates the psalmist's recital of the originating event in the face of threat: "Has [God's] steadfast love forever ceased? Are his promises at an end for all time? . . . I will remember the deeds of Yahweh, I will remember your ancient deed. I will recite all your works, I will speak of your actions" (vv. 8, 11-12).

The individual thanksgiving (Psalms 18, 21, 30, 32, 34, 40:1-11, 92, 108, 116, 118, 138) is closely allied to the individual lament; the psalmist reports the rescue from the hands of the wicked. The speaker acknowledges before the community what God has done for me. Like the hymn and lament, it is modeled on a social transaction: you have done me a good turn by your rescue and now I return the favor by enlarging the circle of your admirers and worshippers. The chief Hebrew word for "to give thanks" is hōdû (Greek exomologeîn). In a few specialized contexts it means "to confess (sin)" but ordinarily is translated "to give thanks." The translation "to give thanks" is misleading since there is no exact Hebrew equivalent to the modern idiom "to say thank you." Biblical thanksgiving is illustrated by Jacob's wife, Leah: scorned by her sister and neglected by her husband, her prayer is finally answered by a fourth son. She "says thank you" by giving praise: "This time I will praise ('ōdeh) Yahweh" (Gen 29:35). What evokes the vow of praise in both communal and individual laments is the same—a threat to life. As verbs paired with it show, praise involves intense emotion—exultation, singing and playing, "glorifying." The one giving thanks/praising involves others in the act, which always has God as its exclusive object. Praise is also associated with life; only the living can praise God (Isa 38:19; Pss 30:10, 88:11).

The Psalms in the NT

In the post-exilic period, at least by the 4th century B.C., the psalms had become sacred texts and part of the Bible. Psalm parts could be rearranged into new wholes by the Chronicler (1 Chron 16:8-36; 2 Chron 7:41-42). This "anthological style" (A. Robert) reflects a silver-age mentality. Conscious of the Spirit's absence, early Judaism used or reworked writings of the earlier Spirit-filled golden age. The NT church took from Judaism the anthological style of psalm composition but differed in believing the new age of the Spirit had come.

Jewish Christians of the NT period accepted the Hebrew psalms for worship, discovering in traditional words like "messiah," "salvation," and "son of God" new meanings appropriate to the age of the Messiah (Lk 24:44). Jesus himself most probably prayed the psalms in Hebrew, though his everyday language was Aramaic. Early Christian worship developed from Jewish liturgy, which made use of psalms: "Now Peter and John were going up to the temple at the hour of prayer, the ninth hour" (Acts 3:1). 1 Cor 14:26 suggests that psalms in Christian liturgies had a teaching function, natural enough in a new religion: "When you come together, each one has a psalm, a lesson, a revelation, a tongue, or an interpretation. Let all things be done for edification." Eph 5:19-20 and Col 3:16 emphasize the traditional celebrative function of psalms in worship. "Psalms" in these passages may mean a free and highly personal composition like the lengthy thanksgiving hymns from Qumran, an anthological composition like the hymns in Luke or Revelation, or a catena of traditional psalm verses. Early apologists made use of psalms in controversies to demonstrate that Jesus was the messiah and king and that his sufferings were divinely intended; Psalms 2, 22, 69, 110, and 118 were special favorites. Ps 2:6-11 is an example of an early Christian hymn of Christ's death and resurrection.

Original psalm compositions in the NT are largely confined to two books—Luke and Revelation. Luke 1-2 with its Magnificat (1:46-55), Benedictus (1:68-79), and Nunc Dimittis (2:29-32), takes phrases and verses from the Septuagint, reassembling them for their associations and references. Classic parallelism is softened.

The largest collection of NT psalms comes from the book with a keen sense of a new prophetic age—Revelation (Apocalypse). "Blessed is he who reads aloud the words of the prophecy" (1:3); "He who has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit says to the churches" (2:7). The hymns are sung to the Lord who has done the great deed of liberation and salvation: the defeat of evil through the victory of the cross (4:11; 5:9-10; 7:15-17; 11:17-18; 15:3-4; 16:5-6; 19:6-8).

The Psalms in Contemporary Liturgy

The Authority of the Psalms. Jews and Christians value the psalms as the privileged human response to God's mighty acts and employ them in worship today. Because Christians differ from Jews in believing that the God of the psalter is the God of Jesus Christ, and that the psalter celebrates Christ's work, its authority for them is distinctive. That authority is three-fold.

(a) The authority of the psalms comes from their being the word of God, scripture. They thus transcend their original situation and become texts for new environments. The NT depicts Christ doing what Yahweh did in the OT. Psalms praising Yahweh therefore praise Christ; the NT gives him the title "the Lord" (ho kyrios) from the Septuagint. "Salvation," "victory," "righteousness"—words frequent in the psalter—refer to what Christ has done.

The psalter, part of "the scriptures," was especially authoritative for the new church; of OT texts only Isaiah is cited more frequently by the NT. As scripture the psalms validated Jesus as the messiah foreordained to suffer (Pss 22; 69; 41:9) and as the universal king.

(b) The psalms impose themselves upon readers like any classic text. Divine inspiration has taken away nothing from their human authors' spontaneity, depth of feeling, and artistry. They explore and record the full range of human responses to God and express them with memorable artistry. Every emotion, positive or negative—exultation, grief, rage—is turned into prayer. The psalms liberate those who pray them, bringing people before God as they are. Images and phrases of the psalter have entered the language to shape people's images of themselves before God: "Out of the depths I cry to thee, O Lord, Lord, hear my voice"; "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want: he makes me lie down in green pastures"; "Even the sparrow finds a home, the swallow, a nest for herself, . . . at thy altars, O Lord of hosts." Like the Our Father in the NT, the psalms pray and teach how to pray.

(c) The psalms are venerable and universal. They have been the prayer of Israel for 3,000 years and Christians joined in that prayer from the earliest period. The psalms are recited worldwide by Christians of all denominations; the divine office is a practice of the universal church. The Christian thus prays the psalms with countless others and feels united with the church in prayer.

Recent Liturgical Reforms. In recent years, especially since the Second Vatican Council, the Roman Catholic church has reformed the use of the psalms in its liturgy. Mass propers now have a wide variety of psalms: the entrance hymn (usually only a single verse), the response to the first reading, and the communion verse (again a single verse). The responsorial psalms are generally chosen for a few key verses rather than for the internal logic of the whole psalm. The one-verse entrance and communion "hymns" do little more than mention a theme.

The divine office has been reformed so that all 150 psalms are recited each month. A brief title and quotation (biblical or patristic) has been prefaced to each psalm to help the reader understand the often difficult logic of the psalm. A satisfactory English translation of the psalms is an urgent desideratum. A good translation must be accurate, retain as far as possible biblical imagery and even idioms, and respect the strophic structure of each psalm.

Difficulties in Praying the Psalms. Hallowed as the psalms are, many Christians find it difficult to pray them in the liturgy. Catechesis on the psalms as Christian prayer was recommended by the Apostolic Constitution and General Instruction on the Divine Office of Paul VI in 1970. Christian catechesis might deal with the following difficulties.

(a) The chief difficulty is theological, arising from the psalms as OT texts. How can texts originally performed before Yahweh in the Jerusalem temple liturgy be performed by the church of Christ? The question is part of a larger question—the relation of Christianity and Judaism. Christian theology is only beginning to work out a satisfactory answer to this fundamental relationship.

The church does not replace Judaism but is graciously brought within its sphere: "you, a wild olive shoot, were grafted in their place to share the richness of the olive tree" (Rom 11:17). "New" in NT does not mean new as if nothing existed before but new as divinely rebuilt and renewed. The covenant humans broke is the covenant God remade. The scriptures of the first covenant retain their meaning precisely because God is their author. The OT is thus not simply cast aside. New depths can be found in old words. God's victory that brings a world and people into being, God's king who rules that people, God's salvation that rescues that people—these psalmic themes can be sung today but with a clearer awareness of who God is and who the people are.

(b) A second difficulty is that the psalms are oriental poetry. To the English apologist C.S. Lewis, divine providence insured that the most distinctive feature of Hebrew poetry—synonymy of verses ("parallelism")—translates perfectly into any language: "Yahweh reigns; let the peoples tremble! Yahweh sits enthroned upon the cherubim; let the earth quake!" (Ps 99:1). Every line is repeated with slight variation, making a statement by dramatic interplay of verses, providing the redundancy necessary for aural comprehension. Westerners, literate and precise, need to appreciate what parallelism and other poetic techniques (e.g., chiasm, reprise, word-play) add to biblical prayer.

Psalmic poetry has its own logic, which is often difficult to discover in the course of recital. Sometimes the logic is discovered through refrains (Psalms 42-43; 67:3, 5; 99:5, 9), sometimes through parallelism of scenes (Ps 78:12-39; 40-72), sometimes through extrinsic acrostic structure, i.e., beginning successive verses with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. The quickest route to the logic of a psalm is through form criticism (cf. above). Most psalms fall into three genres—lament, hymn, or thanksgiving—and are ruled by the genre conventions. If one correctly identifies the genre, one will know what to expect of the psalm. The logic is often in the interplay between reader expectation and this psalm's statement.

(c) Vindictive psalms are difficult especially for Christians who view Christianity as utterly gentle and concerned primarily with the individual soul. "May the Lord cut off all flattering lips!" (Ps 12:3) is invoked against God's (and the psalmist's) enemies. Another psalm has no less than fourteen curses against enemies, among them, "May his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow!" (Ps 109:8-9). Most notorious is the curse against Babylon: "Happy shall be the one who takes your little ones and dashes them against the rock!" (Ps 137:9). The modern reader needs to recall that such psalms pray the just God to redress a here-and-now wrong; God's power and glory would otherwise remain invisible. The psalms glow with zeal against every injustice disfiguring God's world. That zeal is expressed by the psalmists, who think in a non-abstractive manner, as the elimination of unjust people, including their potential for living on in their children (cf. "their little ones" of Psalm 137). The Christian "hungering and thirsting for divine justice" (Mt 5:6) can pray these psalms (at least in private) by leaving everything—execution and timetable—in God's hands.

(d) Another difficulty for modern readers is the frequent recitals of Israel's history in the psalms. Some are largely detailed retellings of Israel's history, e.g., 78, 105, 106, 135, 136. Others allude constantly to individual historical events. The psalms presuppose the reader knows the history well and finds it fascinating.

Moderns must recognize that Israel encountered God not only in "nature" but also in the events of their history. Decisive moments of that history—the journey from Egypt to Canaan, the law giving at Sinai, key battles, the words of leaders—were intensely revelatory for the people. They delighted in their active God and treasured the memory of his interventions, which they handed on in a variety of versions. Like other ancient Near Eastern peoples, they accepted multiple versions of the same event; meaning was conveyed through narrative details and narratives were not seen as "historical" in a modern objective sense. Events of their history are thus sacramental in that they reveal God within the world. Christians are heirs to that history and should learn its main details. Much of the history is essentially the exodus and conquest and can be learned quickly.

RECONCILIATION

Reconciliation is one of the key words used by Christians to name the life and mission of Jesus Christ: "... and I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself" (Jn 12:32); "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself..." (2 Cor 5:19). It names as well the mission given to the church: "...entrusting to us the message of reconciliation..." (2 Cor 5:19). In an early eucharistic prayer text it appears as the primary request: "... so gather your church..." (Didache). And it is used to name that special sacrament of the church which is also entitled: of forgiveness, of confession, of penance. See entries below; also, Eucharist; Penance; Forgiveness, theology of.

RECONCILIATION AND PRIESTHOOD

Reconciliation is an achievement, a process, and a goal in the life of the human community. It suggests the divisions and hostilities found among nations and peoples, within societies and families, between people and their environment, and even within each person.

Priesthood, on the other hand, is a term that has meaning only within a religious frame of reference. Usually concerned with mediation or sacrifice, the term priesthood can assume a variety of meanings and is sometimes used in analogous or extended senses. To associate reconciliation with priesthood is to suggest that alienation and reconciliation pertain to humanity's relationship with God and that priesthood concerns some of the most decisive events in human life.

For the Roman Catholic tradition, reconciliation and priesthood are to be understood only in light of Jesus Christ and God's work in him. In Christ, God created the human family with one purpose in view: that each person should freely accept a share in eternal life and communion with the triune God (L.G., 2-3). This creative purpose established unity and peace as a perfection proper to human life (Eph 1:3-10; G.S., 24-32).

Rather than accept God's dominion in their lives, human beings have chosen to live in ways that declare their independence from God and his life-giving purpose. This causes alienation from God and accounts for the evil and hostility found in human life (Genesis 3; John Paul II, 14-15). These effects lead to new rejections of God in an ongoing process that enmeshes all people (Rom 3:9, 5:12; G.S., 13, 37). The term "sin" can refer to the cause, state, or results of this complex condition of evil and alienation.

Given this state of affairs, reconciliation necessarily requires the overcoming of sin by means of repentance and forgiveness, and ultimately by an inner transformation that eliminates the tendency to sin and alienation (Jer 31:33; Ezek 36:25-28; Ps 51:10). This could be accomplished only by God's special intervention, which took place through the incarnation of Jesus Christ. Because he was fully divine and fully human, Jesus was uniquely able to mediate between and draw together God and the human family. By his suffering, death, and resurrection, Jesus reconciled us to God and made possible the forgiveness of our sins and the hope of a human life marked by justice, peace, and unity (Rom 5:1-11; Col 1:19-22; 2 Cor 5:18-19; G.S., 22, 38-39).

Although there is no question as to who Jesus was or the reconciliation he accomplished, the NT seldom uses the terms mediator or priest in speaking of him. The principal exception is the epistle to the Hebrews which seeks to understand Jesus and his work in light of the Israelite priesthood and especially that of Melchizedek. This epistle and the background it assumes made it inevitable that later generations would also view Jesus Christ as priest of the new dispensation and consider his work as uniquely priestly.

Jesus Christ and his work of reconciliation were unique and effective for all people and all times (1 Tm 2:5). Even so he required the service of others to extend the fruits of his reconciliation to people in every age and place (Mt 28:18-20; Mk 16:15-16; Lk 24:47-49; Jn 20:21-23). Until the work of Christ is brought to its final perfection, sin and alienation remain urgent problems in human life. Christ relies on apostles and others to call people to repentance, forgiveness, and reconciliation. Required by Christ's explicit mandate, this missionary apostolate is an essential part of the life and ministry of the church (L.G., 17; Paul VI, On Evangelization in the Modern World, esp. 14-16). Members of the church must confront all forms of alienation and work to remedy them by preaching forgiveness and witnessing reconciliation (A.G., 1-4). A preferential option for the poor, peacemaking between adversaries, teaching and interpreting the signs of the times, care for the sick and dying, giving hospitality to the homeless, and especially work on behalf of justice and peace are important aspects of the missionary apostolate.

These activities are important and called for on their own terms. They must also interpret the meaning of human alienation and evil and point toward the reconciliation with God in Christ that all people need and are called to share. This witness will be credible only to the degree the church shows forth a convincing example of reconciliation in its own life (A.G., 5-6, 11-12; Paul VI, On Evangelization, 77).

As the reconciliation with God Jesus Christ won for us is progressively shared with more and more people through the ministries of word and forgiveness, a visible community of reconciled people is assembled, the church (Eph 2:11-22; L.G., 9, 19). The church has an intimate relationship to Christ, whose life and power it shares (Acts 1:8, 2:1-4; 1 Cor 3:16, 12:27; L.G., 7-8). The church increases as the preaching of the gospel prompts its hearers to repentance, faith, and a request for baptism. In baptism their past sins are forgiven and they begin to share in the church's reconciled life (Acts 2:22-41; Rom 6:3-11). In this context, baptism counts as the primary sacrament of reconciliation.

The church's supreme act of worship is the eucharist. Nourished by the word, the ecclesial assembly celebrates in sacrament the mystery of Christ's passion, death, and resurrection. From this mystery the church draws its life and unity. At the eucharist, the church most intensely realizes itself as a reconciled community, a priestly people who offers God the sacrifice of a holy life (1 Pet 2:5,9). From the perspective of the church's life, the eucharist is the sacrament of its reconciliation, its communion with God in Christ (L.G., 11; S.C., 6).

The eucharist sets the standard for the church's life. The church must always hold itself accountable to the demands associated with its reconciliation. This requires that serious failures and divisions in the church must be prevented and promptly addressed when they occur. Every effort must be made to assure that justice and peace characterize relationships within the church. Its own integrity and the credibility of its witness and preaching are at stake (John Paul II, 9).

The church's eucharistic life is decisive in its response to the various ways its members fail to live up to the demands of ecclesial reconciliation. A crisis occurs when a member of the church insists on living in a way that means abandonment of the commitments undertaken in baptism and inherent in the eucharistic life of the church. This kind of failure simultaneously involves the offender's personal responsibility, alienation from the church and its eucharistic life, and a turning away from God. Since it brings spiritual death to the offender, such a posture constitutes the act and condition of mortal sin. Though it is sometimes hard to judge when spiritual death has actually occurred, this event involves crisis for the church as well as the offender (John Paul II, 17).

Because this case involves alienation or re-alienation from God and the church, the offender's position is analogous to that of one as yet unconverted and unbaptized. Reconciliation is urgently needed. The process required to bring this about takes account of many factors, notably the nature of the offense, the disposition of the offender and the adequacy of the repentance shown, and the requirements of the ecclesial community. Reconciliation normally involves a cooperative effort by the repentant offender and an authorized minister of the church; it is another evidence of the faithful love of Christ and the church (International Theological Commission [ITC], III.4-5; John Paul II, 31).

Because of practical need and the essentially ecclesial and public nature of reconciliation, the church soon developed liturgical rites and legal norms for the reconciliation of its alienated members. This process, which has taken different forms in the history of the church, is sacramental in nature. Reconciliation reaches its perfection when the forgiven brother or sister reassumes full participation in the eucharist.

Very different is the case of one who is responsible only for those minor failures that are inevitable in the course of daily life. With contrition, these faults can be overcome by means of prayer, sincere acts of repentance and charity, and the support of the community. Tradition refers to such faults as forgivable or venial sins. They are negative factors in the lives of individuals and the community. But since they do not constitute a posture of turning away from Christ and the church, the believer's participation in the eucharistic life of the church continues uninterrupted and is a powerful means of inspiring and strengthening repentance (ITC, IV.b.1; John Paul II, 17, 31).

People aware of only venial failings may also avail themselves of sacramental penance as part of their effort to live the church's life of grace, repentance, and reconciliation more fully. Their use of this sacrament is devotional and not obligatory. In these cases the sacrament does not effect reconciliation since the penitent was not alienated by mortal sin.

The mandate of Christ and the life and integrity of the church require many ministries and services. Certain of these are so important that they were quickly assimilated to specific offices, especially those of bishop, presbyter, and deacon (1 Tm 3:1,8, 5:17). The exact nature of these offices and their relationship to other services and ministries in the early church are not always clear. During the 2nd century, however, the bishop emerged as the authoritative figure in the local church. He was responsible for the church's overall well-being and especially its fidelity to the apostolic tradition. The bishop alone presided by right at the eucharist and in the process by which alienated members were reconciled to the church. Particularly when increased numbers made this necessary, the bishop confided these responsibilities to presbyters who acted with the bishop's authority.

The bishop's pre-eminent position in the local church, and especially his presidency at the eucharist, set the stage for a new development. During the 2nd century the concept of priesthood began to be applied to the bishop and his ministry. This usage was analogous and developed in light of the levitical priesthood, the sacrificial aspects of Christ's passion and death, and the epistle to the Hebrews. Only several centuries later was the term priest generally applied to presbyters as well, and with due recognition of their subordinate position (Congar, 136-43).

During the scholastic period the notion of a priesthood common to bishops and presbyters began to overshadow the distinctions rooted in their respective positions in the church. The ordination of a presbyter came to be seen as a priestly ordination, one that conferred sacred powers, particularly with respect to the sacraments of eucharist and penance. The identification of bishops and presbyters as priests became a settled point in the Catholic tradition (Congar, 138-39; L.G., 21, 28).

The priestly nature of the ministries of bishops and presbyters has been a significant factor in the discussion of the priestly nature of the church as a whole, especially the common priesthood of the laity. That the church is priestly is clear from the NT (1 Pet 2:5,9; Rev 1:6, 5:10). Vatican II however taught that the common priesthood of the faithful and the hierarchical priesthood "differ from one another in essence and not only in degree" (L.G., 10). Whether the general priesthood properly relates to specific liturgical and apostolic activities or simply to the living of a holy life by the community of the baptized is a point on which there is disagreement.

How Christ's one priesthood is shared by the church and by persons in the church and what this means in practice are important questions. While these issues are pursued, Christ and his paschal mystery must be kept central to both theology and praxis. The eucharist and its normative function in the life of the church will also need to be given due priority. This is essential for the church's domestic life and its mission to evangelize those not yet reconciled to God in Christ.

RECONCILIATION AND SPIRITUAL DIRECTION

When the Second Vatican Council refocused the sacrament dealing specifically with the forgiveness of sin, the emphasis moved from the official name penance (and from the popular name, emphasizing confession) to the more ancient and biblical tradition of reconciliation. Reconciliation stresses the initiative of God and our human response to a call of conversion within the community of faith.

Reconciliation and the Sacrament

Following the tradition of both the OT and NT scriptures, the early church used the terminology of reconciliation for both the renewed relationship of the newly baptized with God and the one-time-only forgiveness of the Christian who had seriously ruptured the baptismal relationship with God and with the community. The strength of this understanding lies in its viewing one's relationship with God in the context of the ecclesial community. By the end of the 6th century this public penance form was slowly replaced by the "tariff" penitential form made popular by the Irish monks evangelizing Europe. The strength of this penitential form was in its emphasis on ongoing conversion through more frequent confession of one's sins as well as through the directives for a penance (the analogous "tariff" or "tax" idea from a secular judicial system) which embodied the first corrective steps away from a person's particular sinful behavior.

In the theological development of the sacrament of penance, particularly through the Scholasticism of the 13th century and its subsequent pastoral implementation, we see a greater emphasis on the absolving power of the priest-minister of the sacrament, with less acknowledgement of the community or ecclesial context. The Council of Trent in the 16th century, reacting to the proposals of the Reformers, even more tightly defined the sacrament of penance within a judicial forum, with the priest as judge, speaking out God's forgiveness and assigning an appropriate sentence for wrong committed by an individual penitent. It was this practice which needed to be updated as decreed by the Fathers of the Second Vatican Council so that "both the nature and the effect of the sacrament" (S.C., 72) might become more luminous for all Christians.

Reconciliation and Direction

In emphasizing more reconciliation as the foundational understanding and practice of this sacrament of Christ's forgiveness, the church once again stressed certain aspects which relate this sacrament to a Christian ministry called spiritual direction. Although spiritual direction can take on various forms, we need to consider only the personal spiritual direction form in order to make comparison with the one-to-one nature of the sacrament. Personal spiritual direction can be described as the help one Christian gives to another in the ongoing development of one's relationship with God in Christ and in one's continuing involvement in Jesus' mission.

The emphasis in our understanding of spiritual direction focuses on our Christian growth and development. Yet overcoming what have been our failings and what holds us back is obviously a necessary part of human spiritual growth. The spiritual direction process, then, touches into areas of our human lives requiring reconciliation, although this aspect would not be its primary focus. Within the spiritual direction process, true reconciliation with God may be effected by the grace of God abundantly bestowed upon the person in direction. But wonderful as this moment of reconciliation is, the context of the spiritual direction session is ordinarily limited to the individual's relationship with God. By contrast, the renewed understanding of the sacrament of reconciliation allows us to grasp more fully the necessity for a Christian to enter into the sacramental action of Christ and his church not only to effect but also to celebrate a reconciliation which is at the same time with God and with the ecclesial community.

The ministry of spiritual direction ordinarily involves two people over some period of time. Spiritual direction, then, looks to a process of spiritual growth, with all the usual human patterns of setbacks and accelerated growth times, consolations and desolations, and often apparently long periods of aridity or a "walking in the darkness of faith." In celebrating the sacrament of reconciliation, the church once again calls our attention to the ongoing nature of Christian conversion. There is no one magic moment in a sacramental celebration which effects a total change in one's behavior patterns. The priest-minister of the sacrament needs to enter into a kind of spiritual direction relationship in order to dialogue with the penitent about pursuing effective means for personal spiritual growth. The sacramental forum, even in a face-to-face situation, often suffers from time constraints for more in-depth dialogue sessions as well as from the relational rapport presumed in the personal spiritual direction context. As a result, the current rite of reconciliation more clearly highlights the continuing need for spiritual direction as a distinct ministry, alongside of and in cooperation with the sacrament.

The way in which the priest-minister in the sacrament of reconciliation is meant to interact with the penitent invites comparison with the role of the spiritual director and the one being directed. In the present-day ritual of the sacrament the priest is not a functionary dispensing absolution, but rather shares in the penitential healing moment with the scripture readings, dialogue, and prayers spoken in conjunction with the penitent. There is a similarity here with the traditional role of the spiritual director who is always a participant in the spiritual life-journey of the one being directed. The role of the priest-minister of the sacrament and the minister (lay, religious, or priest) of spiritual direction appears more significantly parallel in terms of mutual participation and sharing.

Just as the early church was beginning to lose the central focus of reconciliation in its penitential practice, pseudo-Dionysius in a famous letter to Demophile described two sorts of confessions: 1) accusations of sin so as to obtain forgiveness; and 2) manifestation of thoughts so as to receive direction.

Since the Second Vatican Council, reconciliation as a sacrament is once again the direct focus for the first kind of human "confession." In its wider sense reconciliation, a healing and developmental grace of the sacrament, and reconciliation, one aspect of spiritual growth fostered in direction, together look to the second kind of "confession" named by pseudo-Dionysius.

RECONCILIATION AND THERAPY

In their history of pastoral care originally published in 1964 Clebsch and Jaeckle make this startling statement: "There is no place in the structure and rhythm of the life of modern congregations where a serious discussion concerning the state of one's soul is expected." They then go on to speak of the anxiety of many clergy who feel like amateur psychiatrists. "Part of the reason for this anxiety may be the feeling that usual pastoral routines provide no contact with alienated people face to face in situations that define the minister as one who is alerted to and talented in a certain kind of spiritual conversation that can knit together broken bonds between God and man. This extemporizing virtually deprives the church of its ministry of pastoral reconciling at a time when alienation is at the root of much human woe and anxiety" (Pastoral Care, p. 66).

When they made this judgment, the confessional in Roman Catholic churches was still a well-used place where people could discuss the state of their souls and experience the healing power of the sacrament of reconciliation. With the reforms initiated by the Second Vatican Council the sacrament of reconciliation has become even more the place where a serious discussion of the state of one's soul is expected. It is ironic, then, that just when the sacrament could be of immense help to people, it has fallen into practical disuse. One can only hope that more and more priests will develop the kinds of pastoral skills needed to make the sacrament of reconciliation once again popular. A pastorally well handled rite of reconciliation can bring immense relief and peace to a person. If the person is in psychotherapy, such a rite can also be therapeutically advantageous.

Psychotherapy and the sacrament of reconciliation have a number of affinities. The model for both is the one-on-one encounter. Both therapists and priests listen with sympathy and empathy while clients or penitents reveal intimate details of their lives. Both settings invite confidences. And in both settings a person can experience deep healing and peace in telling the whole truth to someone who listens without condemnation. In the therapies which rely on the working alliance between therapist and client as the means of therapeutic growth, the person of the therapist, his or her integrity and warmth and tough love, becomes the vehicle for the change. In the sacrament of reconciliation the person of the priest, his integrity, compassion and tough love, is the sacramental sign of God's love. Indeed, a therapist can be a sacramental sign of God's compassion in a fashion analogous to the sacramental role of the priest in the reconciliation rite even if the therapist is not aware of such a possibility.

There are, of course, great differences in the two roles. Therapists are not interested in sin as such. Their task is to help their clients to develop more mature and self-fulfilling ways of behaving by means of the relationship to themselves. They search for psychological meaning in the thoughts, feelings, and behavior of their clients; the psychological dimension of experience is their field of interest. The religious dimensions of experience would only interest them if it had relevance to the psychological difficulties of their clients. They would never take it upon themselves to assure their clients of God's acceptance and forgiveness, for example, nor as psychotherapists would they let their own faith or lack thereof enter into the therapeutic process.

The priest in the sacrament of reconciliation is interested in sin as such, in the need for forgiveness their penitents have. The religious dimension of experience is the priest's main focus. He is interested in the penitent's relationship with God and the penitent's conscious lapses in living in harmony with that relationship. Quite explicitly, therefore, the priest focuses on the relationship with God and the penitent's sense of alienation from God and from God's people. The priest is interested in the psychological dimensions of the penitent's experience only insofar as this dimension illuminates the state of the penitent's soul, the penitent's relationship to God and to God's people. Finally, quite explicitly the priest makes a judgment that God has forgiven the penitent and conveys that judgment by word and action in the act of absolution. The sacramental sign of God's compassion and forgiveness is explicitly expressed. The priest wants the penitent to experience that compassion and forgiveness through his sacramental action.

The priest in the sacrament of reconciliation can be a help to a penitent in therapy precisely by being clear about his role in the sacrament. He tries to convey the forgiveness and compassion of God to the penitent. People seek therapy because they have learned unhealthy patterns of relating to others. Often enough these unhealthy patterns of relating also affect their relationship with God. They have unreal attitudes toward God. God, for example, is a demanding parent ready to pounce on every flaw and failure. Such people can be helped in the sacrament of reconciliation to experience God sacramentally as compassionate and forgiving.

The scrupulous person, for example, can be particularly difficult to deal with in the sacrament of reconciliation. Such a person has an image of God as an "ogre" ready to pounce on the slightest infraction. Such a person is bedeviled by a compulsion that cannot be overcome by reasoning within the compulsive system itself. The scrupulous dynamic itself must be seen as the illness of uncontrollable compulsion. It is like a paranoid delusional system. The scrupulous person has already thought through all the rational arguments that could be adduced to counter the scruples. If the confessor enters into the system to try to dislodge the person from it, he is doomed to failure.

Ignatius of Loyola gives an example in his autobiography. He was so bothered by scruples that he came close to suicide. At one point his confessor "ordered him not to confess anything from the past, unless it should be something very clear. But inasmuch as he thought all those things were very clear, this order was of no benefit to him, and so he continued with his difficulty" (Autobiography, p. 35).

Somehow or other the confessor has to get across to the scrupulous penitent that the scrupulous dynamic itself is the problem and that the confessor will not deal with this dynamic directly. In one instance I asked whether the person loved the God who made such demands. The question led to an outburst of anger against this God which I could affirm and which gradually led to the discernment that this God was an idol to be hated. Scrupulous people can drain a confessor's compassion and draw him into angry arguments. It helps to remember that scrupulous people are harder on themselves than on anyone else and that they can only help themselves if they experience a love that is genuine but also tough, a love that is compassionate, but which will not make any concessions to the compulsion.

It might also be well to remember that people resist therapy, resist developing more mature patterns of behavior. Sometimes a penitent in therapy may try to use the confessor to abet the resistance. "My therapist told me that I needed to get some sexual gratification. What do you think of that?" It must be admitted that some therapists could make such a statement, but I would be very chary of accepting the penitent's account as absolute truth. One can be drawn into taking sides with the penitent against an absent therapist. If the penitent asks me my opinion, I would wonder why he or she is asking me. The penitent has a conscience and can decide what is right. Moreover, if the penitent has doubts about the propriety of the therapist's remarks, the therapy will only move forward if he or she speaks openly to the therapist about his/her reactions to the therapist's interventions. If the client cannot be open with the therapist, the therapy is doomed.

A confessor who knows God experientially as a God of love and freedom and who knows the strengths and limitations of his role as confessor can be a great help to people who come to the sacrament of reconciliation. Such a confessor will meet penitents with a compassionate heart because he, too, has needed and experienced the compassionate heart of Jesus. Such a confessor will also know that compassion does not mean creating an unhealthy dependency in penitents. He knows that he is not the one who saves, and so he will continually try to help penitents to meet the only one who can save. The priest who becomes known as a good confessor probably needs to have some adequate supervision just as much as a good spiritual director does (See, Barry and Connolly, 175-91). Alienation is still at the root of the problems of modern men and women, as Clebsch and Jaeckle said in 1964. The sacrament of reconciliation can be one of the best places where people can be healed of their alienation from the Mystery at the center of their beings and from one another.

RECONCILIATION ROOM

In Christian worship parlance this term in the Roman Catholic tradition refers to a room specially designated for the celebration of the sacrament of penance/reconciliation. Care must be taken in the design of this room to provide several alternatives for celebrating the sacrament. If the individual penitent prefers to celebrate the sacrament in an anonymous fashion, the priest presider should be unable to recognize the penitent. Usually this provision is handled by some kind of screen. In addition to the possibility of celebrating the sacrament with visual anonymity, however, care must also be taken to provide another alternative. If the penitent prefers, s/he can choose a part of the room which enables the priest and the penitent to see each other face-to-face so that they can discuss and pray together openly. Ecclesial encouragement of this latter provision is recent. Since the Second Vatican Council, each of the sacramental rites was reformed in such a way that the nature and purpose of the sacrament was clarified. Providing for the possibility of a face-to-face encounter clarifies several dimensions in this sacramental celebration. All people stand together as sinners called to conversion. Allowing for the penitent to be out in the open clarifies that there is no need to hide from others, whether that be human beings or God. People acknowledging their sinfulness are accepted by the presider in the name of the church and God with an unconditional love. God's forgiving love is emphasized and proclaimed as more powerful than the individual's sinfulness. There is no need to stay in the dark closet (confessional) unless, for some reason, this environment helps in reconciling with God and the church.

Unfortunately the culture of the United States tends to cultivate a way of understanding experience which equates the personal and the private, and too often assumes that communal events are impersonal. As a sacrament, this celebration of reconciliation is common prayer; it is a liturgy. Whatever facilitates audibility, visibility, a sense of contemplation and hospitality ought to be fostered. In worship each of the senses are to be engaged easily, although historically this culture tends to encourage a minimalist approach in this regard. Without a screen separating the presider and the penitent, for example, it is possible to touch the penitent in a gesture of blessing.

The post-conciliar reform helped to recover some awareness of the social dimension of every sinful act as well as every good one. The evil or goodness of one has an effect on others, for their edification or destruction. This sacramental ritual of penance entails reconciliation with sisters and brothers (church) as well as God. This is more clearly embodied in allowing a face-to-face encounter.

The furnishings of the reconciliation room are simple: chairs for the presider and penitent, a table with a cross and a Bible. Since the purpose of a reconciliation room is the celebration of the sacrament and not counseling or therapy or casual conversation, the American bishops recommend calling the reconciliation room a chapel. Any other ornamentation ought to be simple and certainly ought not to detract from the primary action, praying together the Sacrament of Reconciliation.

RECONCILIATION, LITURGIES OF

In its broad sense, reconciliation is the process of restoring an original harmony after that harmony has in some way been disrupted. It can be personal, where the disharmony resides within oneself. It can be interpersonal, where disruption has occurred between persons. It can be among groups (e.g., families, churches, nations). It can be cosmic, addressing a fundamental disharmony in "the way things are."

Christian theology recognizes the need for reconciliation in all of these areas, naming the source of disruption and disharmony sin, be it personal sin, interpersonal sin, social sin, or original sin. In Judaeo-Christian revelation creation itself, once in harmony with the creator God (Gen 1:31), suffered a "fall" (Genesis 3), and the story that follows in both Hebrew and Christian Scriptures traces the restoration of creation, brought about by God, to its original harmony. That final restoration is an eschatological hope; it is presented as God's fulfillment of God's creative act.

For Christian theology, however, the full reconciliation for which creation yearns is not simply a future to be patiently awaited. In the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, that "eschaton" has already begun, and in Christ it is revealed that the process of reconciliation is already under way, and has been since the dawn of creation itself.

Christian liturgy enacts in ritual form the truth of God's creation as it is revealed in Jesus Christ. It is itself a privileged mode of speaking that revelation. Christian liturgy is, however, more than simple announcement. It is "effective proclamation," that is, as a human event in human history Christian liturgy effects the revelation of God in Christ and makes it historically actual. It is both promise and fulfillment. It is a future destiny announced and a brief moment in which that future is in fact present. Christian liturgy is thus sacramentum of God's creation.

Liturgies of reconciliation present the sacramentum of both original and final harmony of all in God. The sin that disrupts is acknowledged, but it is acknowledged as defeated, not defeating. Thus, in whatever form they take, liturgies of reconciliation both announce the final truth of creation as reconciled to God and, for a brief moment in history at least, express that final truth. In so doing, liturgies of reconciliation serve to overcome disharmony of all kinds, and make incarnate in those who enact them the actual reconciliation brought about by Christ.

This essay will focus on (a) the original Christian liturgies of reconciliation, namely, baptism and eucharist, (b) the subsequent liturgies of reconciliation, especially as they are currently presented in the revised Roman Catholic Rite of Penance, and (c) some future liturgies of reconciliation as they may yet be devised and employed by the Christian assembly at prayer.

Baptism and Eucharist

The original disruption is described in Genesis 3 as disobedience. This same disruption under different names (e.g., "hardness of heart") continues to be portrayed as Israel's prime sin. It is towards the day when this will be reversed that the prophets (esp. Jeremiah and Ezekiel) set their gaze. It is in Christ, so Paul proclaims, that this disruption has been undone (esp. Romans 5 and 1 Corinthians 15).

The first ritual response to the announcement of what God has done in Jesus Christ is clearly set forth in Acts: "Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins; and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit" (2:38). In Paul the ritual of water unites us to the dying and rising of Christ, a union which brings us into the reconciled state of the New Creation. In John the ritual of water gives us part in Christ and in the victory over sin which his death and resurrection accomplished. It is new birth. In the many forms which this ritual of water has taken in the history of the church its prime intent has been constant: to place human life into the mystery of Christ, to anoint that life with the Spirit of God and to unite that life to the people of God. In baptism men and women are reconciled to God and set in harmony with one another.

The post-conciliar rituals for baptism, both for infants and for adults, signal this reconciliation in a variety of ways. In the prayer of exorcism before the baptism itself the church prays: "set them free from original sin, make them temples of your glory, and send your Holy Spirit to dwell with them." The berakah (blessing prayer) over the font announces: "You created humanity in your own likeness: cleanse them from sin in a new birth to innocence by water and the Spirit," and it goes on to ask: "May all who are buried with Christ in the death of baptism rise also with him to newness of life." The baptism itself is into the faith of the community and the community of faith, and it is followed (unless confirmation is to be conferred) by the post-baptismal anointing: "God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ has freed you from sin, given you a new birth by water and the Holy Spirit, and welcomed you into his holy people. He now anoints you with the chrism of salvation. As Christ was anointed Priest, Prophet and King, so may you live always as a member of his body, sharing everlasting life."

The second ritual enactment of the reconciliation won by Christ is the eucharist. It exposes and condemns disruption in the community of believers (see, 1 Cor 11:27); even more important, it brings about union and harmony in the body (1 Cor 10:17). It is clear from the earliest eucharistic prayers that the dominant thrust of the prayer itself was fulfilment of the Lord's own prophetic word: "...and I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself" (Jn 12:32). The prayer of the Dulache (ca. A.D., 110), for example, asks God to gather the church from the ends of the earth into the unity of God's own kingdom. The anaphora of Hippolytus (ca. 215) likewise prays that God will gather into one all who share in the mysteries. The eucharist was from its earliest times the ordinary sacrament of reconciliation in which Christians would find and grow in the reconciliation brought about by Christ.

Unfortunately, this concern for unity and reconciliation disappeared from later eucharistic prayers, replaced first by concern for personal strength and, later, by a focus on the transformation of the elements. In the post-conciliar liturgy, however, the concern for unity as primary has been restored: "May all of us who share in the body and blood of Christ be brought together in unity by the Holy Spirit" (E.P., II); "Grant that we, who are nourished by his body and blood, may be filled with his Holy Spirit, and become one body, one spirit in Christ" (E.P., III); "... and by your Holy Spirit, gather all who share this bread and wine into the one body of Christ, a living sacrifice of praise" (E.P., IV); not to mention the two prayers specifically devoted to the theme of reconciliation.

The Rite of Penance

In its origin the sacrament of penance (also, confession, reconciliation, forgiveness) was a deliberate act of reconciliation with God and with the church. Need for such an act arose when the commission of specific sins (e.g., adultery, murder, apostasy) separated the sinner (ex-communication) from the ordinary sacrament of reconciliation, the eucharist. A third ritual pattern was enacted to restore the sinner to the eucharistic communion.

The shape of this third liturgy of reconciliation has varied in the history of the church from a solemn public process followed by a solemn public reconciliation (canonical penance) to a private encounter between penitent and presbyter-confessor (Celtic penance and its derived forms). Its prime intent has likewise varied from restoration to eucharistic communion to forgiveness of sins as a necessary pre-requisite for partaking of the eucharist. As a sacramental response to the reality of sin, its forms have been shaped by the various ways in which sin has been understood and experienced.

The relationship between the experience of sin and the form of the sacrament is crucial both for an understanding of the revised Roman Rite of Penance and for any ritual projections that may be made. Where sin is experienced exclusively as a personal reality, personal forms of the sacrament are all that are required. When the experience of sin begins to have other faces as well, e.g., interpersonal sin, social sin, and even global or cosmic sin (evil over which no one seems to have control), the sacrament needs to address these as well.

The revised Rite of Penance (1973) emerges in the church not only in the context of the more general liturgical renewal of Vatican II; it emerges at a time when the consciousness and experience of sin is radically shifting. On the personal level sin is more likely to be named in terms of attitudinal stance than in a long list of nameable specific acts. Beyond the personal, however, the evil involved in broken or dysfunctional relationships, in forms of injustice and forces of oppression, in wars that seem interminable and in such unspeakable atrocities as the holocaust, cries out from the human heart for the healing and forgiving word of Jesus Christ. The new Rite of Penance does not effectively address all these forms of evil and sin; it does, however, make a significant first step in addressing the new experience and consciousness of sin.

The revised Rite of Penance offers three liturgical forms for the sacrament of reconciliation as well as some suggestions for non-sacramental penance services. Our concern here is with the three sacramental forms: the rite of reconciliation of individual penitents (Rite I); the rite of reconciliation of several penitents with individual confession and absolution (Rite II); and, the rite for reconciliation of several penitents with general confession and absolution (Rite III). Reflections on the non-sacramental penance services are given elsewhere in this volume.

All three sacramental rites follow the same ritual structure: greeting, word, interchange between penitent and confessor, absolution and thanksgiving. It is a liturgical structure, and this structure itself marks a significant departure from the more juridical model of private confession which was the norm before the conciliar reform. The opening greeting between penitent and confessor places both under the word of God; the confessor is fellow sinner with the penitent; it is not a judge-penitent relationship. The sacramental exchange takes place under the word of God. Penitent and confessor both listen to the word of God; the sacramental exchange is made in response to that word. The penitent is asked to open himself/herself in integrity to the Lord whose mercy is proclaimed; the confessor is asked to speak that mercy and forgiveness faithfully and effectively. The atmosphere is one of prayer where God is worshipped and human healing is sought. The formula of forgiveness (absolution) retains its declarative structure ("I absolve you"); it is coupled, however, with both narrative thanksgiving ("God the Father of mercies, through the death and resurrection of his Son, has reconciled the world to himself; and has sent the Holy Spirit among us for the forgiveness of sins") and prayerful invocation ("through the ministry of the church may God grant you pardon and peace"). Finally the telos of the sacramental act (both "end" and "goal") is praise and thanksgiving. It is thus linked to the act of eucharist even if it is ritually separate from it.

The first form (Rite I) is the most personal form, and most apt to address personal sin at its most intense. It is in no way "time bound," and can therefore be tailored to the needs of the penitent. The interchange can be long or short, and can contain pastoral advice, exhortation, guidance, a time of prayer. The scripture, which is given as "optional," can be brought in or not as the needs dictate, can be formal proclamation or informal paraphrase. The sacrament itself can unfold in the course of one meeting, or spread out over several, all with the single design that the penitent be open to and effectively receive the proclamation of God's forgiveness.

The third form (Rite III) is the most communal form, and most apt to address less focused experiences of sin. It is a fully communal rite designed to welcome and encourage "full and active participation by all the people" (S.C., 14, 27). As a public liturgical act it is "time bound": it is scheduled, and it needs to unfold within an acceptable liturgical time frame. Scripture is publicly proclaimed, and pastoral advice, exhortation and guidance are offered by the presiding priest in the form of homily. There follows a public and communal confession of sin ("I confess...") and some prayers of intercession, capturing an ancient sense of mutual support of all in the assembly in the church's common task of reconciliation and forgiveness. The sinfulness of each participant is acknowledged in a general way, by means of a sign or a gesture, and the proclamation and prayer of absolution is likewise done in general, for all together. The rite concludes with a common thanksgiving and blessing.

The second form (Rite II) is a hybrid form, combining both the communal and the personal. It begins and ends as a communal liturgical rite; private confession with individual absolution is offered during its course. Its structure is identical to Rite III up to and including the confession and prayers of intercession. Penitents then go to priests designated for individual confession. It is not stated where these priests are located (in the confessional, in another room, at designated places in the sanctuary or around the assembly). The confession is to be made simply. Each one receives and accepts a fitting act of satisfaction and is absolved. After hearing the confession and offering suitable counsel the priest gives absolution. All gather again in assembly for the concluding prayer of thanksgiving.

While these three rites are presented in the ritual book as three variant but equal forms for the enactment of this sacrament, they are not received as such in current Roman Catholic discipline. "Individual, integral confession and absolution remain the only ordinary way for the faithful to reconcile themselves with God and the Church, unless physical or moral impossibility excuses from this kind of confession" (R.P., 31). Use of Rite III is severely restricted; it continues to be viewed as applicable only to emergency situations. This is somewhat of an anomaly in light of the norm set forth in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy drawn from the communal nature of the liturgy: "Whenever rites, according to their specific nature, make provision for communal celebration involving the presence and active participation of the faithful, it is to be stressed that this way of celebrating them is to be preferred, as far as possible, to a celebration that is individual and, so to speak, private. This applies with special force to the celebration of Mass and the administration of the sacraments. . . ." (S.C., 27). A further anomaly is the requirement that those who do receive absolution for grave sins according to Rite III "should go to individual confession before they receive this kind of absolution again" (R.P., 34).

Rite I does remain the most apt ritual form when personal sin and personal conversion are experienced in a forceful and significant way. The difficulties that arise in its regard are not so much difficulties with the rite as with reception of the rite. Even before the revision of the ritual, patterns of participation in this sacrament in its individual form had radically changed. Frequency of reception had fallen off drastically. Neither the new ritual nor the conversion of the confessional to the more friendly reconciliation room has reversed this shift. This form of the sacrament continues to enjoy popularity in the context of spiritual direction (where, in fact, it began in the Celtic church), at times of retreat and at significant personal moments. It seems unlikely, however, that it will regain its status as it is envisioned by church discipline as the only ordinary way for the faithful to reconcile themselves with God and the church.

Rite II presents its own difficulties, both pastoral and liturgical. The most poignant pastoral difficulty rests in the availability of priests for the individual confessions. In large urban centers, where neighboring parishes are in close proximity to each other, this is usually not problematic. In rural areas, however, and in areas where there are few priests, Rite II is impractical, if not impossible. The liturgical difficulties cluster around the fact that, while it intends to combine the communal and the personal, Rite II fails, or at least may fail, in both. The communal experience is aborted at its sacramental peak, particularly if the individual confessions take place elsewhere than visibly in the assembly. The personal experience is restricted by the pressures of time, and the need for all to gather again for the rite's conclusion. This can be avoided if the concluding thanksgiving is scheduled for another liturgical act (e.g., the eucharist on the following day), but no provision is made for this in the ritual as presented.

Where there are sufficient priests available, Rite II begins to enjoy popularity as a seasonal, and thus ordinary, celebration of the sacrament. Lent and Advent surface as the most apt times for its use. Other times, such as graduation in a school community or the anniversary of a parish community, also surface as appropriate. Where priests are not available, however, desire continues to be expressed for a more expanded use of Rite III.

There is no doubt that the Rite of Penance seeks to address both the communal and the personal experience of sin. The discipline of the church gives priority to the personal and thus relativizes the communal in favor of the personal. One must go from the communal form to the personal form. On the other hand, the desires expressed for a more expanded use of Rite III, as well as the popularity of Rite II where it is practical and possible, express a reverse priority: to relativize the personal in favor of the communal. In such reversal, one might be expected to go from the personal form to the communal form. Both views can be grounded in the introduction to the Rite of Penance which speaks of the sacrament in one moment as an act in which a sinner "by the grace of a merciful God embraces the way of penance" (R.P., 5), and in the next as an act "in which the Church proclaims its faith, gives thanks to God . . . and offers its life as a spiritual sacrifice in praise of God's glory" (R.P., 7b). Personal forms are clearly appropriate to the first; communal forms are clearly appropriate to the second.

There is a limitation in all three forms in regard to the range of sin they are capable of addressing. The ritual forms, and especially the introduction, envision sin primarily as personal, with some possible address, in the communal forms, to interpersonal sin. To reach beyond this restricted experience of sin and evil to the social and the global, other ritual forms for this sacrament need yet to be imagined.

Future Liturgies of Reconciliation

There is some boldness in an article of this type to project future liturgies for the sacrament of reconciliation. Such boldness, however, is less whimsical than first might appear. Efforts at imagining the future of sacramental worship have already entered the literature, and have been presented as well at Roman synods (e.g., the 1983 Synod of Bishops). The faith conviction beneath these efforts remains the victory of Christ over all sin, and the desire of Christ effectively to address sin in all of its forms. The pastoral conviction rests on the human need for healing wherever disruption and alienation might show themselves.

For any ritual of reconciliation to be a liturgy of reconciliation it must be guided by, and take place under, the word of God proclaimed. It must involve confrontation of evil with God's word in full human integrity. And it must issue forth in confidence of forgiveness and healing, and come to some ritual conclusion in an act of praise and thanksgiving. It must be, in other words, an act "in which the Church proclaims its faith, gives thanks to God . . . and offers its life as a spiritual sacrifice in praise of God's glory" (R.P., 7b). Ritual forms will vary in accordance with the human experience of evil and sin which is addressed.

One such effort at imagining the future is the suggestion to re-establish an order of penitents which was presented by Cardinal J. Bernardin at the 1983 Synod of Bishops (see, Origins, v. 13, n. 9, Oct. 20, 1983). This suggestion involved a four-stage process of conversion modelled on, and celebrated in parallel with, the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. The first stage would be the confession of sin which would open out on the second, a time of penance and conversion. The third would be the celebration of the sacrament itself, to take place at a time when conversion has begun to manifest itself in a profound change in the person's life and manner. The fourth stage would be a "prolongation of the sacramental experience," a post-sacramental mystagogy. There the penitent would continue to enjoy the support of the community and the community would continue to be served by the penitent's witness to conversion and forgiveness.

Four additional efforts at imagining the future of this sacrament were explored in Alternative Futures for Worship (1987), in the volume devoted to reconciliation. The first is an extension of Rite II to be in effect a more tangible communal form. The sacramental interchange is in the form of a dialogue (Are you sorry for all your sins? I am, and especially for . . .), and only the declarative part of the absolution formula is used (the other part is prayed in common before the confessions begin). The sacramental interchange takes place in full visibility in the midst of the assembly. A second involves a two-stage liturgical act and addresses the pastoral situation where sufficient priests are not available, or more positively, where nonordained ministers (such as spiritual directors, retreat guides, etc.) actively serve in the ministry of reconciliation. Appointed ministers, even though not ordained, receive the confession of sinfulness, speak a word of forgiveness and pardon, and then, together with the penitents involved, bring this to public liturgical assembly for its full sacramental completion in formal absolution by the presider. A third addresses the experience of cosmic evil, of "evil too large." Drawn in parallel with the Jewish day of Atonement, it suggests a liturgy for a Christian day of Atonement. In a spirit of surrender to the goodness of God, this ritual addresses the sins of the local community, the sins of the church and the sins of the world. A final set of liturgical rituals focuses on the reconciliation of groups.

Other liturgies of reconciliation can also be imagined. Liturgies for healing and forgiveness after the disruption of a family by divorce would bring some insight from the Eastern churches to ritual expression in the West. Liturgies of reconciliation between individuals and groups, addressing that form of sin popularly known as "falling through the cracks," as well as the common situation, in which institutions damage individuals, would bring Christ's healing word to a human reality that is keenly felt by those affected yet seldom noticed either by the institution or by others. Liturgies drawn from the tradition of the "Church Unity Octave" to address the scandal of a divided Christianity would shape the desire of the churches according to the desire of Christ "that all be made one," and may well provide a healthy and holy impetus to bring that unity about.

In approaching the sacrament of reconciliation the church needs to stamp out that undercurrent of sacramental stinginess that first showed itself in the early church's restriction on canonical penance, namely, that it be offered only once, and which may still be operative in the restrictions currently imposed on Rite III. The gospel mandate for reconciliation remains the generous "seven times seventy" of the Lord. And the words of Paul to the church at Corinth, "All this is from God, who through Christ reconciled us to himself and gave us the ministry of reconciliation" (2 Cor 5:18), remain a prime identification of the mission which has been entrusted to the church.

RECONCILIATION, MINISTERS OF

The ministry of reconciliation was clearly articulated for the Christian community by the apostle Paul. "So whoever is in Christ is a new creation: the old things have passed away; behold, new things have come. And all this is from God, who has reconciled us to himself through Christ and given us the ministry of reconciliation. . . . So we are ambassadors for Christ, as if God were appealing through us. We implore you on behalf of Christ, be reconciled to God" (2 Cor 5:17-20).

There are two basic ways the ministry of reconciliation may be understood. The first is the more generic, in line with the ambassadorial frame of reference of St. Paul. Accordingly, we are all called to carry on the ministry of reconciliation. A second more specific understanding of the term "ministers of reconciliation" focuses on the role of the ordained minister with regard to reconciliation within the sacrament of penance. We will consider both of these. The reader interested in the pastoral problematic of non-ordained persons who are called to be ministers of reconciliation in situations approximating that of sacramental confession would do well to consult the work of Peter Fink cited in the bibliography.

Ambassadors of Reconciliation.

The vocabulary of foreign service and the diplomatic corps is used by the apostle Paul to suggest the importance of the work of reconciliation and our participation in it. Ambassadors hold a privileged place with the leader they represent; they are carriers of the most sensitive and urgent missions on his/her behalf. The rank of ambassador is an honor; the service, a privilege.

The scope and weight of the ambassador's responsibility is assumed in Paul's commissioning statement: "You are ambassadors for Christ" called to "the ministry of reconciliation" (2 Cor 5:18).

When Paul passes the mantle of ambassadorial rank to each of us, we may surmise two things: first, that God's intention for the world is unity; and second, that the mission to gather the world as one, begun by Jesus but left incomplete by him, has been delegated to the community of believers Jesus left behind.

Ambassadors of reconciliation live, act, and breathe out of the basic insight that the human race is interconnected. We may entertain the illusion that we are separate and that we do not need each other, but Paul sets the record straight over and over again. We interexist. So our responsibility as ministers of reconciliation is riveted in an unalterable conviction of interdependence: "You are members of one body" (Eph 5:30). "There is no such thing as Jew and Greek, slave and freeperson, male and female: for you are all one person in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:28).

Ambassadors of reconciliation begin their ministry by facing the splits and divisions that exist, especially those connected with relationships, or with positions that polarize or systems that oppress. In such situations, ministers of reconciliation mediate for families who are not speaking with each other, governments at war with each other, and individuals who harbor resentments towards each other. When principles of justice are in jeopardy, reconcilers take on a direct service role protecting the victim while at the same time working for ways to change the system.

In brief, the ministry of reconciliation is accomplished through the following commitments:

1. Ministers of reconciliation work against the popular trend: they identify divisions, grieve over them and treat them with the seriousness they deserve. They challenge a culture that values indifference and individualism.

2. Ministers of reconciliation bring ruptures and divisions to public attention, often annoying the power brokers who have the most to lose when their unilateral power base is brought into question.

3. Ministers of reconciliation urge a sense of responsibility among all parties and encourage broad-based involvement towards reconciliation. Even when it appears that positions are so polarized that harmony is impossible, ministers of reconciliation believe glasnost is always possible and that it often occurs in the least likely places mediated by the most unlikely ambassadors.

4. Ministers of reconciliation are themselves a sign of "church." They remind us of our corporate mission to reconcile the whole world with the lifegiving news of the gospel and not to rest until it happens in its glorious fullness.

Ministers of Sacramental Reconciliation.

Official ministers of the sacrament of penance are ordained clerics who receive the confession of sins from penitents, accept a sign of their contrition and life amendment, and declare the forgiveness of God and absolution.

The Rite of Penance (1973) reflected the concern of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963) that the sign-value of the sacrament of penance was not communicating its own substantive theology. The juridicism and individualism manifested in the sacrament since the Council of Trent did not adequately signify the relational, communal and ecclesial theology that was part of the reform of the Second Vatican Council.

The R.P. sought to refocus the identity of the minister by situating him as a member of the Christian community, proclaimer of the word, healer, and shepherd.

As a member of the community, the minister of the sacrament of reconciliation is a person whose priesthood is marked by service (diakonia), prayer, the gifts of the Holy Spirit (especially spiritual discernment). The restoration of the integrity of the word of God in the sacrament of penance pervades the use of scripture in the examination of consciences, the penitent's prayers, the prayers of the minister, the dismissal and blessing.

A metaphor that is pervasive throughout the R.P. and that situates itself unambiguously in the section on ministry is that of healing. A long if frequently submerged history of penance as "medicine for sin" and of priest as "wise and compassionate physician" supports this understanding. The Didascalia Apostolorum advised bishops continually to grant the medicine that heals.

Like Jesus who ate with sinners and partied with them, the minister of the sacrament of penance is asked to lead the penitent as a shepherd in the process of unfolding and accepting the truth of who she/he is in the freedom and love of Christ.

Last of all, the R.P. also affirms the model of priest as judge. Within the total pastoral perspective of the R.P., however, the positive and more biblical way of looking at judgment suggests that the judgment made is that sin is dead and that grace lives, or as one commentator phrased it, reconciliation affirms the positive in face of the negative. The judgment is the judgment of Christ. It is an authoritative proclamation of reconciliation and forgiveness of God, exercised in a provisional manner in the present Christian community while looking forward to the final judgment as the complete victory over sin and death.

The R.P. calls the minister to authenticity and transparency. In particular, he is asked to live fully the life of the Spirit and to be sensitive to the stirrings of the Spirit with whom Christ connected the forgiveness of sins.

RECONCILIATION, SACRAMENT OF

"Reconciliation" has been the most often used name of this sacrament since Vatican II, although both "penance" and "confession" are also still used. In this sacrament the redemptive force of Christ's Easter mystery renews the church by restoring to its communion those alienated from it by grave sin and making them once more full members of the eucharistic assembly. That redemptive force also deepens the sharing of ecclesial communion by those not conscious of such sin and thus not excluded from the eucharist. In that way it offers support for the continuing conversion or transformation into Christ that is the Christian life.

The reformed ritual of 1973 is titled Rite of Penance (R.P.). Prior to the council, "penance," with the meaning of "conversion," was the preferred theological term. This derived from the patristic use of paenitentia secunda ("second" conversion, to distinguish it from the conversion which preceded baptism). Penance, including both conversion from grave sin leading to reconciliation and conversion from lesser sins, accents human effort to change but can, in our culture, be understood as the effort of isolated individuals.

Popular understanding since the Early Middle Ages has focused on the forgiveness of sins and used the term "confession," a metonymy derived from the familiar liturgical format which gave prominence to the individual penitent's narration of sins to the priest so as to receive absolution. This term, still popularly used for the reconciliation of an individual penitent, risks giving the sacramental ritual priority over the reality and making the individual's acts (both sins and the repentance expressed through the ritual acts of contrition, confession, and satisfaction) more the focus than God's grace experienced in the community of salvation.

Both penance and forgiveness are personal, but neither is simply individual. Reconciliation, the broader term, gives priority to God's gracious love which, in Christ, draws sinner-disciples into a life-giving communion which transforms them into the likeness of Christ and frees them from sin. It thus includes penance or conversion, the human struggle to be transformed, and the forgiveness of sins, liberation from the obstacles to such transformation. Current theological understanding, evident in the introduction to the R.P. regards both God's reconciling work and the church's ministry of reconciliation as deeper and more extensive than the liturgical celebration. Yet the liturgies of the R.P. also show that communion or community—reconciliation in Christ—is the goal of the conversion whereby individuals are set free from the alienation or isolation entailed by sin.

The key to understanding and appreciation of the sacrament is its history. This article explores that history, outlines the contemporary theological consensus as presented in the R.P., and notes major questions currently discussed.

History

The confusing history of this sacrament is often over-simplified by speaking of "public" penance in ancient times and "private" penance in medieval and modern times. This terminology grew out of post-Reformation polemics as scholars tried to prove or disprove the early existence of the private confession which the Protestant Reformers had, for the most part, rejected. The disjunction is misleading as it ignores the variety of forms in which the sacrament existed prior to the Late Middle Ages. Period divisions are more helpful: ancient (1st through 6th centuries), medieval (7th through 15th centuries), modern (16th century to the present).

Ancient History

The sacrament's origins lie in the early need to deal with the reality of sinful members in a community called to be holy as sign of God's saving power in Christ (e.g., Acts 5). Though healing could come through others' prayer (Jas 5:16), some communities considered prayer inappropriate for certain sinners (1 Jn 5:14-17). In some cases, disciplinary action was called for, sometimes even shunning the serious sinner in the hope that the sinner would return to the Christian way of life or at least not obscure the community's holiness (1 Corinthians 5). This was the community's responsibility (Mt 18:15-18; Jn 20:23), although community officials sometimes continued the synagogue's discipline of excluding sinners and re-admitting the repentant (binding and loosing, Mt 16:19).

Though most NT communities welcomed back the repentant, some refused to do so in certain cases (Heb 6:4-8; Mk 3:29). Other early documents also show the call to repentance and the welcome of the repentant (1 Clement; Didache), as well as controversy over whom to reconcile and under what conditions. The apocalyptic 2nd-century Shepherd of Hermas, for example, allowed a "second chance" which, in the course of controversy, came to be understood as "once only."

Tensions accompanied Christianity's movement into the mainstream of Greco-

Roman culture: how much accommodation could there be without compromising principles? Struggles with Montanism and Novatianism, both of which denied reconciliation to some grave sinners, intensified already-existing disagreements. Such tension and controversy influenced the development of an institution supervising the postbaptismal conversion of those whose sinfulness particularly endangered the community's holiness. That of Carthage is the best known because of the writings of Tertullian (De paenitentia and De pudicitia; d. 225) and Cyprian (d. 258).

This penitential institution developed in most urban centers in the late 2nd and early 3rd centuries. It was an "order of penitents" paralleling the catechumenate and providing for the reformation of those whose pre-baptismal formation had been insufficient to prevent serious sin after baptism. The community received penitents in a liturgy praising God's mercy (exomologesis). The community supported and encouraged them throughout the period of conversion.

As the 2nd and 3rd-century controversies were resolved, this institution was open to all repentant sinners. After the penitents evidenced sufficient maturation in conversion, they were reconciled with the faithful in a liturgy at which the bishop presided. This showed that the penitents were officially restored to the status of faithful Christians.

The laying on of hands, both as a prayer of exorcism and as a gesture of solidarity, was a prominent symbol in the liturgies before and at reconciliation. However, repentance and reformation—conversion—were the chief concern and were symbolized by weeping, sackcloth and ashes, and prayer, fasting, and almsgiving. Only in the case of penance and reconciliation for the dying (the only instance of "private" penance in the ancient period) did the ritual substitute for the supervised process of conversion.

Cyprian's writings, in the context of the confusion and controversy that accompanied the Decian persecution, describe the intended operation of the order of penitents and explain how sinners come to experience divine forgiveness. The repentant seek conversion, showing repentance and making satisfaction (a legal term earlier used by Tertullian) by external acts. They join in the community's worship of the merciful God ("exomologesis," also used for the entire process). They are reconciled to the church as the precondition for God's forgiveness. For Cyprian, penitents do not gain forgiveness simply through penitential acts, nor does the bishop directly forgive sins. Because he does not make the later distinction between personal and ecclesiastical factors, Cyprian sees the whole process as both personal and ecclesial, manifesting reconciliation with God achieved in solidarity with the church, in which the Spirit is active.

The struggle with Montanism and Novatianism helped clarify the church's consciousness of its ability to mediate divine forgiveness. Fourth-century bishop-theologians such as Ambrose of Milan and Pacian of Barcelona further explained the church's authority. The struggle also affected the understanding and practice of the institution, making it more rigorous and punitive. Moreover, the controversies had a long-lasting effect in that reconciliation, like baptism, was allowed only once in a lifetime. This disciplinary restriction now seems at odds with the doctrinal affirmation of complete authority over sin.

However, only serious sinners were required or able to take advantage of this unrepeatable process of rehabilitation. Others continued their conversion in the church in a variety of more informal ways: they sought change through prayer, fasting, and almsgiving; they turned to holy men and women for individual guidance and support; they experienced God's transforming power and community support in the eucharist. Though these were less formal and public than the order of penitents, they were still ecclesial means of experiencing conversion and reconciliation.

In general, similar procedures and liturgies developed in both West and East. However, Eastern practice was usually less rigorous and legalistic than the Western (e.g., Clement of Alexandria, d. 215; Origen, d. 254; the early 3rd-century Didaskalia). It also gave somewhat greater place to the practice of spiritual direction as an aid to those not subject to the requirements of the order of penitents and sometimes allowed it as an alternative for those reluctant to be publicly recognized as penitents. The East also maintained a stronger communal sense by having penitential rites in the liturgy. In this way it also balanced its occasional willingness to overlook the usual ecclesiastical requirements of supervised conversion and eventual reconciliation (e.g., John Chrysostom, d. 407, who permitted confession directly to God).

The legal and liturgical determination of the status of sinners and penitents intensified in the 4th and 5th centuries in the West as a consequence of Christianity's becoming legal and public. Laws required ecclesiastical supervision of conversion in a growing number of cases. Liturgy became more elaborate and dramatic. Lifelong consequences (e.g., celibacy, prohibition of certain offices and occupations) followed entrance into penance.

The formal ecclesiastical process in the 4th century and after is generally called "canonical penance." Legal regulation through synodal canons led to regional consistency of practice and understanding. However, canonical enforcement was only partially successful. Without a clear sense of the Christian life as a call to continuing growth in holiness and a sense of solidarity in community, fewer Christians, other than the most pious, saw the point of the official penitential institution and entered it. Thus penance often came to be regarded more as coercive penalty and punishment than as a voluntary means of healing and rehabilitation.

By the 6th century, few individuals entered the order of penitents voluntarily. However, many people did choose to become penitents on their deathbeds. Thus, penance for the dying, an emergency adaptation of an exceptional institution, became the most common form of penance liturgy near the end of the ancient period. Even clerics and religious, otherwise not eligible to enter the order of penitents, were able to share in this devotional practice. Those who did voluntarily enter the order of penitents, the conversi, generally did so as an expression of commitment akin to that of those who today enter communities of vowed religious.

The close correlation of initiation and penance is also evident in the changing focus of the Lenten season. In 5th-century Rome many people not subject to canonical penance became ceremonial penitents for the duration of Lent, which had earlier centered on catechumens' final preparation for baptism. As the order of penitents declined, the numbers of ceremonial penitents in Rome and elsewhere grew, and by the 10th century all Christians were expected to be Lenten penitents.

Medieval History

Unsettled conditions during the barbarian invasions and the inadequate evangelization and catechesis of converts also contributed to the demise of the order of penitents. Irish monk-missionaries in Gaul during the 6th to 9th centuries compensated for the failure of bishops to meet new pastoral needs by developing "tariff penance."

A practice borrowed from the East was prominent in Celtic monasticism: monks, not subject to canonical penance or not guilty of sins requiring canonical penance, sought advice from spiritual experts on how to resume or continue conversion. Eastern monastic liturgy included communal prayers for forgiveness and declarations of reconciliation, but these—the latter in particular—never became so highly regarded in Celtic monasticism. However, the practice of private counseling with a spiritual director was extended to laity associated with a monastery.

Irish monk-missionaries in Gaul spread this practice of confessing sins as they evangelized and catechized. They also popularized (or at least reinforced) an understanding of sin as a contaminating stain which put the sinner in debt to God. Conversion too underwent something of a transformation as it was understood less as ecclesial rehabilitation than as private reparation or payment of an individual debt. Each sin was compensated for by certain penitential practices. The satisfaction that needed to be made for each type of sin was listed in books called penitentials (derived from synodal regulations and the recommendations of respected authors) and was assigned according to the individual's confession of sins.

Where the order of penitents had been, a one-time repetition of the catechumenate, private confession and satisfaction provided a repeatable post-baptismal formational procedure. Since the practice was not canonical, there was no official reconciliation—this was reserved to the bishop—after satisfaction had been made. The prominence of the confession of sins (which enabled the confessor to assign appropriate satisfaction) led to the procedure being called "confession" from the 8th and 9th centuries on.

Yet to most people the monastic practice seemed much like the official canonical process where, it seemed, harsh mortification obtained God's forgiveness of sin. What the monks (who were not necessarily priests) offered was more practical: no public knowledge, no social stigma, no lifelong consequences—and it could be repeated whenever necessary. Such private penitents were not excluded from the community but only from receiving communion (by now infrequent). The absence of the liturgical ritual of reconciliation through the bishop's imposition of hands apparently went unnoticed because the canonical process was non-existent (in Ireland and England) or rarely used (in Gaul). Most importantly, the new practice offered the individual a greater sense of security.

Superficially, the monastic innovation did resemble the already-familiar practice of spiritual direction for those not subject to canonical penance. It also resembled the growing practice in Gaul of priests supervising penitents' conversion and then presenting them to the bishop for reconciliation.

In fact, its spirit was very different, due to a changed understanding of both sin and conversion. Sin put a person in debt to God and under threat of punishment. Conversion meant repentance and expiation, making satisfaction by self-punishment (fasting and other forms of mortification). The confessor, a spiritual expert (not necessarily a priest), advised the individual on appropriate means of satisfaction. The accumulation of penitential debt was alleviated by the practices of commutation and redemption (lesser, substitute penalties) which developed eventually into indulgences as a means of ecclesial assistance to the debt-ridden sinner.

Tariff penance and the confession of sins provided reassurance in an age of individual fear and anxiety. However, as the monastic practice grew more popular during the 8th and 9th centuries, the bishops often reacted against it. They did so less because of the sense of sin and penance that it was teaching—one that further diminished the experience of liturgical community—and more because the monk-confessors were offering a novelty that went contrary to the canons and bypassed the bishop.

Carolingian reform councils tried, without success, to outlaw or regulate the penitentials and to revive canonical penance. A series of compromises, all ultimately not accepted by the laity, prepared the way for a new official form of penance. The compromises generally had the common feature of requiring that the confession be to a priest. (From the 8th century on, a steadily increasing number of monks were ordained.) Among the attempts to save canonical penance by compromise were: confession either to God or to priests of sins not subject to the canonical discipline; canonical penance for canonical crimes publicly known and private confession for canonical crimes not publicly known; private confession and private satisfaction followed by the bishop's formal reconciliation during Holy Week or the priest's absolution.

Clericalization during the Carolingian era increasingly emphasized "absolution" as an exercise of the power of the keys paralleling the bishop's reconciliation. Absolution, originally a blessing concluding a liturgy, became a ritual declaration that the penitent was under no further obligation to make satisfaction.

However, many people, accustomed to the monastic practice, did not return for the reconciliation or absolution. Near the end of the 9th century, canons provided for the immediate absolution of those unlikely to return (Statuta quaedam, can. 31). The tariff ritual of the Romano-Germanic Pontifical (c. 950) apparently regards immediate absolution as normal practice. The reason for the confession (assigning satisfaction) remained unchanged, but the satisfaction gradually declined in both amount and importance, with the confession and absolution given greater theological emphasis since they preceded satisfaction.

Though the new procedure highlighted the significance of priestly absolution, it did not immediately eliminate lay confession. This remained relatively common into the 14th century for less serious sins or in emergencies and still existed in the 16th century (e.g., Ignatius of Loyola, before the battle of Pamplona).

Though private confession was a distinctive medieval adaptation to pastoral needs, other forms of conversion and reconciliation were also prominent and frequently communal in nature. From the 10th century ashes were imposed on all at the beginning of the Lenten penance. Lenten fasting became a significant means of purification and expiation; confession was often expected at the beginning of Lent or during it. Canonical penance was infrequently used, but the Carolingian efforts at revival developed elaborate liturgies; from the 12th century this is called "solemn penance." Pilgrimage, often called "public penance," was also an important medieval means of expiation. From the 9th to the 14th century, absolution was often given communally at Mass, especially at times when people were expected to receive communion.

As the patristic period had regarded conversion as the requirement for re-entering the community of salvation, the early medieval period saw satisfaction as the cause of divine forgiveness. As the amount of satisfaction declined with absolution given immediately, confession (once the praise of the merciful God), as the expression of contrition, became humiliation and self-punishment and absorbed the function of satisfaction. In the 12th century the ritual combination of confession and absolution came to replace confession and satisfaction as the central factor in obtaining divine forgiveness.

Scholastic theologians labored to fit this within their new category of sacrament. The individual focus of medieval penance had broken the earlier unity of the personal and ecclesial dimensions of penance. What, then, was the relationship of the penitent's contrition and confession to the priest's absolution? Some theologians emphasized the personal contrition (Abelard, Lombard), others the ecclesial power of the keys (the Victorines).

Aquinas' synthesis, on the model of Aristotelian hylemorphism, argued for an intrinsic causal relationship: the acts of the penitent (contrition, confession, satisfaction) are the matter of the sacrament (conversion) and the priest's absolution is the ecclesial form. The experience of grace in the sacramental ritual enables contrition to mature. Aquinas thus unites the personal and ecclesial elements in a manner reminiscent of Cyprian, giving priority to divine grace and regarding faith and love as necessary for forgiveness in every case. However, by this time the ecclesial ministry of confrontation (binding) was almost exclusively legal discipline and the ecclesial ministry of assistance (loosing) was priestly absolution.

Later Scholastics (e.g., Duns Scotus, d. 1308) saw the relationship as extrinsic and emphasized absolution as the grant of forgiveness. Consequently, from the 14th century on, ritual elements other than confession and absolution tended to be abbreviated and the acts of the penitent regarded as conditions for absolution's efficacy. As in the ancient penance for the dying, the ecclesial ritual substituted for full personal conversion; i.e., forgiveness outside the sacrament required perfect contrition, but imperfect contrition was sufficient in the sacrament.

Modern History

The transition from medieval to modern penance began with Latran Council IV (1215) which focused on confession and absolution as the means of ecclesiastical forgiveness and required it annually before Easter communion. The obligation bound all who had reached the age of discretion. (The council probably had in mind fourteen, the age for marriage.) Sanctions ensured reluctant compliance, although theologians emphasized that this was compulsory only for those conscious of grave sin (now stated in the 1983 C.I.C., can. 989).

Other means of experiencing divine forgiveness thus declined in importance. After the 15th century the modern system of penance was complete: confession and absolution were the dominant symbol of post-baptismal conversion and the only normal form of the sacrament. It operated as the church's means of disciplining sinners and supporting the repentant, although it was often used in a rather mechanical fashion.

The Protestant reformers generally rejected this confession-and-absolution format, often claiming Lateran IV had invented it. However, Luther was rather ambivalent and was often willing to regard confession as a third dominical or evangelical sacrament.

In defending the late medieval system and the church's right and responsibility to be involved in its members' conversion, Trent insisted on integral confession (all mortal sins of which the penitent was conscious, according to number and kind, together with circumstances changing their nature) to the priest (D.S., 1701) as an earlier age had required penitents to manifest conversion to the community. As the ancient period had required that conversion be authenticated and the penitent then reconciled with the faithful in the community of salvation, so Trent saw the priest acting like a judge (D.S., 1709) and his absolution as effecting forgiveness (D.S., 1709-1710). Unaware of the sacrament's historical development, Trent spoke as if the familiar practice of private confession had existed from the beginning and regarded it as iure divino: consistent with Christ's will for the church and required by God for the forgiveness of serious sins.

The Rituale Romanum of 1614 provided a simple ritual that minimized prayer and ecclesial elements, highlighted the penitent's confession of sins and expression of contrition, and climaxed in the priest's absolution. Private confession thus grew in importance throughout the era of the Counter-Reformation as a mark of loyalty to the church and the means of forgiveness. Only when death threatened and confession was impossible was absolution permitted without previous individual confession.

It was also increasingly used by sinners not conscious of mortal sin, since it seemed to have advantages over other means, notably the ex opere operato efficacy of absolution which made only imperfect contrition necessary for receiving forgiveness and grace. As communion became more frequent, so did confession, regarded not only as means of purification from sin and liberation from guilt but also as a means of sanctification (gaining grace). Even when there were no specific sins to be forgiven, devotional confession was a significant act of piety.

Though polemics between Protestants and Catholics motivated historical research, historical data was rarely interpreted on its own terms. The dominant motive was to prove or disprove that private confession had existed in the early church. Efforts to reform the discipline or ritual (e.g., Jansenism and, during the Enlightenment, communal celebrations) were condemned, as were attempts at the time of the modernist controversy to understand the history more precisely.

The focus on individual forgiveness and sanctification remained constant until the 20th century. Rediscovered patristic liturgies were regarded as simply ceremonial enhancements or canonical penalties. However, the publication of Xiberta's

Clavis Ecclesiae (1922) marked the beginning of a new development: the recognition that ancient penance had been social and communal in character, oriented to reconciling sinners with the church and thereby with God. Significant 20th-century figures in applying the historical-critical method to penance include Paulus Galtier, Bernard Poschmann, Joseph Grotz, and Karl Rahner.

Theological controversy over the nature of ancient penance spilled over into a questioning of devotional confession in the 1930s and 1940s. Pius XII defended the ascetic practice in Mediator Dei (1943) and elsewhere, but his encouragement of the Liturgical Movement intensified studies that led to further reflection, calls for reform, and changing practice. Perhaps the most significant change in practice was, in the context of the World Wars, the broadened opportunity for using general absolution (see especially the 1944 Instruction of the Sacred Penitentiary), though mortal sins were to be confessed subsequently if possible. In the early 1960s general absolution was also permitted in mission territories, sometimes without the requirement of subsequent confession.

In the 1950s, in response to perceived pastoral needs, communal celebrations of the sacrament began to develop in France and Belgium and then in The Netherlands and were subsequently approved by bishops in several countries. This grassroots reform was the emergence of the first new forms of penance in a millennium: confession services (private confessions within a communal liturgy), fully communal liturgies (a general confession of sinfulness by the community and absolution by the priest without specific individual confession of sins), and penitential celebrations (a general confession of sinfulness but no absolution). Theological criticism was minimal, since by then most theologians had come to regard the social and communal nature and effect of the sacrament as primary. However, official reaction, in some cases by bishops but more often by Rome, was generally negative when absolution was not preceded by confession or when, in the case of children, the practice led to delaying first confession until after first communion.

In 1963 Vatican II called for a reform that would clearly show the social and ecclesial nature and effects of the sacrament (Sacrosanctum concilium, 72, and declaration accompanying the final draft; see also Lumen gentium, II, and Presbyterorum ordinis, 5). Related reforms came first: the discipline of fasting, abstinence, and personal penance (Paenitemini, 1966); indulgences (Indulgentiarum doctrina, 1967).

Despite the mandate and clear principles for liturgical reform, behind-the-scenes controversy impeded the preparation of the new ritual; e.g., in 1966 the Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith criticized theological and pastoral emphasis on the social function of reconciliation with the church. Such disagreement prevented publication of the draft, completed in 1969, which allowed extensive use of general absolution. Then the June 1972 Pastoral Norms of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith grudgingly permitted communal celebrations, though restricting absolution without previous confession. A new draft was quickly prepared which corresponded to the 1972 Norms and took advantage of the experience of other liturgical reforms. After extensive study and revision by Roman congregations, the Ordo Paenitentiae was promulgated on December 2, 1973, and published in February 1974. The English translation (R.P.) was completed and approved in 1975 and went into effect in the United States in 1977.

This portion of the reformed Roman Ritual begins with an introduction describing the church's understanding of penance and its ministry (R.P., 1-11) and giving norms for celebration (R.P., 12-40). (This introduction is especially important as it outlines the doctrinal and theological understanding on which the ritual is based.) Chapter I (R.P., 41-47) is the rite for reconciling individual penitents, a much-enhanced liturgy for the familiar private confession. Chapter II (R.P., 48-59) is a rite for reconciling several penitents with individual confession and absolution; it is a communal celebration much like the French confession service. Chapter III (R.P., 60-66) is the rite for reconciling several penitents with general confession and absolution; like the Dutch communal celebration, it lacks the specific confession of sins and does not absolve penitents individually. Chapter IV (R.P., 67-216) provides additional texts and options for use in celebration. Appendix I gives formulas for absolving from censures and irregularities. Appendix II provides regulations and nine models for penitential celebrations (communal celebrations without absolution). Appendix III is a model examination of conscience. Overall, the R.P. reflects current theological consensus, although compromises with the Counter-Reformation outlook are also evident.

By the time the new rite was promulgated, many commentators, especially in the hierarchy, considered the sacrament to be in a state of crisis. The primary concern was that confession, which had steadily increased in frequency from the time of Trent until the 1950s, was becoming increasingly infrequent. A U.S. study by the National Opinion Research Center in 1964 showed 38 percent of American Catholics confessed monthly; in 1974 this had declined to 17 percent. Explanations included: the loss of the sense of sin (already mentioned by Pius XII), spiritual lukewarmness and carelessness (although in the same period those receiving communion weekly increased from less than 20 percent to more than 80 percent), inadequate understanding and appreciation of the sacrament, inadequate celebrations.

During the pontificate of John Paul II, efforts have been made to revitalize the sacrament, primarily by emphasizing individual confession. John Paul stresses that both Christ and the penitent have the right to the personal encounter that individual confession makes possible (e.g., Redemptor hominis, 20). He has been critical of communal celebrations where there is no individual confession and has downplayed the significance of community celebrations. He has also prohibited postponing first confession until after first communion (C.I.C., can. 914).

The negative evaluation of communal celebrations influenced the 1983 C.I.C. which speaks of confession rather than reconciliation. Many participants in the 1983 Synod of Bishops (on "Reconciliation and Penance in the Mission of the Church") apparently took issue with what appeared to be regression from Vatican II reforms. However, John Paul's post-synodal apostolic exhortation, Reconciliatio et poenitentia (1984), reiterates his emphasis on the "profoundly personal character" of the sacrament and Trent's requirement of individual confession. The social and ecclesial dimension, expressed especially in communal celebrations, receives little attention.

Contemporary Theology, Ministry, and Celebration

The rationale for the customary treatment of the history of the sacrament in terms of public and private penance lies in the fact that theology and ministry in the ancient period saw individual conversion and forgiveness in relation to the community of the church, while theology and ministry in the medieval and modern periods has centered on the forgiveness of the individual's sins. As a consequence of the rediscovery in history of "forgotten truths" (Rahner, Th. Inv., 2), contemporary theology seeks to bring individualistic theology and ministry to a more deeply personal character and to resituate it within a broader ecclesial context.

Three trends characteristic of the 20th-century theology and ministry of the sacrament have been incorporated into documents of Vatican II and the 1973 R.P.; the nature and effects of the sacrament as social and ecclesial; the sacrament as an act of ecclesial worship; sacramental celebration in relation to a life of personal conversion which includes responsibility for the church's mission of reconciliation. Each contrasts sharply with the late-medieval and Counter-Reformation forms of the sacrament. This is the source of tension in a time of transition and indicates areas for future work. The teaching of Vatican II and the R.P. are thus both the official acceptance of previous theological development and the base for further exploration.

Social and Ecclesial Character

Once it was rediscovered that reconciliation with the church is an effect of the sacrament, a theological consensus developed within a few decades which was expressed pastorally in celebration and ministry (communal celebrations), and was officially accepted at Vatican II. Many theologians concluded that penitents experience God's reconciling love more through experiencing reconciliation with the church than through experiencing interior repentance—in scholastic terms, reconciliation with the church is the res et sacramentum of penance and reconciliation. Though the council correlated reconciliation with the church and reconciliation with God (L.G., 11; P.O., 3), it took no position on priority, since there was no theological consensus on that point. It did, however, stress the social and ecclesial character of both sin and conversion.

In preferring reconciliation as the name for the sacrament, the R.P. highlights both divine initiative and human response—both in the context of church community—and incorporates the new theological orientations. The introduction to the R.P. 1-7 shows that the mystery of reconciliation is the key to understanding God's work, redemption in Christ, sacramental conversion, the church and its life and worship, and ministry to repentant sinners. The R.P. 8-11 emphasizes the communal and ecclesial character of the sacrament, its celebrants (ministers and penitents), and liturgy. The same outlook is evident in remarks on sacramental celebration (12-35), related liturgies (penitential celebrations) (36-37), and adaptation (38-40).

Thus the church, a reconciling community (1-5, 18), is where God and humanity are reconciled (4, 8), as the sacraments indicate (2, 4, 5). Salvation history shows that the purpose of penance is reconciliation with God and church (5); this is clearly expressed in the absolution formulas (6d, 46, 62). The penitent's role is ecclesial (6, 11). The church itself is penitent (3), as is evident in communal celebrations, although the church is renewed even when an individual is reconciled (3, 7, 11). Laity participate in planning and preparing celebrations (40b) and are agents of reconciliation (5, 8).

In the celebration, the imposition of hands symbolizes reconciliation with the church and the restoration of the penitent sinner to the community where the Spirit of Jesus is active (5, 6d, 9a, 19, 24). By this renewal of grace sinners are reconciled with God (2). Penitents are again part of the Easter mystery by being restored to the church (1, 2, 7, 19): the broken covenant is remade (5, 6d). These points suggest that the R.P. favors the position that reconciliation with God is through reconciliation with the church.

The R.P. also stresses that the Christian goal is likeness to Christ (6a, 15), not conformity to law, and that there is both social sin and social dimensions to all sin (4, 5, 7, 18, 25c). It encourages communal celebrations because they more clearly manifest penance's ecclesial nature (22) and show the church's involvement in conversion (4). Through this ministry, in which the whole church acts (8), God grants remission of sins (6). The ecclesial ministry is not only judgment but leadership in prayer, discernment of spirits, pastoral dedication, and human warmth (10). The church exercises the ministry through bishops and priests (9), ministers of God (6, 10d) and church (6) who act in the person of Christ (6, 9), though all the faithful share the work of reconciliation (8).

Contemporary theological emphasis on the social and ecclesial nature and effects of the sacrament establishes the need to express this in both celebration and ministry. It is complementary to an emphasis on personal conversion (also evident in contemporary theology) but contrasts sharply with the individualistic theology, ritual, and ministry of recent centuries. This is currently the source of tension and controversy, particularly surrounding the fully communal celebration where penitents are reconciled with general confession and absolution. ("General absolution" is not the best term here: as it has been used, it connotes an emergency situation where a full liturgy is not possible.) Further work on interpreting the sacrament's historical development and the teaching of Trent in this regard should enrich theological hermeneutics as well.

A sustained effort to implement the R.P. fully is necessary. The variety of forms for the sacrament provided in the R.P. also needs to be strengthened and expanded. Particularly important theologically is a clarification of how the church and the local community are involved and affected in every celebration. A key theme here is that of the penitent church and a promising area for investigation that of the penitential celebration. How, for example, does the non-sacramental penitential celebration differ from the sacramental celebration, so far as the nature and effects are concerned? Efforts to develop a modern order of penitents for reconciling the alienated should also prove fruitful in expanding the understanding and expression of ministry in this sacrament, as the R.C.I.A. has done in the case of initiation.

Ecclesial Worship

Twentieth-century sacramental theology views sacraments more liturgically than canonically or ascetically, seeing them in relation to the mystery of Christ and church. Pastorally, communal celebrations and individual celebrations based on a shared-prayer model have helped restore the sense of community worship in the sacrament. Vatican II gave preference to communal sacramental celebrations (S.C., 26-27), affirmed the place of scripture (S.C., 24, 35), and called for adaptation to pastoral needs in different cultures (S.C., 27-40, 62).

In the R.P., the sacramental celebration is an act of community worship and its atmosphere is one of shared prayer (4, 7, 11, 15, 16, 19, 20, 22, 23, 27, 29, 36, 37). This is clearest in the communal celebrations, especially that with general confession and absolution, but that the individual rite is also ecclesial worship (11) is evident; e.g., emphasis on dialogue (6d, 16, 18), prayer and the word, and seeing the priest's ministry as liturgical presidency. In every case, the focus is on God's action (6) and on praise (20, 29) and joy (6d) in response to it. Scripture is the foundation for this and has a place in every celebration; the word reveals sin, calls to conversion, encourages trust in God's mercy, and shows the nature of conversion and penance (17, 22, 24, 36-37). A compromise is evident in the optional character of scripture in the individual rite (17, 43).

Divine initiative and human response meet in liturgical celebration, but the sacramental expression of both extends beyond the role of the presider. Although the R.P. puts somewhat more emphasis on priestly power than does contemporary sacramental theology, it does not restrict the work of reconciliation to priests nor restrict the priestly ministry to absolution. Yet it is rather vague on both points. While theological work has been done on the role of the assembly and the variety of ministries in celebrating initiation and eucharist, almost nothing has been done on these points in the sacrament of reconciliation. These are important areas for future investigation and will become more crucial as the number of priests continues to decline. Again, the so-called non-sacramental penitential celebration and the modern order of penitents are likely to be key elements in future development.

Although the R.P. takes no explicit position on the disputed question of the sacramental priority of reconciliation with the church to reconciliation with God, it does seem to favor it. This has liturgical implications, particularly the significance of a warm climate of human acceptance and full participation in every celebration. How to further this in a sacrament which, in recent centuries, has centered on integral confession and priestly absolution is a major area for future work.

In any case, the life of conversion and reconciliation must precede and follow the sacramental ritual if the ritual is to be authentic worship. Thus the traditional acts of the penitent (contrition, confession, and satisfaction) are the ritual expression of the phases of conversion leading to reconciliation.

Personal Conversion and Mission

Contemporary theology and Vatican

II regard sacraments as acts of worship whose effects extend into people's lives and are part of the church's overall mission and community life (S.C., 9, 59). Conversion is therefore broader than ritual, and reconciliation is more than forgiveness. Because sacraments are priestly acts of Christ (S.C., 6-7; P.O., 5) expressing the Easter mystery (S.C., 61), sacraments nurture spirituality and growth in faith (S.C., 61). Growth in likeness to Christ, which begins in baptism, is the goal of Christian life (L.G., 7, 11, 32-36, 40, 42). Continual conversion is the constant dynamic of Christian holiness. It is achieved by living in the church community and sharing its mission. It is renewed in the sacrament of reconciliation.

In the R.P., baptism is the paradigmatic experience of reconciliation (1, 2, 7, 19). The purpose of penance is deeper love and friendship, reconciliation with God and church (5). Lent is a special time of community conversion and sacramental celebration (13, 40b), but conversion characterizes the whole of the Christian life (4, 6a, 7, 20).

Though the R.P. encourages frequent sacramental celebration, it also calls for caution and care (7b) and affirms other means of expressing repentance and achieving reconciliation (4, 7, 37). Living gospel repentance is a dimension of the mission of bringing salvation to the world by proclaiming the gospel and working for justice and peace (5, 7). Thus, neither life nor liturgy is viewed individualistically. The sacrament helps in attaining baptism's goal of full freedom and likeness to Christ (2, 4, 6a, 7b), but penitent sinners "should help each other in doing penance so that freed from sin by the grace of Christ they may work with all of good will for justice and peace in the world" (5). This first correlation of sacrament, everyday penance, and social justice in an official document is strengthened in R.P. 7.

The revitalization of the sacrament of reconciliation depends not only—not even primarily—on further theological development but also, and especially, on the development of liturgy and ministry. Most importantly, the church must be, and be experienced as, a reconciling community. This requires sustained commitment to the effort to reconcile its alienated members while, at the same time, reaching out as a reconciling force in society and the world. To be the “voice of the voiceless,” the church must acknowledge its own sin and alienation and speak out for the poor and oppressed. While liberation theologians have not focused their attention on this sacrament, their work offers significant hints for future work.

Similarly, theological reflection on the relationship between the sacrament and spiritual direction or pastoral counseling will be important, as will the emerging ministry of the laity in these and other areas. What, for example, does the sacramental celebration add to counseling or direction if the individual has not been excluded from the eucharistic assembly by grave sin? In what circumstances may a lay presider reconcile, as in past instances of lay confession?

As in other sacraments, so here: the rituals of penance and reconciliation cannot substitute for the reality of conversion and reconciliation. Insofar as sacramental liturgy is the human response to God, the life of conversion and reconciliation must precede and follow the celebration. The human sciences have much to offer the theologian in this regard, but the socio-eschatological character of the church's life and mission also requires investigation because what is at issue is far more than individual growth and development. The sacrament is an intimate expression of community worship as part of the church's mission in service to God, humanity, and the reign of God.

Conclusion

The rediscovery of the historical development of the sacrament has provided the foundation for revitalizing theology, ministry, and celebration. The major orientations of the contemporary theology of the sacrament were accepted at Vatican II and incorporated into the R.P. Current tensions are the consequence of an incomplete assimilation of these orientations, an inadequate implementation of the R.P., or a partial rejection of either or both. Sacramental theology has the task of deepening the understanding of the historical development and clarifying how to adapt the sacrament to respond to pastoral needs. Efforts to implement the R.P. will provide a faith-experience upon which to reflect in further developing the sacrament.

RECORDS, SACRAMENTAL

Parish Records

The parish has the primary responsibility for maintaining sacramental records. The pastor or administrator of the parish oversees the proper recording of all information in the sacramental record books. The following individual sacramental registers should be carefully maintained in every parish (C.I.C., 535).

Baptismal Register (C.I.C., 877). This is the most important source of information about every person baptized into the Catholic church. Before a person dies, it contains all necessary sacramental information because records about sacramental reception are always sent to the church of baptism.

The primary information is entered on the occasion of baptism: name, father, mother's maiden name, date and place of birth, date of baptism, person baptizing, sponsors, and witnesses. Whether the person remains in the same parish or moves anywhere in the world, when other sacraments are received or things that affect sacraments occur, notice of the following are sent to the church of baptism to be entered into the baptismal register:

- confirmation, date, place
- marriage, date, spouse, place
- orders (diaconate, priesthood, episcopacy), date, place
- perpetual profession in a religious institute, date, name of institute, place
- change of rite, name, date, place
- convallation of marriage, date, spouse, place
- declaration of nullity of marriage, date, place, protocol number (includes: Pauline privilege; privilege of the faith and ratified but non-consummated marriages).

It should be noted that the church takes great care to assure the accuracy of these records and until recently notice was sent not only to the church of baptism but notice of reception was returned to the sender. All notations placed in the baptismal register are required to be recorded on every certificate issued. This is why a new (within six months) certificate of baptism is required for marriage preparation, orders, etc.

Register of Catechumens. This is required by the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (46) and includes: names of catechumens, their sponsors, minister, date and place of acceptance into the order of catechumens. Because these persons have the right to Catholic marriage and funeral celebrations, their names must be recorded in an official register of the parish.

Book of the Elect. This is a register of names of those who receive the rite of election according to the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (123, 132). The names of the elect are enrolled and the names of the godparents may also be included. It would seem that this book could be incorporated into the register of catechumens as a further step in the initiation process.

Marriage Register (C.I.C., 1121). Names of the spouses, their parents, witnesses, official witness (usually priest or deacon), place and date of marriage, are recorded in the marriage register maintained by the parish. One also includes any other information which may be helpful in the future: civil license number and place of issue, dispensations and their protocol numbers, other pertinent records attesting to the freedom of the parties to marry.

It should be noted that extenuating circumstances in marriage situations necessitate the recording of some marriages in the diocesan office. One such case is where a dispensation from the form of marriage is granted; but the wedding is also recorded in the marriage register of the parish of the Catholic party. When a marriage takes place in extraordinary form (C.I.C., 1116), it should be reported to the pastor of the place and duly recorded.

Death Register (C.I.C., 1182). After interment the person's name, date of death and funeral are recorded in a separate register.

Diocesan Records

The Diocesan Office of the Ordinary also has responsibility to maintain some sacramental records which are of diocesan concern or require special handling. They are the following.

Confirmation Register (C.I.C., 895). Record of the persons confirmed, including the minister, parents, sponsors, place and date of confirmation, (usually the name chosen), is to be kept in the diocesan office. The diocesan bishop or the conference of bishops could require that the record of the confirmation also be maintained in the parish. Record of confirmation is always sent to the church of baptism.

Register of Ordinations (C.I.C., 1053. 1). After ordinations to diaconate, priesthood and episcopacy, the names of the ordained, the ordaining minister, date, place of ordination are recorded. All documents of ordination are preserved. Those who are ordained outside of the diocese must present a certificate of ordination for the diocese to register this fact in its archives.

Secret Archives (C.I.C., 489). Because of situations which the church respects, not everything about people must be a matter of public record; yet sacramental celebration must be recorded somewhere. The diocesan office carefully maintains such records, for example secret marriages (C.I.C., 1133), dispensations from impediments for orders (C.I.C., 1047-1048).

The church keeps sacramental records for the sake of the people and for the common good. To date most records are in bound registers with a backup copy in some dioceses on microfilm. Parish records date back many years especially in older countries. People interested in their lineage are searching baptismal and marriage registers to know more about their ancestors. The registers tell a great deal. In this age of computers, we must use current technology to store information and make it more readily available. Parishes today utilize computers for census information; in fact some dioceses place the whole Catholic population on computer disks for review and mailings.

Every year the bishop or his delegate must visit every parish to see the sacramental records (C.I.C., 535.4) and make sure they are in order. Record keeping is a serious responsibility and requires responsible people. At one time the priest alone took care of the sacramental registers; today it is usually done by secretarial help, but the pastor must take vigilant care to oversee this responsibility.

REFORM, LITURGICAL, HISTORY OF

The aim of this essay is to set the liturgical reform of Vatican II in a two-fold historical perspective. The first part presents a brief sketch of earlier liturgical reforms in the West. Thus we will survey the following periods and movements: the ancient church; the Franco-Germanic adaptation of the liturgy of Rome; the Gregorian reform; the post-Tridentine reform; and the Reformation reforms. The second part will focus on three aspects of the Vatican II reform: (a) the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy; (b) implementation of the constitution at the official and local levels; and, (c) an assessment from an historical perspective of the achievement and possible future directions of the current reform.

Earlier Liturgical Reforms

In the early and patristic church, which was characterized by creativity and to a great extent freedom of improvisation, the concept of reform does not apply, at least beyond the limits of the local church. A worship of authentic signs, signs of the love of God and of resurrection, celebrated the new life in Christ. An eschatological, prophetic and spiritual Christian worship was dispossessed of elaborate and external ritual. The Traditio

Apostolica of the 3rd century still spoke of improvisation "according to the abilities of the presider" who must nevertheless safeguard the rule of faith.

This spirit of creativity led to an authentic "liturgical revolution," especially from the 4th century on, during which Christian worship was creatively adapted to the Greco-Roman cultural and religious elements. A long process of sacralization continued from the 4th through to the 7th centuries. This sweeping reform changed the language from Greek to Latin; the place of worship from the home to the basilica; as well as the cultic elements and ways of participation. During this period, the liturgical year was expanded, the models of texts and rituals were codified, and bishops started a direct supervision of the liturgy, resulting in the most creative renewal in the history of Christian worship.

During the 7th century, the liturgical work of Gregory I represented the first "official" reform which affected the church of Rome. Gregory the Great brought about a broad liturgical reorganization in the line of the Roman tradition. The new uneducated crowds and dramatic circumstances of a besieged Rome favored a new trend of compilation of texts and a more passive participation by the people who were now separated from the presbyters by the choir. The pastoral concerns prevailed in a more popular, simple and practical structure of liturgy. This liturgy of the church of Rome was still open to some creativity and receptive to the practices of other churches. At the same time, its influence radiated throughout Europe through the missionary activity of the Benedictine monks.

The Franco-Germanic adaptation of the Roman liturgy is the best example of the greater liturgical role which the bishop of Rome began to play after Gregory the Great. This period from the 7th century on, provides one of the best models for the post-Vatican II work of adaptation of the Roman liturgy "to the genius and traditions of peoples" (S.C., 37-41). In fact, the adoption of the Roman sacramentary under the political rule of Pepin (754) and his son, Charlemagne (783), who received a "pure" Roman sacramentary from Pope Hadrian I, did not happen without a process of integration. The sacramentary was first supplemented with local liturgical practices and, later on, adapted to the more sentimental and moralizing Franco-Germanic spirit. This Franco-Germanic reform resulted in a type of hybrid and, to a certain extent, anarchic liturgy. As a result, it brought about a revitalizing and creative movement in the Franco-Germanic churches of the 8th through 10th centuries. The pastoral rationale still prevailed, although within the limited possibilities of theological and ritual creativity, and the new trend towards liturgical institutionalization and creativity. The cultural and ecclesiastical vacuum of the impoverished leadership of Rome made possible a reversed movement of reform under the Ottonian influence (10th century), in which the Roman Franco-Germanic liturgy was officially introduced in Rome.

The Gregorian reform consummated the process of unification of the Latin liturgy under the centralizing supervision of the greater ecclesiastical power of the bishop of Rome. The different local churches of medieval Europe had to adopt the Roman ordo. The most renowned case of Romanization is the decision to abolish the Hispanic liturgy, at the time of Gregory VII (11th century), an ancient, rich, and unique liturgical order. This liturgical reform, promoted by Pope Gregory VII and later by Innocent III (1198-1216), was not a formal reform by decree as much as a factual reform initiated by Rome as means of unification of European Christendom and the renewal of ecclesiastical and religious life. The key of this new liturgical reorganization was pastoral, but was within the limits of a new ecclesiology of Christendom and hierarchical structure centered in Rome. The rationale of the Gregorian reform meant a paradigmatic shift similar to the work of Vatican II: a return to "the ancient Fathers," a religious renewal, and the implementation of a unified order of worship (Ordo Romanus). Nevertheless, neither the ecclesiology of the time nor the cultural factors allowed an actual return to the biblical-patristic sources and spirit in the liturgy. The liturgical reform of the 12th and 13th centuries, especially under Pope Innocent III, still remained the quasi-official codification of Roman rituals (the Roman Pontifical and Missal) and was promoted mainly by the Friars Minor. In addition to a new legalistic spirit, allegorism and devotional piety prevailed.

The Tridentine reform ended a period of liturgical misinterpretation and, to a certain extent, cultural materialism of the High Middle Ages (14th and 15th centuries). On the one hand, this reform invigorated spiritual piety, stated the dogmatic foundations of the eucharist and sacraments. On the other hand it also inaugurated a period of four centuries of rubricism and liturgical stagnation. Liturgical reform was not per se the goal of the Council of Trent (1545-1563), but its institutional ecclesiological model and dogmatic focus supported a new trend of tight liturgical supervision under the newly created Sacred Congregation of Rites (Pope Sixtus V, 1588). Trent's reform followed, to a great extent, the same lines of Gregorian reform in returning "to the primitive norm and rite," without actually reaching it in the new centralized Roman Catholic missal and rituals.

The different movements of the Reformation initiated diversified liturgical families from a more conservative to a freer and more radical attitude in regard to liturgical reformation: Lutheran,

Anglican, Reformed and Free Churches, with still others following after the 17th century. Their common strengths rested in pastoral zeal, theological and didactic rationale (especially in the adoption of the vernacular), and their theology of the active presence of Christ in the word. In general, their weakness stemmed from their underestimation of the value of sign and image, and the authentic return to the biblical-patristic tradition of the total liturgical mystery.

Vatican II Reform

The liturgical reform of Vatican II constituted the single most concrete and dynamic change within modern Roman Catholicism. The Magna Carta of this reform is the Constitution on the Liturgy, Sacrosanctum concilium, issued on December 4, 1963. This document was not only the first fruit of Vatican II, but also was one of its major contributions to the internal renewal of Christianity. Such importance, at least for the Catholic church, was stressed by Pope Paul VI when he promulgated the constitution: "Treated before others, in a sense it has priority over all others for its intrinsic dignity and importance to the life of the Church" (Address, December 4, 1963).

The Liturgical Constitution. This document constituted the official and universal approval of a new synthesis between the doctrinal and pastoral agenda of the liturgy. Also it helped develop a new ecclesial vision, founded on biblical and patristic theology. This liturgical-pastoral movement, intensified at the beginning of the century with Pius X (especially from 1903 to 1914), gave rise to different centers of study in France, Germany, and elsewhere, and became progressively a European and American movement after the encyclical Mediator Dei of Pius XII (1947) and the international pastoral congress of Assisi (1956). This historical movement made possible the relatively simple preparation of the conciliar schema by an international commission of bishops and liturgical consultants. Under the direction of A. Bugnini, the preparatory liturgical commission approved the schema after four drafts and presented it to the president, Cardinal Cicognani. This was in January of 1962. Despite the many amendments made during the first fifteen general meetings of the council (fall of 1962), the original schema was accepted without substantial change. The biblical-patristic basis and the liturgical-pastoral vision of the movement had inaugurated a new ecclesiological horizon radically different from the defensive and juridical framework of the Council of Trent. The inherent value of the liturgical reform, which provided the theological tone and the pastoral horizon of the council, was seen as a sign of God and as a movement of the Spirit in the church (S.C., 43).

The goal of the constitution was the revival of Christian spirituality and pastoral life in bringing the faithful to the source of Christian life in the Christ mystery of the liturgy. The constitution was rooted in biblical theology and consequently provided the fundamental elements of a liturgical celebration in the framework of a new ecclesiology. Its development went hand in hand with the Constitution on the Church. This theological vision of the nature of worship was characterized by the criteria of reform and development, adaptation and creativity with concrete directives in regard to the sacraments and all liturgical exercises. The profound and ecclesiological vision centered around the priestly ministry of Christ in the mystery of the church and opened up new perspectives particularly regarding the role of the people of God in the local church.

From this paramount ecclesial perspective important liturgical understandings evolved: the baptismal priesthood of the faithful, the full participation of the people at both tables, word and eucharist, the importance of the sign of the assembly, the need for flexible ritual norms, relevant symbolism, and catholicity of worship rooted in tradition (unity and stability). All of these are open to the dialogue of inculturation in a church open to the world—to its creativity and its pluralism. In the light of the constitution this new order of worship restored a more Roman and patristic structure, and it opened the way for the transcendent universality inherent in ecumenical pastoral praxis and theological thinking.

Implementation of the Reform. A month after the approval of the constitution, Paul VI created the main organ of its implementation, the Consilium (January 25, 1964), headed by the renowned Cardinal G. Lecaro, with A. Bugnini as his secretary. The fundamental purpose of this official council under the direct supervision of the pope was both to direct the correct and concrete application of the constitution in the reform of the liturgical books, and also to promote the conciliar magisterium through doctrinal and practical liturgical instructions. The international nature of the Consilium formed by bishops and a body of internationally renowned experts with a few non-Catholic observers, made the liturgical reform a collegial enterprise. Following the spirit and directives of the council, this reform had to be rooted in the tradition, to open the way to legitimate progress, and to respond pastorally to the needs of the people of our time and cultures. From 1965 on an informative organ of the Consilium, the journal entitled Notitiae, was issued. A parallel Vatican office, the Congregation of Rites, officially issued the instructions of the Consilium until they both merged into the Congregation of Divine Worship (May 8, 1969). After a lengthy preparation of many interim directives and many theological-pastoral instructions, the main work of the reform was promulgated, the Roman Missal of Paul VI

(June 1970). Following not only the specific guidelines of the constitution, but also the primary criteria and ecumenical scope of the whole body of conciliar doctrine, a thorough revision of all the rites and liturgical books was undertaken, and new ordines were issued from 1968 to 1978.

Although the liturgical restoration of the rituals was substantially accomplished by 1975, the suppression of the Congregation for Divine Worship that year and the dismissal of A. Bugnini as its secretary, signalled a more direct institutionalization of the liturgical-pastoral movement by the Roman Curia.

At the level of the local church, the reform was thoroughly planned in Rome and mostly enthusiastically implemented as its ancient texts were faithfully translated into more than 350 languages or dialects. However, the liturgy in general was only minimally adapted "to the genius and traditions of peoples" (S.C., 37-40). If, in one instance, the episcopal conferences seemed to prevail in adapting the vernacular, trying to make the preservation of Latin a mandate of the council—at least in regard to the divine office—the role of the bishops, for the most part, was limited to establishing the structures of the new ordines and enforcing the liturgical norms issued by the Holy See. The trend toward uniformity and centralization seemed apparent since the creation of the Congregation for the Sacraments and Divine Worship in 1975, Congregation of Divine Worship and the Discipline for the Sacraments, (1988), and in the new Code of Canon Law (can. 1257) of 1983. This was so despite the mandate of the council to enter into communion with cultures and talents of peoples (S.C., 37; G.S., 58).

The historical restoration was only partially achieved. A great challenge remained in regard to inculturation, especially in the non-Western world of cultures. Examples like the officially approved Roman rite for the church in Zaire, and other experiments in the Third World countries, were only the first attempts at symbolic and linguistic creativity, maintaining, however, the substantial unity of the Roman rite (S.C., 38).

The reform certainly constituted a strong movement of pastoral awareness and missionary concern in opening the spiritual treasure of liturgy to the people and making it the center of the life of the local church. By and large the new order of worship was well received. Two factors seemed to be underlying causes of dissatisfaction: the lack of adequate liturgical catechesis needed to invigorate the renewal of both worship and the community; and, the impoverishment of the contemplative, religious and symbolic action of worship which calls for a continuous revival. Planned from above, the reform was then handed to the people. It was not sufficiently animated from below and made relevant to the spiritual needs of the people.

In regard to the possible celebration of the old Latin Tridentine Mass (1984) under very restricted circumstances and with the permission of the ordinary, the decision in Rome was seen as a sign of compromise. While revealing the crisis brought about by a sweeping reform in the most sensitive area of religious life, this perplexing situation revealed the need for a new phase of the liturgical movement of renewal from below.

Outcome and Future Directions. For Catholics, and even for many Protestants, the liturgical constitution has remained the undisputed charter yet to be discovered in its broad vision and goals. Despite the remarkable progress made through a mainly historical restoration from across a thousand years of evolving Christian worship, the primary goal of the pioneers of the liturgical movement and the conciliar fathers is yet to be realized in a credible and profound way. A reform of a more flexible and essential nature has been established, not without some polarizations, and even contradictions; but from now on perennial renewal in the celebration lies ahead.

The work of a generation should not be considered the point of arrival, but rather the point of departure. Much lies ahead, and this demands new attitudes and a new reception on the part of the hierarchy and of the people. In biblical terms, "new wine asks for new skins." This means more than "mere observance of laws," a passive and rubrical reception of the changes. It means rather a creative assimilation of the fundamental dimensions of the liturgical renewal: on the one hand, biblical symbolism, ecclesiology of communion, mystagogy; on the other hand, the understanding of the anthropological grounding and the "mental grammar" of the religious experience of today's people. If liturgy builds community, community makes liturgy.

Though an assessment of the reform is needed, it is difficult because the reality of worship in the lives of people is a complex phenomenon which goes beyond the limits of the context of worship itself. Critics usually refer to three major areas of concern in the present crisis of worship: leadership, catechetics and the emergence of new problems.

Despite the many compromises and the dilemmas of the reform (the most apparent being the rite of penance, 1974), the new rituals and the hundreds of documents issued in Rome provided both a flexible ritual which was normative and a theological-pastoral direction for the future. The constitution demanded not only a translation into the vernacular and structural changes, but also adaptation, reception of the letter and the spirit of the reform, liturgical sensibility and a new mind in promoting its ideals. A step further demanded in the longer term is the creativity of inculturation and indigenization. In this sense, the council opened the door to new opportunities for liturgical growth, foreseeing a new balance between the universal oversight of the primacy and the promotion of the liturgical action of the episcopacy.

This collegial balance can foster decentralization and pluralism, safeguarding "the substantial unity of the Roman rite" (S.C., 37-47). However, because of the tight control from above, some bishops made it the practice to show more interest in juridical approval of the changes than to face the compelling spiritual needs of the people. The problems of the promotion of the renewal of liturgical praxis were certainly compounded by profound cultural transition and the new secular trends of the post-Vatican II years. In fact, as the World Council of Churches acknowledged, "behind the crisis of worship there is a general crisis of faith" (Upsala, 1968).

The underestimation of long-term liturgical catechetics has been a perennial problem reflected in the poor reception of the reform. The quality of participation in engaging liturgies depended on preparation and renewal of the community. The crisis of meaning could stem not only from the irrelevant spirituality of ritual and textual mystification, and inadequate symbolic expression of the mystery, but also from the lack of an experiential initiation into that mystery. In this respect, the new Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1972) is a serious effort to cultivate the great potential of liturgical catechetics, but only if this most authentic and far-reaching reform is taken seriously.

Finally, new problems emerge from several areas. The restoration itself seems too pragmatic, with the consequent impoverishment of contemplative and festive sense of the mystery, and the translation of the old texts inadequate to a renewed spirituality. In addition, the new liturgy demands a faithful expression in the role of the presider, a renewed liturgical music, and good preaching. Moreover, the new liturgical vision projects unforeseen demands, especially from the new self-discovery of the local church and the priesthood. Other unexpected developments could be added, such as the crisis of the oral confession, the priestless liturgies (Directory of the Congregation for Divine Worship, 1988), and the emergence of non-ordained ministries, especially the ministry of women and the global phenomenon of grassroots communities.

All these point to an unfinished agenda of the liturgical renewal and the need for ecclesiastical leadership which would further the dynamic spirit of the council. In fact, after a quarter century of the promulgation of the liturgical constitution, "the work of liturgical reform and renewal remains at the heart of the Church's life and mission" (Promoting Liturgical Renewal; Guidelines for Diocesan Liturgical Commissions and Offices of Worship, Secretariat, Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, N.C.C.B., Washington, D.C.: 1988). This renewal and reform will chiefly be along the two poles of the current liturgical dialogue: the anthropological-cultural pole, which in dialogue between human sciences and liturgical theology and praxis will help us understand the concrete religious story and experience; and the ecclesiological pole, which through serious consideration of the common priesthood of the community-celebrant will renew a liturgy that builds community within and is expressed in active mission and ministry.

The liturgical reform of the council was highly positive, especially in its theological and pastoral dimensions. The ecclesiological dimension, developed in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, is still in need of theological clarification and pastoral affirmation, especially from the perspective of the local and ministerial community. The anthropological and cultural dimensions, the least explicitly developed in the Vatican documents, will be an important part of the unfinished agenda of liturgical creativity and inculturation. Pastoral liturgical studies have been ever since in search of a deeper understanding of a phenomenology of worship which embodies the essential fullness of Christian belief and the living religious traditions.

REFORM, LITURGICAL, IN EASTERN CHURCHES

The Second Vatican Council in its Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches expressed its high esteem for the rich traditions of these churches and urged the latter to preserve and honor their liturgical rites and restore them where they had been altered or abandoned. Changes within Eastern Catholic liturgical rites since that time have come about in a slow pace through local desire to return to authentic traditions as well as through the urging of the Oriental Congregation in Rome. Many of these changes have appeared in the form of the return to traditional vesture and the reintroduction of ancient liturgical anaphoras and prayers. Alongside these in many places the vernacular has replaced the ancient languages in liturgical celebrations and many of the Latin Catholic liturgical insertions have been dropped.

Not all of these Latin influences (Latinizations) however have been forsaken everywhere since some of these practices (such as prayers before the statues of saints, the rosary, stations of the cross, and daily Mass) have become identified in the minds of uninformed faithful with tradition itself. Nor has the return to traditional ways been complete where it had begun. The return to ancient architectural settings and liturgical forms still remains a challenge for many Syriac churches that await the reintroduction and use of the Bema (a central platform for the liturgy of the word), the lack of which leaves many of the prayers and liturgical actions out of tune with their proper liturgical context. Along with these, some juridical restrictions are still in effect and are in need of reform, e.g., married priesthood is still restricted outside the immediate jurisdiction of these churches.

The carrying forward of this process of returning to tradition has become even more of a challenge in recent times since many of these churches have considerable immigrant populations in the West creating new pastoral situations and the need for liturgical recontextualization and readaptation. Thus, not all practices within a church's liturgical tradition would be appropriate for modern needs and prudent adaptations by liturgical commissions would be necessary. Many of these adaptations have taken the form of liturgical abbreviations and simplifications where the reform efforts are unorganized and without clear directions. Alongside these efforts lie the urgent need for the religious education of the faithful to enlighten them about the riches of their traditions, along with the arts and means of appropriating these traditions for modern needs. Much in this regard depends on the leadership and direction of the persons in authority in these churches—especially on their discernment a clearer sense of future directions for their people—together with the liturgical and catechetical commissions in their diocese and the cooperation of the Latin church.

In the following paragraphs I have sketched some of the efforts in liturgical reform made by the various Eastern Catholic churches in their attempts to return to tradition, and to keep in step with the times. In many cases these reforms are small and uncoordinated. They reveal the complexity of carrying forward such a challenging task and how much more effort and organization need to be undertaken.

The Maronites

The liturgical reforms in the Maronite church worldwide began in the early 1970s and continue today. The renewal, or better said, restoration of the Maronite Sunday liturgy began in both Lebanon and the U.S. (which has more than 50 parishes) through the guidance of the Vatican's Sacred Congregation for Eastern Churches in Rome and the activities of the Patriarchal Synod and Liturgical Committee in Lebanon to restore the Maronite liturgy to its original framework. These reforms have led to the restoration of the cycle of prayers and hymns of the Sunday liturgy of the word as well as the uncovering of a very rich tradition of liturgical prayers and hymns. While the yearly cycle for this Sunday liturgy has been restored—replacing the single form which had become common up to the end of the 1960s—the architectural aspect including the use of the Bema still remains to be restored. Many of the prayers and sacramental forms in this tradition, originally in Syriac, have been translated into Arabic and English for modern-day use.

Among the restorations of the Sunday liturgy have been the separate preparation of gifts at a side altar, and the dropping of the penitential rites and offertory prayers which were Roman additions. Thus the Mass begins with the liturgy of the word, with its own proper that is separate from the rites around the altar. The offertory procession has been restored with its prayers and incensing. The Bema however has not been reintroduced as yet and thus the first part of the Mass is held in front of the altar with the priest and deacon facing the people. Some of the litanies for this part have been abbreviated. The veil in front of the altar has not been restored. Among the new innovations, the priest faces the people during the liturgy of the eucharist, and some of the prayers from the Anaphora of Sharar and priestly prayers have been dropped or abbreviated. The traditional formula for the words of the institution has been restored with its variant forms according to the different anaphoras. The epiclesis has been brought to its proper position as an integral part of the consecration. Attempts at restoring early Maronite musical and hymnal forms have been made at the Holy Cross University and Maronite Seminary in Lebanon. In the U.S. the office, along with texts for all the sacraments, have been translated (and also revised) into English. Some experimentation at integrating the matrimonial rite or the office with the Mass have also been attempted. With the exception of a memorial Sunday liturgy, however, only few Maronites attend their own parishes on a regular basis.

The Chaldeans

Among the Chaldeans since the Second Vatican Council some changes in Iraq and in the U.S. have begun to take place based on mostly local initiatives and without formal organization. Among these have been the use of modern Syriac as well as Arabic languages in place of the classical Syriac. This latter however still remains in use in some parishes. Aside from the dropping of the feasts of Western saints and the restoration of the feast days of the Syriac saints in the liturgical calendar and some abbreviations of liturgical prayers, very little has been done in terms of organized liturgical reform. In many of the parishes in Iraq the priest faces the people for the liturgy of the word but his back is turned on them for the eucharistic liturgy. By contrast in the U.S. and in Western countries the Chaldean priest faces the people during the whole liturgy. In this rite too the Bema awaits to be restored for proper liturgical celebration in its authentic tradition.

In Iraq, in the cities, eucharistic celebrations are held mostly in Arabic with some Syriac included, while in most villages they are held in modern or in classical Syriac (still understood by some) with an Arabic scripture sometimes included. The Sunday Mass is usually sung at least in part. Variant hymns (some ancient and some modern) are also sung in all three linguistic forms: Arabic, modern Syriac, and classical Syriac. There is generally a good level of participation in the Mass, and in some parishes when the deacon is not present the laity are assigned to the ministry of reading from scripture. The other sacraments as well, such as baptism and matrimony, are often celebrated in Arabic or in modern Syriac with responsorial participation from the laity. In some parishes these Sunday activities are supplemented with a basic local catechetical program for children. Bible prayer groups for adults are also emerging now in the cities.

The Malabar Churches of India

Liturgical reform in the Malabar rites in Kerala was becoming evident after the Vatican Council, as the main liturgical language was changed from Syriac to Malayalam, the native tongue. An experimental version of the Chaldeo-Malabar rite in Malayalam was implemented and approved by the Oriental Congregation in Rome in 1968. This text of the Mass—Qurbana—with some adjustments was fixed in 1981. The latter move however has been criticized by scholars who consider the fixing of the present text as obstructing the process of return to authentic traditions which is not yet liturgically completed and which still has a good residue of the old Roman rite practices. In this rite too the Bema needs to be restored. A similar case can be made for the Syro-Malabar churches who have also translated their liturgical forms into the native tongue Malayalam. A few variations of the Sunday celebration according to diocese have emerged. The first part of the Mass—the liturgy of the word—is often celebrated with the priest facing the people. For the eucharistic liturgy, depending on local piety, the priest either faces the people or turns his back to face the altar. In the last few years there has been a preference in some dioceses to have the priest turn towards the altar with his back to the people. A very few churches still use the original Syriac for consecration. Participation in the liturgy is adequate due to the original participatory nature of the liturgy and because of the present use of the vernacular along with hymns and songs in Malayalam.

As with the other Eastern rites, office prayers seem to have fallen from use. In place of the office in many homes family prayer is common where the rosary is often recited. Vocations are high and many are from the middle-class and from among those families that pray together. Parish priests often live together in basic support groups. All these elements: the use of the vernacular in liturgical prayer with participation, prayer at home, and community life for the clergy seem to enhance the spiritual life of the community. The need to continue the process of reform and renewal, however, is evident. There are still old customs, especially towards women, that are in effect and that need to be changed (e.g., the purification of the mother before the baptism of her child). Some reforms also appear to be taking place in the Syrian Orthodox church (rite of Malankara). A recent Synod in Kotayam has enacted reforms to enhance the role of women in the church. Among these: young girls, and not just boys, are taken around the altar at their baptism. No longer does the first child to be baptized in the newly consecrated font have to be the male. In addition, the bishops are encouraging women to read to the congregation from the Bible during the liturgy, and to take part in the general meetings of local parishes.

The Melkites

The Melkites have adapted their liturgy to local languages wherever they have immigrated; thus, English has been in liturgical use in the U.S. and Canada three decades before the Vatican II reforms. Other liturgical reforms, however, have taken place mainly in the form of dropping some of the Roman liturgical insertions and devotions. The original Greek usage is very limited and in the West either English or Arabic (in case of newcomers from the Mideast) dominates. Priests tend to improvise and select their own prayers based on the three anaphoras and the litanies combined. An abbreviated version of the Mass has been provided for priests where parishioners have complained about the length of the Sunday liturgy. Attendance, especially of youth, tends to be low.

The biggest immigrant Melkite population is in South America (followed by the U.S.), especially in Brazil, which also has the lowest church attendance. In the U.S., where there are Melkite parishes (of about forty in number), regular Sunday church attendance is low and on average the American-born Melkites attend more often than the Mideastern ones. Shortages in the number of priests constitute a major problem for this immigrant community spread over vast areas. The Sunday eucharistic celebrations have been supplemented with a religious education program for youth prepared in the early 1970s that is common among all the Byzantine rites, with adaptations made by each rite.

The Ruthenians and the Ukrainians

There has been limited change within the Catholic Byzantine rites of the Russian traditions. Liturgical reforms and renewal have taken the form of dropping many of the old Roman rite insertions along with reductions of litanies and of some priestly private prayers. In some parishes in the U.S. daily Mass has become an accepted tradition. Frequent Sunday communion is now encouraged. Most Sunday liturgies among the Ruthenians are sung in English while among the Ukrainians a few are found still celebrated in the native language. New translations of liturgical prayers have appeared depending on the efforts of each diocese, along with pastoral applications suited for local needs. Most eucharistic liturgies are conducted from behind the iconostasis, including the liturgy of the word in some dioceses. In most dioceses, however, the priest comes out to read the gospel to the people and to preach from in front of the iconostasis. Other developments within the Byzantine Catholic communities are appearing very slowly in the form of local adaptations mostly arranged by liturgical commissions in each diocese.
